McConnell is part of a Washington power couple, with his marriage to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao. He has considerably more political experience than Frist had when he was catapulted into the majority leader's job in 2002. McConnell headed the committee that sets Senate rules and oversaw the GOP's recruitment and financial backing of Senate candidates.

Even Frist acknowledges McConnell's experience gives him "a huge advantage" taking on the Senate's GOP leadership. McConnell, Frist said, has another big strength: His ability to keep a secret in a town known for loose lips. Democrats, too, call McConnell a trustworthy adversary.

"My dealings with McConnell have been very straightforward, and he's kept his word," Senate Democratic Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois.

McConnell was best known until recently for blocking new limits on campaign donations, an effort that gained him a reputation as Darth Vader to his rivals. That success ended in 2002 when Congress passed a campaign finance bill.

A skilled fundraiser, McConnell argues that limiting money in campaigns is akin to muzzling political speech. He doles out advice and staff. along with money, to help other Republican candidates. His critics accuse him of protecting horse racing, tobacco makers and other special interests that figure prominently in his state and are among his campaign donors, and of sometimes resorting to harsh tactics.

In 1984, when he first won his Senate seat defeating Democratic incumbent Walter Huddleston, McConnell ran ads showing bloodhounds searching for Huddleston to convey his opponent as being out of touch with the voters. McConnell helped fellow Kentucky Republican Sen. Jim Bunning turn back a challenge in 2004.

"He is a master of the negative campaign," said Kentucky state Sen. Daniel Mongiardo, who lost to Bunning in that election. "He knows how to win elections. He knows it takes money and he knows that with enough money you can make your opponent look as bad as you need to."

Study Health-Plan Options Carefully This Open Season (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

For the next four weeks, federal employees and retirees will select their health insurance coverage for 2007. Many will escape the sticker shock of past years, as federal officials say 63 percent of enrollees in the federal employee health insurance program will see no increase in their premiums next year.

But policy analyst Walton Francis , who tracks premium and benefit changes in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, cautions against falling into open-season complacency.

Without the jolt of the usual large premium increase, "the danger is that people won't pay attention," he said. "They are going to yawn and go about their business, and that's a mistake.

"There is a 'change' page in every plan brochure, and people ought to be looking at that page," Francis said.

DOJ_NMG_0092781

He added, "There are lots of decisions to be made by each individual subscriber, and there is often a better deal available right now."

Francis is the chief researcher and writer of the annual "Checkbook's Guide to Health Plans for Federal Employees," sponsored by the nonprofit group that publishes Washington Consumers' Checkbook magazine. The guide rates the more than 250 FEHBP plans, taking into account premiums, catastrophic limits and estimated out-of-pocket costs for most medical expenses. The guide also figures in tax savings that employees gain by paying their premiums through pretax payroll deductions.

The 2007 guide, Francis said, shows that:

Â· Some plans are good buys and can save hundreds or thousands of dollars.

A federal family of four, for example, should check out Blue Cross basic, the American Postal Workers Union consumer-driven plan, the Government Employees Hospital Association standard option, and the Aetna and Mail Handlers high-deductible health plans.

The guide also give high marks to some health maintenance organizations, such as the Kaiser Foundation Health Plan's mid-Atlantic standard and high options, the Aetna Open Access basic option and M.D.-IPA.

A retired federal couple enrolled in Medicare parts A and B should take a look at the annual costs and savings under GEHA standard, Mail Handlers high-deductible, Blue Cross basic and the APWU consumer option, according to the guide.

The retired couple also might reduce medical costs by enrolling in an HMO, such as Kaiser's standard option, Aetna basic and the Aetna Health Fund consumer-driven option.

Â· Some benefits are changing, and sometimes for the better.

The Mail Handlers standard and high options have dropped their prescription-drug deductible -- a change that helps enrollees regardless of how much or how little they use prescription medicines. (Co-payments continue at Mail Handlers, such as a $10 co-pay for generic medications from in-network retail pharmacies.)

Â· Enrollees hold down their medical costs when they stay in-network.

Double-check to make sure your doctor and dentist accept reimbursement from federal plans. Dental and vision benefits, in particular, are based on preferred providers.

Â· Attention to premiums is especially important when deciding whether to enroll in the dental and vision program, which starts for the first time Dec. 31.

Regular health insurance typically covers annual checkups and teeth cleaning, and almost all health insurance plans provide coverage for accidental dental or vision injuries.

The stand-alone dental plans can cost several hundred dollars a year in premiums, and Francis suggests that they may make the most sense for people who anticipate moderately high dental expenses, want some protection against unexpected bills and like the predictability of paying a regular premium.

The vision plans also should be seen as a way to prepay routine costs for eye exams, glasses, contact lens and related services. They are not true insurance plans, Francis said.

Employees who are uncertain about whether to enroll for dental-vision coverage have the option of setting up a flexible spending account. FSAs help limit out-of-pocket costs by providing what the Consumers' Checkbook guide estimates as one-third savings on health-care expenses because payments are made in pretax dollars.

Hiding From Oversight (NYT)

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

There have been many examples of the shambles that the Republican-controlled Congress made of its responsibility for oversight of the Bush administration. But none was so peremptory as the mass firing of 60 House appropriations investigators last month — virtually the entire hired staff responsible for tracking spending abuses in such money pits as the Iraq war, intelligence operations and the $62 billion Hurricane Katrina relief effort.

The dismissed investigators — former F.B.I. and C.I.A. agents and other professionals — did not have their contracts renewed because their work has “not been that good,” in the words of a Republican spokesman who offered no compelling evidence. An attempt was made to sell the purge as a bipartisan decision, but it turned out to be the unilateral order of the committee’s Republican chairman, Jerry Lewis of California.

The result is that, until the Democrats assume committee control in January, there’s an investigatory vacuum on such matters as soldiers’ body armor in Iraq and levee and dam spending along the Gulf Coast. A year ago, amid public outrage over the administration’s bungling of Katrina relief, Mr. Lewis promised that a timely public report would be made. No such report has surfaced.

There had been a bipartisan tradition on the committee, with majority and minority leaders proposing and signing off on investigation assignments. But that degraded with the arrival of one-party rule as Republicans shirked their oversight duty. This was obvious three years ago when the ranking Democrat, David Obey of Wisconsin, was rebuffed in his proposal for an investigation of the freewheeling intelligence operation quietly constructed by the administration in the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0092782

Mr. Obey takes the committee gavel in January, and among his tasks will be restocking the investigation staff and setting the committee back on a productive, bipartisan course. This should not be a matter of party vengeance, as some Republicans fear. Rather, it's a necessity of the course set by the voters to end one-party rule and find out what the government is actually up to.

Truth About The Trade Deficit (NYT)

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

Just as the summer driving season was winding down, oil prices started to fall. The combination of less demand and lower prices was a potent mix, helping to narrow the United States' trade gap significantly in September, to $64.3 billion from $69 billion in August, according to the latest tally.

That's welcome news, illustrating yet another upside to curbing the nation's oil consumption. But it's also sobering. The decline in September's trade deficit was the largest in nearly two years. And yet, the United States remains squarely on track for a record trade imbalance in 2006: a projected $790 billion, compared with $717 billion last year.

The Bush administration has played down the dangers of bloated deficits. Acknowledging them would compel an effort to tame the borrow-and-spend ways of the past six years, including curbing the tax cuts that have been such a boon to the rich.

Far too many Congressional Democrats have blamed China's cheap currency for the trade deficit and sought a solution in protectionism. The currency complaint has a grain of truth, but it is overly simplistic and could be self-defeating if it led to global protectionism.

So, both camps are off point. With the deficit reaching new highs and Democrats now able to wield real power, it is crucial that each side back off its constituent-pleasing myths.

The Bush administration needs to tell the truth about the vulnerability that comes with large deficits. Thus far, the United States has had no problem attracting money from abroad to plug the gaps. But there is no guarantee that will continue indefinitely. If foreigners chose to invest elsewhere — like the strengthening economies of Europe or Japan — the result would be higher interest rates and higher prices in America, perhaps sharply higher.

The Democrats need to take a more pragmatic view of the lopsided trade situation. The surest way to make American businesses more competitive — and workers more secure — is to resolve the nation's health care mess. And the government needs to update and strengthen the safety net for workers who are hurt by global competition. As recently as a few years ago, economists warned that a nation was courting a financial crisis if the size of its trade deficit exceeded 3 percent of its economy. Today, the United States' deficit is approaching 7 percent. The best way to avoid the worst is to define the problem honestly, and craft the remedies accordingly.

OTHER NEWS:

Karl Rove: The Architect's Faulty Specs (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - President Bush knew he was in for a rough night. As he settled down in front of the TV in the White House residence to watch the election results, the numbers were already grim. By 8 p.m., long before the polls closed out west, Bush realized it was over. "It looks like this is going to be a rout," he lamented to a handful of aides.

Downstairs in the West Wing, Karl Rove wasn't ready to concede anything. The president's political architect believed the GOP could hold on to slender majorities in the House and the Senate. He had history on his side: in 2004 he refused to believe the early exit polls while everyone else was resigned to defeat. This time he was convinced his numbers would come through again. But even Rove's optimism finally cracked when he took a gloomy call from an old friend working for Rep. Clay Shaw in Florida. Shaw won re-election two years ago by a 28-point margin; last week he was heading to a four-point defeat. At 11:01 p.m., Rove made the long walk to the residence. "We're losing the House," he told Bush. The president let out a long sigh and went to bed.

How did the man they call Bush's brain get it so wrong?

Rove's miscalculations began well before election night. The polls and pundits pointed to a Democratic sweep, but Rove dismissed them all. In public, he predicted outright victory, flashing the V sign to reporters flying on Air Force One. He wasn't just trying to psych out the media and the opposition. He believed his "metrics" were far superior to plain old polls. Two weeks before the elections, Rove showed NEWSWEEK his magic numbers: a series of graphs and bar charts that tallied early voting and voter outreach. Both were running far higher than in 2004. In fact, Rove thought the polls were obsolete because they relied on home telephones in an age of do-not-call lists and cell phones. Based on his models, he forecast a loss of 12 to 14 seats in the House—enough to hang on to the majority. Rove placed so much faith in his figures that, after the elections, he planned to convene a panel of Republican political scientists—to study just how wrong the polls were.

DOJ_NMG_0092783

His confidence buoyed everyone inside the West Wing, especially the president. Ten days before the elections, House Majority Leader John Boehner visited Bush in the Oval Office with bad news. He told Bush that the party would lose Tom DeLay's old seat in Texas, where Bush was set to campaign. Bush brushed him off, Boehner recalls. "Get me Karl," the president told an aide. "Karl has the numbers."

The numbers looked a lot less rosy to the other architect of the campaign—RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman. It was Mehlman who built the much-vaunted turnout machine. But he feared that many inside the party were relying too much on technology, like voter databases, and had lost sight of the bigger picture: that voters were turning against them. "We've built a great new car, but the gasoline for the car isn't us; it's the candidates and the issues," Mehlman told NEWSWEEK. There was no bigger issue than the war, which Rove had pushed as a winning theme for the GOP. As he flew back to D.C. on a private jet two days before the elections, Mehlman scribbled his predictions on a card—not to be revealed until after the elections. His numbers were much closer than Rove's: the GOP would lose 23 in the House (5 short of the final tally), 5 in the Senate (1 shy) and 6 governors (spot on). Last week Mehlman announced he would step down and pursue opportunities in the private sector.

Rove blames complacent candidates for much of the GOP's defeat. He says even some scandal-tainted members won when they followed what he calls "the program" of voter contacts and early voting. "Where some people came up short was where they didn't have a program," he told NEWSWEEK. But even Rove concedes that there were several hardworking incumbents, like Mike Fitzpatrick in Pennsylvania's Eighth District, who simply couldn't overcome the odds. In an election overwhelmed by war and scandal, the program was no match for their party's problems.

"A Passing Thing" (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, November 13, 2006

At 5:15 on election night, Karl Rove sounded jovial, assuring Sean Hannity's radio audience that Republicans would defy the polls and hang on to both the House and Senate. Less than three hours later, President George W. Bush was watching returns on TV in his private study with the First Lady and a few friends and aides. He leaned over as a blue riptide swamped Republican after Republican. "Looks like a rout!" he said.

The architect--as Bush famously called Rove--of the 2000, 2002 and 2004 G.O.P. wins now downplays his forecast. "My job is not to be a prognosticator," he told TIME in an interview in his West Wing office. "I told the President, 'I don't know where this is going to end up. But I see our way clear to Republican control.' My job is not to go out there and wring my hands and say, 'We're going to lose.'"

Rove chalks up the loss to corruption, incumbent overconfidence and conservative dissatisfaction with spending. He does not read the outcome as exclusively a judgment on either Iraq or Bush. "Iraq mattered," Rove says. "But it was more frustration than it was an explicit call for withdrawal." Which is not to say the White House didn't see trouble coming. To keep the Republican National Committee from having to take out a loan, according to Republican officials, Bush chipped in $12 million of his campaign funds that otherwise would have gone to his presidential library. Looking ahead, friends say Rove has already identified four voter groups to watch in 2008: Catholics, Hispanics, suburban moderates and people with less than a college education. All four groups swung away from Republicans in this election.

Rove has not given up on his dream of a durable Republican majority, calling last week's loss a "transient, passing thing."

"The Republican Party remains at its core a small-government, low-tax, limit-spending, traditional-values, strong-defense party," he says. "I see the power of the ideas, even in a tough year." Friends say Rove plans to lie low in the '08 race until a nominee is clear. Then, whether in or out of government, he will be the connection between the White House and the campaign, refereeing the candidate's needs and Bush's own.

Will: Retreat From Exuberance (NSWK)

By George F. Will

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - In his graceful concession speech after President Jimmy Carter and he lost the 1980 election to Ronald Reagan in a landslide, Vice President Walter Mondale said voters had "quietly wielded their staggering power." They did so again last week. The Constitution designed the House to be the federal institution most responsive to gusts of opinion, and this year, with a gale blowing against the Iraq war, the House functioned as the Constitution's framers expected it to.

DOJ_NMG_0092784

So with Democrats soon to be rampant on Capitol Hill, in the House and the Senate, is the Antibullying Campaign Act an idea whose time has come? No. That legislation would federalize, by throwing money at, the problem of children being beastly to each other in and around schools. Some House Democrats, unfazed by the suspicion that their party lacks a sense of the ridiculous, have actually proposed this. Two of its sponsors will be committee chairmen in the coming Congress.

Now, however, Democrats have bigger fish to fry. More than any congressional elections in history, last week's turned on a single burning national issue. Control of Congress has changed because of deep discontent about Iraq. But Congress can, realistically, have little control over what we make of the mess we have made.

Democrats could have demanded the departure of Donald Rumsfeld, but they have been pre-empted. They could cut off funding for the war, but that weapon is too blunt to be used. Besides, both parties know that, for all the arguments about whether there should be a deadline for disengagement from Iraq, the Constitution, in effect, sets a deadline for setting a deadline.

There will be—the Constitution is persnickety about this—a presidential election in 24 months. Republicans do not want to run in 2008 with 150,000 U.S. forces still caught in the crossfire of Iraq's sectarian strife. Democrats know that if Iraq is still aboil and the U.S. presence essentially unchanged, their 2008 presidential candidate will have to offer what their 2006 congressional candidates were not required to offer—an actual plan for dealing with the problem. And each party's nominee would dread the possibility that his or her presidency would be instantly entangled in an inherited war.

There is another, if perhaps slight, reason to hope for, if not congeniality, at least some convergence of interests between the executive and legislative branches. It is that the election that has elevated Nancy Pelosi to the speakership has produced a more conservative House.

The Democratic contingent in the House that will convene in January, enlarged to majority status by the addition of moderates from Republican-leaning districts, will be more conservative than it was in the last Congress. And the defeat of numerous Republican moderates means that the Republican contingent in the House will be even more ideologically monochrome than it was.

House Democrats have their leader, and she has an agenda for the next Congress's first 100 hours. Yes, hours. Her aim, perhaps, is to make FDR's hyperkinetic "100 days" look lethargic. House Republicans once again need a leader. In November 1998, House Republicans were disoriented first by the resignation of Speaker Newt Gingrich (because of disappointing election results) and a month later by the announcement that his designated successor, Bob Livingston, would also resign (because of revelations about his private life). Seeking tranquillity, House Republicans chose Denny Hastert as leader.

By choosing him, an amiable master of the legislative process but not a man of ideas, they chose not to be led by California Rep. Chris Cox, a man less collegial but more cerebral. (He now is chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.) The result was the rise of a theory: "Earmarks"—targeted spending by members for their districts—could secure a permanent majority. That theory has been slain by a fact—last week's election. With Hastert's announcement that he will not seek a leadership position in the new Congress, House Republicans will have no choice but to reconsider how their behavior in recent years—particularly their ravenous appetite for pork—is related to having had leadership that was light on the ballast of ideas. The person Republicans choose as minority leader—John Boehner? Mike Pence? someone else?—will reveal what they think are the lessons of the election that deprived them of majority status.

For now, for the rest of the nation, "silence like a poultice comes to heal the blows of sound." (So wrote Oliver Wendell Holmes, father of the jurist.) Americans grateful for the end of the election cacophony and longing for lost civilities might remember what a former congressman said, late in life, as he fondly remembering the hotly contested 1800 election: "It was a pleasure to live in the good old days, when a Federalist could knock a Republican down in the streets and not be questioned about it."

Reaching For The Center (TIME)

By Joe Klein

Time, November 13, 2006

This was a big deal. Certainly, it was the endÂ of George W. Bush's radical experiment in partisan governance. It might have been even bigger than that: the end of the conservative pendulum swing that began with Ronald Reagan's revolution. Not only did the Democrats lay a robust whupping on the Republicans in the midterm elections, but--far worse--the President was forced into a tacit acknowledgment that the defining policy of his Administration, the war in Iraq, was failing. In 1994, when Bill Clinton lost both houses of Congress, he merely replaced his consultants and, liberated from the liberal wing of his party, sailed into the enforced moderation of divided government. Last week George W. Bush replaced Donald Rumsfeld, the blustery symbol of American arrogance overseas--and, after six years of near total control at home, had to adjust to a situation in which his vision had been rejected by the voters and his power seriously truncated. Rumsfeld was replaced by Robert Gates, who had been a junior associate on the foreign policy team of President George H.W. Bush and was well schooled in the cautious "realism" that marked the reign of Bush the Elder.

DOJ_NMG_0092785

In fact, if there was a common strand in last week's Democratic victories and Republican defeats, it was the ascendancy of realists. The architects of the Democratic victory, Senator Charles Schumer and Congressman Rahm Emanuel, had calculated with cold-eyed efficiency which candidates the party would support, regardless of the extent of their orthodoxy. On the Republican side, realists seemed to be taking over the national security apparatus--even if was not yet clear that the President would follow their advice.

Bush's decision to delay the sacking of Rumsfeld until after the election will undoubtedly stand as one of the greatest mistakes of his presidency. It was a purely political decision, straight from the Karl Rove playbook: show no sign of weakness or indecision in the midst of a campaign--or, as Bill Clinton neatly summarized it, Strong and wrong beats weak and right. Not this time. "Strong and wrong" may have cost Bush the election. It may also have cost him whatever chance he had for a dignified exit from Iraq. His refusal to change his team and his strategy prevented an effective response to the centrifugal disintegration of Iraq over the past few months. The exit polls indicate that the war was not the main issue in the 2006 election: the general odor of corruption and incompetence emanating from Washington seemed to be the real motivator. But the Administration's stubbornness on Iraq, neatly symbolized by Rumsfeld's detachment from reality, certainly didn't help the G.O.P. cause.

While the U.S. was holding an election, Iraq's democratically elected government was proving itself a failure. "It's become clear that the Maliki government has made things worse across the board," a senior Administration official told me. The biggest winner has been the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who is the most popular and probably the most powerful leader among the dominant Iraqi Shi'ites. In the past year, according to U.S. military and intelligence sources, the Iranians have placed their bets on al-Sadr, "doubling down" on their support for his militia, the Mahdi Army. As a result, leaders of both the U.S. military and the intelligence community have come to the conclusion that a major change of policy, an effort to prevent al-Sadr from eventually taking power, is in order. The mind-numbing difficulty of the situation had some very serious people grasping at straws, cracking jokes. "It's a Mick Jagger moment," the senior Administration official told me. "You can't always get what you want. The question is, Can we get what we need?"

What we wanted was democracy; what we need is stability. No fewer than three efforts are under way to figure out how to achieve that goal--the Iraq Study Group, chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton; a new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq; and the Joint Chiefs' study group in the Pentagon. Up until last week, the biggest question was whether the President understood he was facing a Mick Jagger moment. But his selection of Gates and his constant references to the Baker commission may indicate that Bush now recognizes the futility of the neoconservative fantasy of an Iraqi democracy imposed by an American invasion--or it may have just been palliative spin, in a week when it was wise to seem humble. Either way, the dramatic turn for the worse in Iraq means that the President's previous policy--hang on with the current troop levels and hope for the best--cannot be sustained. And the dramatic turn toward the Democrats in Washington means that Bush's new Iraq policy will require bipartisan support. Last week the incoming Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, was asked if the Senate might legislate troop withdrawals if the President didn't figure out a way to begin them. "It may come to that," he said.

Of course, it is assumed by most people in Washington that bipartisan efforts on even the smallest matters, much less the war in Iraq, will be near impossible. You've heard the arguments: the House of Representatives will be controlled by ancient liberals of Vietnam vintage, just itching to investigate and indict; Bush has shown precious little inclination toward compromise in his various moral crusades--tax cuts, Social Security reform, the war--and Dick Cheney has shown even less. The standard postelection gestures toward peace and bipartisanship certainly seemed more starchy than genuine. The President opened his press conference with an ironic shot at the media: "Why all the glum faces?" If Jane Austen were writing a novel about Bush's public aspect, the title would be Pride and Petulance. But for the sake of argument and in the hope that sanity will prevail, let me make a mild case for optimism.

First, there is the muscular realism of the Democrats who ran the election campaigns, Schumer and Emanuel. They chose their candidates on pragmatism, not principle. Yes, many of the winners tended to be moderates, but that's because this was an election, especially on the House side, waged in moderate districts. In some cases, realism meant supporting the more liberal candidate. In Ohio, Reid and Schumer made a stark decision to force the attractive if inexperienced Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett out of the race and to support Congressman Sherrod Brown, a feisty paleoliberal whose vehement protectionism matched well with Ohio's economic desperation. In Pennsylvania, Reid and Schumer went with a pro-life candidate, Bob Casey Jr., despite shrieks from the party's pro-choice base. The common denominator wasn't liberalism or moderation but the ability to win. The question now is whether "winning" means blocking the President or demonstrating the ability to govern. It probably means a little of both, but I suspect the Democrats will be better served by proving they have the maturity to do the latter.

DOJ_NMG_0092786

Why? Because the American public proved that it had the maturity to ignore, and in many cases rebel against, the sludge tide of negative ads that was splashed onto the public airwaves, primarily by Republicans. (A notable exception: Tennessee's Harold Ford Jr. was taken down by sleazy sexual innuendo.) Americans tossed aside candidates who had associated themselves with the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and those who had been involved in sex scandals, and those whose position on immigration slouched toward anti-Hispanic racism, especially in the Rocky Mountain gubernatorial contests and several congressional districts in the Southwest. They chose candidates who, in the felicitous words of Colorado Congressman John Salazar, "have manure on the outside of their boots rather than on the inside." Nowhere was this more literally true than in Virginia, where the operative metaphor actually was footwear. The Democratic challenger, Jim Webb, wore his son's combat boots and the Republican incumbent, George Allen, wore cowboy boots that were unstained (on the outside, at least). Webb's successful antiwar campaign was about the fate of his son, a Marine lance corporal serving in Anbar province; Allen's campaign was a dreadful series of gaffes followed by a despicable effort to smear the Democrat by quoting sexually explicit passages from Webb's critically acclaimed war novels. This election was not only about a disastrous war and the stench of corruption, it was also about a style of politics--the slashing negative politics practiced by a generation of media consultants in both parties. It was a message to politicians: stop slinging the manure, and start getting serious about the nation's problems.

Which may be the most compelling case for a bit of optimism in a difficult time. In a meeting with political columnists, Reid said, "It's not a time to get even with the Republicans; it's a time to treat them the way they didn't treat us." And then he announced that he and Nancy Pelosi, who will be Speaker of the House, had decided to open the House-Senate conference committees to the press. This may seem a small point, but it has great symbolic relevance. The conferences are where the most important legislative action takes place, where compromises are worked out between House and Senate versions of legislation and where, in the recent past, all sorts of nefarious special deals for lobbyists and pork for legislators have been inserted without public scrutiny. In the old days, the conferences were public. They've been closed for at least the past 10 years, and during that time, pork-barrel earmarks have increased tenfold. It's not impossible that this arcane little adjustment will restore bipartisan compromise to its honored place as the essential act in a working democracy, and restore pork to its sordid, if greasily necessary, corner of the legislative dance. "We may actually have to work on Saturdays," Reid said, in a reference to the bankers' hours kept by the Republican Congress. "And I want to be clear, bipartisanship doesn't mean hugs and kisses. It's not going to be touch football; it's going to be a free-for-all. We're going to come out of that chamber covered in mud and with plenty of bruises, but that's the only way to get anything accomplished."

After a dark congressional session dominated by such pressing topics as the fate of Terri Schiavo, flag-burning and gay-marriage amendments--and the refusal to seriously address health care, energy independence, immigration or the war in Iraq--Reid's modest promise that his Senators will have some mud on the outside of their boots is realistic ... and also kind of exhilarating.

What Voters Really Want (USNEWS)

By Mortimer B. Zuckerman

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

It was, as President Bush put it, a "thumpin'" defeat. The verdict of the American people may be neatly summarized in Oliver Cromwell's lordly dismissal of the rump Parliament: "Depart, and let us have done with you!" Or in the blunt vernacular of the bleacher faithful: "Throw the bums out!"

The votes and the polls reflect an abiding disquiet. Roughly two thirds of Americans feel the country is on the wrong track, only about 35 percent approve of the president's performance, and an anemic 16 percent approve of the performance of Congress. And they're being charitable! It isn't that the rout of the Republicans represents strong support for the Democratic Party. Most Americans would probably describe the choice between the two parties as "the evil of two lessers." Congress failed in its duty to oversee the conduct of the war; it failed in its oversight of government spending; it failed to create an energy policy; its ethics scandals were outrageous. And the Republicans failed their own principles of financial integrity, turning a fiscal surplus of over $230 billion, which George Bush inherited, into a huge deficit albatross.

And let's not forget what some of this excessive spending was all about-political pork. The Washington term for this disgrace is "earmarks"—a better expression might be "pawmarks," for the device that allows politicians to lay their paws on taxpayers' money and spend it on back-home projects like bridges and bicycle paths without going through the normal vetting process. Remember Alaska's infamous $223 million "bridge to nowhere"? The number of "pawmarks" has shot up 10-fold since the Republicans took control of the House in 1994, ballooning from 1,439 to over 14,000 last year.

Lightning rod. All legal, no doubt, but then we have endured illegal sleaze, too: corruption symbolized by Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist, and Randy "Duke" Cunningham, the California congressman now doing federal time after drawing up a menu of bribes for Pentagon contracts approved by his committee. On top of this pile of manure, we have also had a conga line of Republican members of Congress pushing laws favorable to specific corporations and industries, then becoming high-priced lobbyists for their paymasters.

DOJ_NMG_0092787

Revolting as it all was, nothing hurt the Republicans more than the mess in Iraq. The possibility of success there was allowed to slip away through a fatal combination of arrogance and incompetence. Iraq, with its tortured history, was never going to be easy, but after 3 ½ years, with dozens of our troops dying each month and the nightly images of utter chaos on the evening news, is it any wonder voters are fed up? The resignation of Donald Rumsfeld was thus inescapable. He had become a lightning rod, despite the fact that he had a lengthy record as a brilliant manager. Somehow or other, he got Iraq wrong and had to pay the price.

Competence has long been a Republican virtue. But it is downright incompetence that so staggered the public-incompetence and cronyism revealed by Hurricane Katrina, the nomination of Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court, the half-measures on immigration reform, the scramble to undo the handover of a half-dozen U.S. ports to an Arab-owned company. Perhaps all this might be explained by an administration so wedded to its neoconservative agenda that it treated deviation as heresy and was thus unable to adjust to the changing realities in Iraq. The Republican majority in Congress decided to govern from its base and conducted itself in the most shamelessly partisan way—just at a time when most Americans were seeking bipartisanship and pragmatism. Even now, such behavior may be unlikely, given that we are already in the first week of the next presidential campaign and congressional election.

How The West Is Being Won (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - Jon Tester's farm isn't in the duded-up part of Montana, where hedge-fund managers go fly-fishing. It's in a north-central plain, where his Swedish ancestors settled in 1916. Until seven years ago, Tester's bio read: organic dryland farmer, custom butcher and music teacher. Then the power company was deregulated, prices skyrocketed, and he ran for the legislature as a Democrat. Last week he ousted Republican Conrad Burns from the U.S. Senate in a contest that cost $20 million—a number that would impress even a fly-fishing hedge-fund manager. "The West is growing," Tester told me. "It's where the action is."

American politics has always been defined (or imprisoned) by Mason and Dixon, by regional rifts engendered by slavery, the Civil War and the Bible Belt. But now the relevant names are Lewis and Clark. The land west of the Mississippi, especially west of the 100th meridian, is the new swing region—and the place where Democrats hope to win the White House. "It's our 21st-century-majority strategy," said Simon Rosenberg of the New Democratic Network.

The 2006 election highlighted the old paradigm—and the new. The Northeast turned a deeper blue. GOP moderates there are all but extinct; Democratic governors were elected by vast margins. The Republicans' Fortress South, up-armored with evangelicals by George W. Bush and Karl Rove, cracked at the perimeter but largely held. The "intermountain" West, meanwhile, was up for grabs. Democrats won the governorship in Colorado (and now have won five of the region's eight statehouses since 2002). The GOP hung onto the governorship in Nevada and a key Senate seat in Arizona.

The westward trend is clear. For the first time, leaders of the House and Senate are from the Far West. Democrats put Nevada in a crucial early spot in the presidential-selection process, and will hold their convention in Denver. Republican front runners have Western roots (Sen. John McCain from Arizona, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a leader of the Utah-based Mormons). Spanish-speaking Democrats (Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut) can go native.

As Hispanics grow in clout, so does the West, where most of the nation's 43 million Latinos live. In 2004, 44 percent of their voters supported Bush; in 2006, only 30 percent did—driven away by the party's get-tough rhetoric on immigration. The key presidential swing states now: the cluster of Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado and Nevada. The new map means politics could be less party-oriented, says Thomas F. Schaller, author of "Whistling Past Dixie." Westerners aren't "socialized to partisanship," he says. And they are "libertarian" by nature, says Tester. The GOP must hold the faith-based while appealing to the less socially judgmental West; Democrats must avoid the big-government label, anathema to Westerners' self-image. "We have an individualistic attitude," Tester says. "It's 'Leave me alone and let me farm'." That won't be possible for Tester, however. He's heading East, and turning over the farm to his daughter and son-in-law.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

Turns out that the Gang of Three who've held the top job in the Pentagon communications office since President Bush took office have more in common than explaining the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and, at least until last week's surprise flameout, defending Donald Rumsfeld. They cook. Or more specifically, they are Thanksgiving turkey fryers. "It's fun," says Bush's first Pentagon spokeswoman, Torie Clarke. "There must be something about the office," joshes fryer newcomer Dorrance Smith, who succeeded weekend outdoor chef Lawrence Di Rita. Smith tells us he just purchased a deep fryer, picking one from the national Barbeques Galore chain, then E-mailing Di Rita and Clarke for helpful tips on getting started.

DOJ_NMG_0092788

Clarke, a self-described "fryer queen," had lots of them, including (1) Wear goggles. "That stuff could splatter; it could blind you." (2) Fry two smaller birds: It's fast and easier to serve. (3) Demand peanut oil—it cooks better. "Don't go look at the price of peanut oil," Clarke E-mails Smith, "and have a heart attack, and go with something else." And don't coat the bird with seasoning, she says. Smith's done a dry run with a chicken, and all went well, or certainly better than a recent fry at the Clarke home. "One time, we forgot we put the second turkey in," she confesses. On finding it the next day, "it looked like one of those petrified fossils. It looked like it was 10,000 years old."

A Speaker and Her Smack-Down Roots

Outgoing House Speaker Dennis Hastert, the former high school wrestling coach, isn't the only fan of the sport in the House. We hear that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is a buff, though of the more flamboyant TV wrestling. In wooing the youthful World Wrestling Entertainment crowd, she declared herself right before the election to be a huge fan of the first smack-down great, Gorgeous George. See, she was a girl when George Wagner brought showmanship to the sport. And his flair, which was said to influence Liberace and Muhammad Ali, made her a TV fan forever.

Political Ads: From Bad to Worse

Sorry if you hated all those candidate calls at dinnertime during the last two weeks of the midterm elections, but it's only going to get worse in 2008. Both parties plan to invade your computer with instant messages and pop-up ads, and your cellphone and BlackBerry will get zapped with text advertisements. But there is good news. They plan to cut back on TV advertising because it just isn't as effective as the Internet.

The Chairman's Weatherman Trick

One of the big surprises for the Democrats in the elections was winning up to 33 percent of the white Christian evangelical vote. And here's how they did it: Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean says he simply bought every advertising minute available on Christian radio, effectively blocking out the GOP. Ads touted Democratic values. The real secret: "We had the weatherman doing the ads. Why? Because he's a local person who could be trusted."

Where The Republicans Went Astray (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - This is how a revolution ends. Not with a bang, or a "thumping," as President George W. Bush called the 2006 Republican defeat at the polls, but with a misdirected phone call and a certain sinking feeling that even the most well-intentioned politicians can grow weary of rectitude and sell out their principles for the right price.

The scene happened almost 10 years ago, when the GOP revolution in the House of Representatives was still fresh, less than three years after Newt Gingrich and his promise of a Republican "Contract With America" had swept aside four decades of Democratic rule in the House. The House in that summer of 1997 was considering passage of its annual transportation bill, routinely a fat pork sausage of legislation, larded with goodies—bridges, tunnels, exit ramps, highway extensions—for individual congressmen to take home to their districts. A band of a dozen true believers from the Class of '94, the congressmen first elected under the Gingrich banner of reform, was meeting in a small room off the floor of the House. They were trying to plot some way to slow down or stop the pork-stuffed bill—to show that the GOP was still true to its campaign promises to cut profligate government spending.

The phone rang. According to one of the congressmen in the room, Joe Scarborough, another congressman—Steve Largent, a former NFL wide receiver and one of the leaders of the group—picked up the receiver and absentmindedly mumbled, "Yeah." At the other end of the line, Largent heard the voice of Elmer G. (Bud) Shuster, the all-powerful, all-beneficent chairman of the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure. Shuster, an unabashed practitioner of old-style politics, was notorious in the House for rounding up votes by dispensing highway projects to pliable congressman. Shuster apparently did not recognize Largent's voice over the phone. The chairman thought he had instead reached a different congressman—who shall remain nameless in this retelling, but who was well known at the time, a stalwart figure who often spoke of "standing up against the Man." Dictating quickly at the other end of the line, Bud Shuster was in a hurry—like Santa Claus on Christmas Eve, he had a lot of deliveries to make. Without pausing for pleasantries, he ticked off five highway projects worth $70 million, the reward to the supposedly high-minded congressman for swallowing his scruples—just this once!—and voting for the 1997 transportation bill. Package delivered, Shuster hung up.

DOJ_NMG_0092789

Largent, the ringleader of the plotters, put down the phone and tried not to show his disappointment that one of their fellow do-gooders had apparently given in to temptation. Instead, as Scarborough recalls the story, Largent sardonically announced, "Well, I don't think [Congressman X] is going to be with us this time." The others in the room dryly laughed, but it was a demoralizing moment, recalls Scarborough. "You get beaten down," says the MSNBC talk-show host. (Contacted by NEWSWEEK, Largent, who suffered a stroke this year, said he could not recall the phone call; Shuster could not be reached for comment.) Scarborough told NEWSWEEK that it became a "running joke" for members of the Class of '94 to say to each other, "Well, there goes the revolution," every time one of their Contract With America reforms—like imposing term limits on members of Congress—was abandoned by lawmakers intoxicated with power.

Was the fall of the Republican revolution as predictable as the fall of man? Did the GOP revolutionaries, like so many revolutionaries before them, have to become the very thing they had once vowed to change? Gingrich, the former House Speaker, who stepped down in late 1998 before he could be pushed out, blames his successors for taking the low road to disaster. With his fondness for alliterative lists, Gingrich cites four areas where the Republicans fell short or went astray: "Candor, competence, corruption and consultants." He specifically blames former majority leader Tom DeLay, who effectively replaced Gingrich as the GOP leader in the House from 1999 through 2005. In Gingrich's judgment, DeLay, as well as other Republican leaders, threw away the power of ideas in their narrow focus on self-preservation. "When an institution develops 'the Hammer' as a model, that's not the most intellectual form of leadership," says Gingrich, alluding to DeLay's nickname, earned for his skill at enforcing party loyalty in the handing out of favors to lobbyists and influence peddlers. (DeLay did not respond to NEWSWEEK's requests for comment.)

But Gingrich deserves some of the blame himself for providing a grandiose and ultimately weak model of leadership. The story of the rise and fall of the Republican revolution in the Houseof Representatives is a timeless story of vanity and hubris—and a cautionary tale for incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi and the new Democratic leaders, who would like to inaugurate another long periodof their party's rule.

The Republican revolution hardly started with Gingrich. The seeds were planted by the GOP's failed but visionary 1964 presidential candidate, Barry Goldwater, and conservative prophet William F. Buckley; the Reagan landslide of 1980 brought the movement to power in the White House and the Senate, which the GOP held until 1986.

The House, however, long seemed a lost cause; it had not been in GOP hands since the first two years of Eisenhower's presidency. It was Gingrich who first saw a way to exploit growing public dissatisfaction with the old Democratic barons of big government in the House, Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill of Massachusetts and his successor, Jim Wright of Texas. Gingrich, then an obscure Republican backbencher (O'Neill referred to him as a "stooge," as in the Three Stooges), used a new forum—C-Span—to rail against Democratic corruption. In 1989, somewhat surprisingly, he succeeded in forcing the resignation of Speaker Wright, who was implicated in a scheme to profit off book sales in violation of House rules.

Gingrich had been a bit of a joke even in his own party. The son of a military officer, he seemed to some lawmakers to be a Walter Mitty, a soldier wanna-be who had missed Vietnam (student and family deferments). Gingrich spouted a kind of utopian futurism about the "opportunity society" and handed out tapes so other congressmen could learn, as the accompanying instructions put it, to "talk like Newt." Some congressmen made fun of the tapes. But others listened—and learned. The 1994 congressional campaign was a referendum on big government—Hillary Clinton had launched a massive health-care reform plan that wound up strangled by its own red tape. Gingrich mounted an attack on the "bureaucratic welfare state" that caught the public mood—and shocked the pundits and prognosticators by returning the Republicans with a 26-seat majority in the House.

Suddenly it was Speaker Gingrich. Irrepressible, he launched biting personal attacks on the First Lady, chortling, "We are a happy band of Vikings, who don't mind a fight!" More seriously, he led a campaign that summer to cut federal spending and succeeded in squeezing $50 billion out of the budget before he attacked the hardest nut: Medicare. Gingrich's attempt to trim spending on medical care for the elderly does not seem that extreme—he wanted to restrain the rate of growth from 10 percent a year to 7 percent over seven years. But he immediately ran into a political buzz saw.

Gingrich compared his leadership style to that of Charles de Gaulle, Thomas Edison and Winston Churchill; he likened his legislative gambits to the battle strategies of the Duke of Wellington and Ulysses S. Grant. "Newt couldn't help himself," recalled Dick Armey, then Gingrich's House majority leader. "He was always just as grand as he could be." At first, President Bill Clinton seemed so diminished by the midterm humiliation that he had to argue that he was "still relevant" at a press conference in the spring of 1995. But by summer, after handling the tragic terror attack on the Murrah Building in Oklahoma City with grace, the president was secretly conferring with an old political consultant, Dick Morris, who was reminding his boss that governing was really a "permanent campaign." At Morris's urging, Clinton launched a demagogic but extremely effective advertising campaign accusing the Republicans of trying to "eliminate" Medicare.

In October '95, Clinton held a press conference at which he charged that the Republicans were cutting health care by $200 billion so that they could give the same amount of money back to the wealthy as tax breaks. Joe Scarborough was watching with some fellow freshman from the Class of '94. "I remember we broke out laughing, saying, 'That poor fool'," Scarborough recalled. The joke was on the Republicans. As the budget battle turned into a stalemate later that fall, the government shut down. Clinton blamed the Republicans, darkly warning that Social Security checks would no longer be mailed out. The president repeatedly outfoxed Gingrich. When Gingrich flew on Air Force One to the funeral of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Clinton declined to find and negotiate a budget solution (preferring, instead, to play hearts up front with business tycoon Mort Zuckerman). Gingrich threw a tantrum on their return—and the New York Daily News (owned by Zuckerman) ran a front-page cartoon of Gingrich in diapers (which the Democrats made into a poster and, in a mischievous violation of House rules, stuck on the Speaker's chair). Gingrich ultimately caved in and had to plead with his own hard-liners to reopen the government.

DOJ_NMG_0092790

Clinton continued to outflank Gingrich, effectively stealing much of the Republican platform by being tough on crime and welfare and declaring that the era of big government was over. Worn down, Gingrich privately confessed, "I'm not a natural leader. I'm a natural intellectual gadfly." Even after Clinton was consumed by the Monica Lewinsky scandal in 1998, Gingrich was unable to lead; his own troops were already plotting to purge him.

Gingrich's resignation after the 1998 election (the Republicans lost five seats) brought on an interlude that could only be described as comic opera. At the height of the Clinton impeachment proceedings, the new House Speaker-designate, Rep. Robert Livingston of Louisiana, resigned after the publisher of Hustler magazine, Larry Flynt, placed an ad in The Washington Post offering up to a million dollars for information about sexual indiscretions by D.C. officials. After a story broke in the press, Livingston admitted to extramarital affairs in a dramatic speech on the floor of the House. Livingston did not run for Speaker and resigned his seat.

Stunned Republicans chose a blandly amiable former high-school wrestling coach, Dennis Hastert, as their next Speaker. But the real power belonged to DeLay, who rose from whip to majority leader in 2003. A former Houston pest exterminator and archfoe of the Environmental Protection Agency, DeLay gave off a cold, hard look that was the polar opposite of sunny Reaganism. He delighted in his "Hammer" nickname. From the beginning of Gingrich's tenure, the GOP's K Street offensive had warned lobbying firms along Washington's K Street corridor that they would be wise to hire Republicans if they wanted access. There was nothing especially new about such a partisan approach to the influence-peddling business. The Republicans had only to look across the aisle to study a past master at shaking the corporate tree—former representative Tony Coelho, the onetime chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. But DeLay brought a new brazenness to the game. Before long, lobbyists could be seen in committee rooms writing legislation. With corporate coziness came the abandonment of fiscal restraint. Committee chairmen now routinely handed out "earmarks," special provisions authorizing spending for members' pet projects. In 1987, President Ronald Reagan vetoed a highway bill because it had 152 earmarks. In 2005, President Bush signed a transportation bill with 6,371 earmarks.

The nadir of the delay era may have come in the early-morning hours of Nov. 23, 2003. The Republicans, who had once tried to cut back entitlement programs, were now voting to create a whole new one—a bill to provide prescription-drug benefits for the elderly. Normally, House members have 15 minutes to cast their votes. Instead, DeLay & Co. kept the voting open for three hours—until 6 a.m.—while they persuaded old-fashioned fiscal conservatives to abandon their scruples. The exact nature of the inducements has never been clear, but Rep. Nick Smith charged that "bribes and special deals were offered to convince members to vote yes." (For Smith's vote, the leaders allegedly offered financial and political support for the congressional race of Smith's son.) The House ethics committee, effectively neutered in recent years, gave DeLay a wrist-slap reprimand. DeLay accepted the committee's "guidance," adding that he "would never knowingly violate the rules."

The House took on a Darwinian feel. It was every man for himself as staffers and even lawmakers cashed in to become lobbyists. The number of registered lobbyists in Washington nearly doubled, to 37,000, between 2000 and 2006. About half of the 200-odd congressmen who left their seats after 1998 stayed in Washington to become lobbyists or consultants. They would use their privileges as retired congressmen to lobby in the House gym and even on the House floor.

It was perhaps inevitable that the culture of sleaze on Capitol Hill would produce a Jack Abramoff. With his two downtown restaurants and his skybox at the sports arena, Abramoff was a popular host to congressmen and staffers. He was positively gleeful about bilking his clients, ultimately liberating several Indian tribes of $82 million in fees. "I wish those moronic Tiguas were smarter in their political contributions," Abramoff e-mailed Ralph Reed, his friend and the former head of the Christian Coalition. "I'd love us to get our mitts on that moolah!" When Abramoff finally pleaded guilty to fraud, he effectively took DeLay down with him. Several of DeLay's former staffers were caught up in the Abramoff scandal. DeLay was not charged with any wrongdoing, but he was embarrassed by an all-expenses-paid golfing trip to Scotland with Abramoff. Under indictment for campaign-money laundering in Texas in a weak but nagging case brought by a local prosecutor, DeLay gave up his seat in June. (He has pleaded not guilty; the case has not gone to trial.)

Hastert was never able to exercise the same iron control as DeLay. Nor was DeLay's successor as majority leader, John Boehner, able to bring real discipline to fractious House members who looked out primarily for their own political interests. The religious evangelicals became more demanding of the Republican leadership on Capitol Hill, leading to the deeply unpopular spectacle of the Terri Schiavo case. Last year Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, eager to court religious conservatives for a possible presidential run, and the House leadership, sensitive to the religious right, intervened to try to keep the patient alive on a feeding tube, a questionable use of federal power, especially for a party that once stood for less government interference.

DOJ_NMG_0092791

The GOP's evangelical base was shocked and demoralized this fall when Rep. Mark Foley of Florida was exposed for having sent salacious messages to congressional pages. House leaders blamed each other for not responding to warnings that Foley was a possible sexual predator. In early October, when Hastert was compelled to hold a press conference to announce that he would not step down as Speaker, it was clear that the GOP revolution was in its late Jacobin phase.

Even so, the Republicans might have kept control of Congress had it not been for GOP overreaching on a different front—Iraq. In some ways, the hubris of Gingrich and DeLay was minor compared with the willful risk-taking of President Bush, backed by Vice President Dick Cheney, a former congressman from Wyoming.

History is full of accidents and what-ifs. Cheney was the second-ranking House Republican when he got the call to become secretary of Defense in 1989, at the beginning of the George H.W. Bush administration. (Bush's original nominee to become SecDef, former senator John Tower of Texas, was disqualified by allegations that he was a tippling womanizer.) Had Tower not been blocked from taking office, and Cheney not chosen as his Pentagon replacement, Cheney probably would have stayed in the House—and become Speaker when the Republicans won in 1994. "If Cheney had stayed I never would have gone in the leadership," Gingrich told NEWSWEEK last week. Gingrich rated Cheney as a perhaps less imaginative but more politically shrewd lawmaker than himself. Had Cheney stayed in the House and not become a war-hawk adviser to both Presidents Bush, history might well have taken a different course. We will never know. But we do know this: Democrats who, in the glow of victory, now say that none of this could happen to them ignore the story of the last dozen years at their peril.

Alter: The End Of The Road For U.S. Conservatism (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - The Category 4 political hurricane of 2006 was more than a referendum on an unpopular war and president: it signals the end of the conservative tide that began rising 40 years ago; it's the end of a pernicious six-year experiment in "governing for the base," and in many ways it's a blessing in disguise for George W. Bush, who now has the opportunity to salvage something of his presidency.

Pat Buchanan and I rarely agree, but he rightly points out that the election marked the exhaustion of the movement that Barry Goldwater launched with his 1964 campaign. The intellectual vitality and coherence that once characterized modern conservatism have been shattered. Karl Rove is still arguing that the hot issues of this election—Iraq, corruption, sexual hypocrisy—are only "transitory." He's ignoring deep fissures in his party. Neocons have been discredited and theocons dispirited. Libertarians feel betrayed by big spenders, incompetent interventionists and moralizing busybodies. In the Schiavo case, in which 70 percent of voters thought Washington should have butted out, Republicans drove a wedge through their own ranks. Same with immigration, which pits the free-trade business wing against nativist Lou Dobbsians. Most important, the stitching that was meant to hold the GOP's big tent together contained none of the hope and optimism essential to success in American politics. Fear failed.

It failed among the young (18 to 29), who were evenly divided four years ago, but this time gave the Democrats a 20-point edge. It failed among Hispanics, who favored Democrats by 69 to 30 percent. And it even failed among white soccer moms and office-park dads, who turned the American suburbs an unrecognizable shade of blue. The 49-state GOP landslides of 1972 and 1984 are now distant memories, as onetime bellwether states like California, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and even Ohio trend heavily toward the Democrats. Texas and the Old Confederacy are no competition.

To recover, conservatives plan to return to what they call the "core principles" of small government and lower taxes. But there's a reason they abandoned budget balancing: it's a loser politically. There just aren't many votes in it, and that's why Republicans didn't cut spending. People want the government to deliver for them. Without earmarks—which will now flow to pork-hungry Democrats—and the protection-racket money they got from selling out to lobbyists, Republicans might have lost an additional 20 seats. More than two dozen GOP incumbents won by six points or less and are vulnerable next time.

Their peril has its origins in Bush's highly divisive effort to intensify the conservative movement instead of governing from the center. After the razor-thin 2000 election, he listened to shortsighted advice from pollster Matthew Dowd that "swing" voters were extinct and success lay in turning out "the base." But more than one third of American voters identify themselves as independents, which is a higher percentage than claim a party ID. Smart politicians have always known that the G spot of the American body politic is in the middle.

DOJ_NMG_0092792

So the Conservative Era is over, a cautionary tale for Democrats who might be tempted to impose a liberal one. Bush, who worked well with a Democratic legislature in Texas, must now admit that America is not Dittohead Nation. He is free of the one-party rule that kept him from being pragmatic—the not-so-secret ingredient in every successful presidency. Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill (taxes and Social Security), George H.W. Bush and George Mitchell (the budget) and Bill Clinton and Newt Gingrich (welfare reform) all showed how presidential concessions in a divided government can burnish a president's legacy, and even lead to new wings in his library.

For Bush, there are opportunities for consensus not just on Iraq but on immigration, Social Security reform, energy—and even on tax cuts, which he could shift from the wealthy to the middle class. The near wipeout of moderate Republicans makes it tougher. But the interest of the president in his legacy and the Democratic Congress in putting points on the board are aligned. After all the predictable vetoes and subpoenas and finger-pointing, this alignment has the potential to give Bush new political life—and his party a chance to avoid the grim fate of all extremists in American political history.

Quinn: The Economic Perception Gap (NSWK)

By Jane Bryant Quinn

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - Talk about being in denial. President Bush thought that voters should credit him for a great economy, even if they opposed the war. Just look at the numbers: low unemployment, low inflation, record profits, taxes down, stocks up. But in exit polls, half the voters called the economy "not good" or "poor." Only 31 percent said they were "getting ahead" financially. Someone's not in the loop. Is it the public or the prez?

I'll give you a hint: the answer lies in the election returns. The public declared that they're changing the terms of the debate. True, this country is richer than ever, with people spending more at all income levels. But too many unaddressed problems have been piling up—the Iraq and Afghanistan wars, retirement insecurity, oil dependence, political and corporate corruption, budget deficits, health-care costs and hot issues such as stem-cell research. Nobody seems to know what to do.

Creeping doubt can turn into a seismic shift in political thinking, says Allen Sinai, chief global economist for Decision Economics. For example, take the perceived failures of the Carter years. They ushered in Ronald Reagan, whose antigovernment rhetoric has dominated our choices for the past 25 years. But answers don't seem to lie in that direction anymore. "Another great political wave may be building up, and once it rolls out it doesn't quickly get reversed," Sinai says.

The new wave—the one the public sees but Bush does not—is a pervasive feeling of permanent insecurity, says Yale political scientist Jacob Hacker, author of the new book "The Great Risk Shift." By "risk shift," he means that employers and governments have left us more on our own, to fund our health care and retirement plan. Bush's ownership society doesn't look good if you're on the street at 61 and need a Starbucks job for health insurance.

At the top, the "working rich" are doing stupendously well. In 2004, the wealthiest 1 percent of households (with incomes higher than $315,000) copped 53 percent of all the year's income gains. Americans usually don't care how much other people get as long as they're doing OK themselves. But lately, they haven't been. Median incomes for households with people of working age (65 or less) fell last year for the fifth year in a row. Adjusted for inflation, these families are bringing in $3,000 less, the Economic Policy Institute reports. When the president tells them they're fine, he sounds out of touch.

One statistic, however—the slowdown in job growth—may not be as bad as it sounds. The reason could be partly demographic rather than a sign of economic weakness. Baby boomers will be leaving the work force in rising numbers. The working-age generation behind them is comparatively small. Teenagers are staying longer in school. So collectively, there's less growth in the number of people to employ, according to a study by the Federal Reserve System. That should be good for earnings, over time. Employers will have to pay scarce workers more, and the work force will have higher levels of bankable education.

In Washington, the political parties will be sharpening their agendas for the wide-open '08 presidential race. The Republicans have one last chance to show they can fix things, after all. Otherwise, voters will bring in new top management. If there's indeed a longer-term shift in public-policy thinking, here's how the economic priorities will shake out:

The minimum wage. It's expected to rise from $5.15 an hour to $7.25—not a stretch, for the country as a whole. In 22 states and the District of Columbia, the wage is already higher than that; six more states authorized increases at the ballot box this year. That fits with similar data developed by Princeton political scientist Larry Bartels. He's shown that income growth, for the middle class and poor, rises substantially more under Dem presidents than under Republicans (the rich fare about the same, either way).

Taxes. The superrich lost their chance to abolish the estate tax on money left to heirs. Dems will almost certainly want to renew Bush's middle-class tax breaks, such as tuition credits. But the wealthy will find themselves in the cross hairs.

DOJ_NMG_0092793

Social issues. Universal health insurance will be back on the table. Congress will target the high cost of prescription drugs. You'll see tax-favored savings programs for the average guy, not just for the person who can afford to put large sums away. Social Security has to be fixed. Money will be shaken out of the Pentagon's budget, assuming a pullback in Iraq.

The new regime won't be cooking anyone a free lunch. But in concept, it believes that government can help. Dems lean toward economic security, not go-it-alone. Can they do it? We're going to see.

Steele Interested In Heading RNC (AP-Y)

By Brian Witte, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 13, 2006

Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, who lost his race for a Senate seat, expressed interest Sunday in becoming chairman of the Republican National Committee.

"I have not had any conversations directly with the White House yet on this," Steele told C-SPAN.

Ken Mehlman, the current chairman, is stepping down when his two-year term ends in January. Mehlman made a point of emphasizing outreach to black voters and helped recruit Steele for the Maryland race.

Steele, who lost to Democratic Rep. Benjamin Cardin by a margin of 55 percent to 44 percent of the vote, said he believed it was time for the GOP to rethink its views in wake of losing both chambers of Congress in last week's midterm elections, which he described as a "tsunami." Steele said the electorate "was very clear."

"They expected the administration and the party to step up and speak to particular issues and, failing that, there would be heck to pay — and we paid," Steele said.

Steele said he wasn't sure when an announcement would be made on who will be the new committee chair.

Steele was head of the Maryland Republican Party before being elected lieutenant governor in 2002 as the first black candidate elected statewide in Maryland. His term as lieutenant governor will end in January.

Steele also explained why he largely avoided mentioning his party affiliation while campaigning. In a state where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-1, Steele said it was obvious what party he belonged to and there was no need to "rub it in your face."

"In a state like Maryland, there was an opportunity to move away from the labels and really try to dig beyond, you know, being a Republican or Democrat, red state or blue state," Steele said. "In fact, that's what people are sick of. I think we saw the results on Tuesday just how sick they are."

Two Democrats Struggle As Georgia Bucks A Trend (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

MACON, Ga., Nov. 10 — Politically speaking, Georgia proved to be a mirror image of the rest of the country in the midterm elections. Republicans swept nearly every statewide office, and turnout among Democrats was low, thanks to a lackluster candidate for governor.

But two Democratic congressmen in highly competitive races in the state seem to have successfully fought those odds, though they are hanging on by the slenderest of margins and are still waiting for their opponents to concede.

The two Democrats, Jim Marshall of Macon, in the Eighth Congressional District, and John Barrow of Savannah, in the 12th District, were on the Republican Party's short list of beatable incumbents. Their adjoining districts, which encompass large rural areas, were redrawn by a Republican legislature, their opponents were former congressmen, and the National Republican Congressional Committee poured hundreds of thousands of dollars into the races. President Bush campaigned in each district twice.

"It is a year that if you look at Georgia compared to the rest of the nation, there's a real counterprevailing trend," said J. Christopher Grant, a political science professor at Mercer University in Macon, "and it is actually amazing that these folks were able to hang on." Mr. Marshall squeaked by with a lead of 2,040 votes in a district on the home turf of two of Georgia's most prominent Republicans, Gov. Sonny Perdue and Senator Saxby Chambliss.

Mr. Barrow, whose race was so close it is one of eight in the House that have not been called by The Associated Press, led by 963 votes. (The other seven races involve Republican incumbents.) The results have not been certified, and a spokesman for Mr. Barrow's opponent, Max Burns, said enough ballots remained uncounted that he could pull ahead. If Mr. Barrow should lose, he would be the only Congressional Democrat ousted by a Republican this year.

As the state's only white Democrats in Congress, both men relied on incumbency and their relatively conservative records, while also focusing on getting voters, especially blacks, to the polls. Mr. Marshall doubled the amount of money he planned to spend, to nearly $2 million. Mr. Barrow's campaign emphasized his independence, portraying him as willing to break with the Democratic party line.

DOJ_NMG_0092794

Erick Erickson, a Republican political consultant, lawyer and blogger in Macon, said Mr. Barrow had been more vulnerable than Mr. Marshall. Mr. Barrow is a freshman whose liberal base in Athens was shifted away in the redistricting. Mr. Marshall, a former mayor of Macon, is in his second term and was familiar to his new constituents because they were in the Macon media market and therefore had frequently seen him on television. While the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spent more than $500,000 to help retain Mr. Barrow's seat, it spent less than $100,000 in Mr. Marshall's race.

While an outsider looking at raw numbers would probably assume that Mr. Marshall could be picked off, said Mr. Erickson, the chief executive of the Redstate blog, "if you actually know something about the district, you come to the conclusion that he would be hard to beat."

Mr. Marshall is popular and moderate, and several voters interviewed mentioned his constituent services and accessibility. He is a Vietnam veteran who has repeatedly visited the troops in Iraq and courted the large military presence in the district, and, Mr. Grant said, votes the way his constituents would want him to even if his personal views are more liberal.

But the Marshall race turned out to be no less competitive. "When Bush came back the second time, that was a signal to me that they had tracking numbers that were showing the gap closing," said State Senator Robert Brown, a Macon Democrat who led a get-out-the-vote drive that focused on blacks who voted infrequently.

In both districts, Republicans tried to link the incumbents with controversial figures like Representative Cynthia A. McKinney, a Democrat who lost in the August primary, and paint them as likely to raise taxes and grant amnesty to illegal immigrants. At the same time, the incumbents were hamstrung, unable to bring in Democrats with national name recognition because of their unpopularity in a part of the country where President Bush is well liked.

The National Republican Congressional Committee spent more than a half-million dollars in each race, and the Economic Freedom Fund, an independent group financed by Bob J. Perry, the Texas homebuilder who bankrolled the Swift boat veterans' attacks against Senator John Kerry in the 2004 presidential campaign, bought advertising as well. Mr. Marshall's campaign estimated that he was the target of more negative advertisements than any other candidate in the country.

"The principal thing is that voters in middle Georgia and south Georgia have a pretty clear perception of who I am and what I stand for," Mr. Marshall said over breakfast at Nu-Way Wieners in Macon on Friday. "And that perception wasn't undone, at least not altogether undone, by the campaign of my opponents."

But, he said, his Republican challenger, Mac Collins, "had a staff that was willing to say virtually anything, utterly untroubled by fact and truth, a total end-justifies-the-means mentality."

A spokesman for Mr. Collins, Bill Hagan, said the campaign would not comment until the results were certified.

At Jeneane's Cafe in Macon, two Republican women neatly illustrated the nuances voters sifted through on their way to the polls.

One, Sally McLemore, ticked off a list of Mr. Marshall's good deeds: support for Robins Air Force Base, farmers and rural health care. But, Ms. McLemore said, she voted for Mr. Collins.

"I was thinking national level, and we're clearly in a crisis and we need to stick with the Republicans," she said. "I don't want to see Nancy Pelosi as speaker of the House; I think it's dangerous."

She added that she was happy Mr. Marshall was a conservative Democrat. "Now that it's all over and done with, I'm delighted he's there because I think he's a voice of wisdom."

The reasoning of Ms. McLemore's friend, Peggy Steele, ran the other direction. She voted for Mr. Marshall. "I was counting on the other Republicans to worry about the national," Ms. Steele said, "and I was worrying about the local."

But other voters said the national climate had worked in Mr. Marshall's favor. At the Fresh Air Bar-B-Que in Butts County, in the new part of the Eighth District, the owner, George Barber, supported Mr. Collins, who grew up down the road.

"Politics is certainly a fickle thing," said Mr. Barber, who owns the business with his brother. "Had it been two weeks earlier or two weeks later, it might have had a different outcome."

Fresh Off The Farm In Montana, A Senator-to-Be (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

GREAT FALLS, Mont., Nov. 9 — When he joins the United States Senate in January, big Jon Tester — who is just under 300 pounds in his boots — will most likely be the only person in the world's most exclusive club who knows how to butcher a cow or grease a combine.

All his life, Mr. Tester, 50, has lived no more than two hours from his farm, an infinity of flat on the windswept expanse of north-central Montana, hard by the Rocky Boy's Indian Reservation.

DOJ_NMG_0092795

For all the talk about the new Democrats swept into office on Tuesday, the senator-elect from Montana truly is your grandfather's Democrat — a pro-gun, anti-big-business prairie pragmatist whose life is defined by the treeless patch of hard Montana dirt that has been in the family since 1916.

It is a place with 105-degree summer days and winter chills of 30 below zero, where his grandparents are buried, where his two children learned to grow crops in a dry land entirely dependent on rainfall, and where, he says, he earned barely $20,000 a year farming over the last decade.

"It's always been tight, trying to make a living on that farm," said Mr. Tester, still looking dazed and bloodshot-eyed after defeating Senator Conrad Burns, a three-term incumbent, by fewer than 3,000 votes.

Chouteau County, where Mr. Tester lives on a homestead of 1,800 acres, lost 8.5 percent of its population in the last five years — typical of much of rural America that has been in decline since the Dust Bowl.

To make extra money, Mr. Tester taught music to schoolchildren, and still plays a decent trumpet despite having only seven fingers (he lost the rest to a meat grinder as a child). He got into politics just eight years ago in a sustained rage over what utility deregulation had done to small farmers and businesses in Montana.

"You think of the Senate as a millionaire's club — well, Jon is going to be the blue-collar guy who brings an old-fashioned, Jeffersonian ideal about being tied to the land," said Steve Doherty, a friend of Mr. Tester's for 20 years. "He's a small farmer from the homestead. That's absolutely who he is. That place defines him."

Mr. Tester used to ride his motorcycle down from the farm to Great Falls to play softball with Mr. Doherty. He played third base, not an easy position for a man with a shortage of digits. They were colleagues later in the State Senate, of which Mr. Tester was the president this year. It is a part-time job, with the Legislature holding regular sessions of 90 days only every other year.

Congress has done little to improve the lives of people living in the dying towns across rural America, Mr. Doherty said.

"When Jon talks about the cafe that's trying to hold on, the hardware store that just closed, the third generation that can't make a living on the farm, he is living that life," Mr. Doherty said.

Still, there was never a master plan, Mr. Tester said, for the arc that took him from soil conservation district leader to state senator to one of the victors who gave Democrats control of the Senate.

"I'm kind of a fatalist," he said, breaking into a smile. "The good Lord gives you opportunities."

And Mr. Tester learned quickly how to exploit those opportunities, running a bare-knuckle campaign against Mr. Burns, with a barrage of name-calling and negative advertisements making hay of the senator's ties to Jack Abramoff, the disgraced former Washington lobbyist.

Republicans complained that Mr. Tester's campaign was relentless and went overboard. Montana is a big state with a small population, where politicians are known on a first-name basis. The ferocity of such attacks seemed out of place, some here said.

Also, they said Mr. Tester favored measures while in the State Senate that had the effect of raising taxes on many of the small businesses that he promotes. They called him "Taxer Tester" for much of election year.

But with his trademark flattop — refreshed every three weeks for $8 at the Riverview barber shop here in Great Falls — Mr. Tester was a tough target for Republicans to stereotype as "just another Washington insider," as one radio attack ad put it.

Republicans have kept their hold on the intermountain West in part by promoting issues known as the three G's: gays, guns and God.

On gays, Mr. Tester says the "sacred document" of the Constitution should not be amended to outlaw same-sex marriage, though he favored a state ban that voters passed in 2004. On guns, Mr. Tester is quite proficient in their use, and says anyone — Republican or Democrat — who tries to take his away will run into trouble. On God, Mr. Tester says simply that he is a churchgoer, and notes that he met his wife when he spotted her in a pew.

"The fact is, I'm just a regular Montanan," he said. "Those issues are important, but what I heard from people is concern about health care, fiscal responsibility and how we're throwing so much money into a war."

Mr. Tester and his wife of 28 years, Sharla, grow organic lentils, barley, peas and gluten-free grain in a county with 1.5 people per square mile. It is all earth and sky on the Tester family ground. A hundred years ago, a region with so few people was considered frontier.

Mr. Tester is very much in the mode of his longtime friend Gov. Brian Schweitzer, a Democrat who can be more prickly than Mr. Tester. The governor recalled a favorite moment with Mr. Tester from the last legislative session.

"We're sitting there in this room where governors and powerful people used to drink whiskey and smoke cigars, me and Jon, and both of us had a bag of sunflower seeds — Russian peanuts we call them — trying to spit the shells into a cup," Mr. Schweitzer said. "We looked at each other and laughed, like, What are we doing here?"

DOJ_NMG_0092796

Republicans said that Mr. Tester was a favorite of “extreme liberal bloggers” and that the down-home persona masked an agenda out of step with much of America.

And indeed, the liberal Web site Daily Kos took up Mr. Tester’s cause early. When he announced he was running for the Senate, he was an underdog to a better-financed and better-known Democrat who was being promoted by the party establishment.

After Mr. Tester won the primary by a huge margin, Daily Kos posted a picture of him on its site, with the caption, “Say hello to the next senator from the great state of Montana.”

Mr. Tester is also a favorite of the band Pearl Jam, which promotes many liberal causes. But his tie is personal. The area around the town of Big Sandy, population 658 and falling, produced not only Mr. Tester, but also Jeff Ament, the bassist for Pearl Jam. The band did a concert in Missoula this year for Mr. Tester.

On the campaign trail, Mr. Tester spoke often of how “regular folks” just “haven’t been given much of a shake.” He is distrustful of global trade agreements that have hurt farmers, and big drug companies and health maintenance organizations that he says have put medical costs out of reach for many people.

Asked why he became a Democrat in a region that has been overwhelmingly Republican for the last generation, Mr. Tester said: “It started with my parents, who always said the Democrats work for the middle class. And in agriculture, Franklin Roosevelt did a lot of good things.”

Friends say not to worry about Mr. Tester going native in Washington. He said he planned to return home to the farm several times a month. He promised his barber, Bill Graves, that he would continue to come back to get his hair cut in the same wheat-field bristle.

“I haven’t noticed a change yet,” Mr. Graves said. “He’s the same man. Got a real dry sense of humor. We talk about everything. And then he says, ‘See you next time.’ ”

How Many Wins Make Up A 'Wave'? (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

There is no doubt that Democrats did well on Tuesday, capturing almost 30 seats in the House, six seats in the Senate and control of both chambers. But was it the Democratic "wave" that so many had believed was about to sweep the country?

Republican leaders said it was not. Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), who led the GOP's House campaign committee, said it was simply "a matter of history repeating itself." On the day of the elections, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman warned of a "six-year itch."

By some measures, the Republicans are right. Since World War II, the party in the White House has tended to lose seats in Congress in the sixth year of an administration, and the average losses matched this year's -- 29 seats in the House and six in the Senate. When there was an unpopular war, the losses were greater.

But political scientists say that assessment of Tuesday's results ignores an important change in recent years. They say Republicans have re-engineered the political map, stuffing congressional districts with supporters to make the districts reliably pro-GOP. The financial and electoral advantages of incumbency, moreover, have reached new heights.

The election results are "actually huge because of the structural advantage Republicans had going into the election. Democrats had very little low-hanging fruit," said Gary C. Jacobson, a scholar of congressional elections at the University of California at San Diego.

Although Democratic gains were substantial, they might not have been the "historic election" of which incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) boasted last week. "It's more than the Republicans claim it is, but it's much too early to say it's equivalent to the huge upheavals we've had in the past," said Walter Dean Burnham, a professor emeritus at the University of Texas.

In five midterm elections since World War II -- in 1946, 1958, 1966, 1974 and 1994 -- the president's party lost more seats in the House than the GOP did this year. The losses in two midterm years were comparable to this year's, while in eight they were smaller. On the Senate side, the president's party lost more seats four times, the same number once and fewer seats 10 times.

The most common comparison to 2006 is 1994, the year of the last "wave" election, when the GOP picked up 55 House seats, nine Senate seats and control of both houses. But political scientists are divided on whether 2006 stacks up to 1994.

Judging by the number of seats gained, 2006 clearly does not, but other figures suggest it does. The average vote received by the Democratic candidate in the nation's 435 congressional districts was 55 percent this year, compared with 51.6 percent for Republicans in 1994, according to Andrew Gelman, a professor at Columbia University.

DOJ_NMG_0092797

What's more, many GOP gains in 1994 came in districts that had been trending Republican for years, especially in the South. In contrast, the Democratic wins last week largely came in districts that had voted for President Bush in 2004. "Democrats had a lot fewer targets than the Republicans [in 1994], but they took a larger share of their victories from the tough districts," Jacobson said.

But John Coleman, a professor at the University of Wisconsin, argues that in influencing the political views of the electorate, the Republicans' victory in 1994 was more dramatic. That year, he said, voters endorsed a clearly defined conservative philosophy embodied in the GOP's "Contract With America."

"That campaign was overtly more ideological in direction," Coleman said. "The Democratic Party didn't really need to make much of an ideological case in 2006. You don't have that sense, going in, of a strong push in some other ideological direction."

Nonpartisan analysts in Washington invoked wave metaphors throughout the campaign. Stuart Rothenberg, author of a political newsletter, predicted a Democratic "wave," and after the election, said, "Of course we had a wave." Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report wrote in her column, "Instead of a wave that wiped out everything in its path, this political storm zig zagged its way across the country."

Lawrence Jacobs, a professor at the University of Minnesota, said Tuesday's outcome offered a new twist on "wave" elections: More than 90 percent of incumbents were reelected, but the election is viewed as a mandate for change.

Asked Jacobs: "How do you talk about an election where there was clearly an important change in who controls the majority and it was a setback for the Republican project, but we see so much continuity from one Congress to the next?"

Midterm Election Leaves Political Landscape Blurry (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Rarely has an election result been delivered with such force and clarity, and still left so many unanswered questions in its wake, as that of the 2006 midterm campaign. What happened is unmistakable. What it may portend is far less obvious, making the 2008 election, which already has begun, potentially the most important in a generation or more in shaping the nation's politics.

Democrats have been quick to claim that 2006 will be remembered as the end of a conservative era. No one doubts that the midterm election was a rejection of President Bush's policies in Iraq and of the Republicans' style of governance. But was it really a rejection of conservatism itself? It will take future elections to prove the Democrats' claim.

What the election was not, in the view of strategists in both parties, was a powerful affirmation of the Democratic Party, despite its takeover of the House and Senate. One post-election survey, conducted for the liberal groups Democracy Corps and the Campaign for America's Future, found that both Republicans and Democrats emerged from the contest with negative images.

"This is not an election where one party went down and the other party went up," said Stan Greenberg, whose firm conducted the survey on election night and the night after. "The story still has to be written on how this period becomes a period for Democratic dominance."

Tuesday's election left American politics in a remarkably fluid state. In just six years, the political discussion has moved from analyzing the reasons for the nation's 50-50 divide, to predictions that the Republicans were close to establishing a durable majority, to questions about whether Tuesday marked a pendulum swing back toward the Democrats.

After years of politics aimed at mobilizing and energizing the bases of their respective parties, Democrats and Republicans are again focused on the electorate's shifting center and its potential to change the balance of power in the country. On Tuesday, Republicans decisively lost independents and moderates, but it is not yet a given that those voters will stay with the Democrats. Which party claims that constituency in the future will depend on the answers to a series of questions that will shape the politics of the next two years.

Foremost among them is which party can gain the public's trust to keep Americans safe in a world of terrorism and rogue-state threats. Exit polls suggest Democrats made significant headway this year in reducing what has been a historic Republican advantage. Whether that is permanent or transitory is of central importance.

Equally important is the question of which party can adequately address the twin problems of keeping the United States competitive in a global economy and restoring the social contract that has helped provide economic security to workers and that has been shattered as a result of the corporate restructuring that globalization has brought about.

A third is which party can best navigate the thicket of social and cultural issues in a way that both preserves a sense of American values and accommodates the need for greater tolerance in a society that has become increasingly diverse.

DOJ_NMG_0092798

Tuesday's election also suggests that the 2008 campaign will be fought on different geographic terrain. Throughout the decade, the political map of America has been relatively fixed, with Democratic blue states along the coasts and in parts of the upper Midwest, and most of the rest of the country a giant swath of Republican red.

That map now may be, if not obsolete, at least open to revision. Traditionally Republican Virginia increasingly looks like a state turning purple -- neither red or blue on election strategy maps. With former governor Mark R. Warner; his successor, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine; and James Webb's surprise victory over Sen. George Allen (R) last week, Democrats have demonstrated that Republicans no longer can take the state for granted.

As significant as the changes in Virginia is the transition underway in Colorado. Democrats scored important gains there on Tuesday, winning the governorship and a House seat and expanding their state legislative majorities. For all the focus on Ohio as the decisive presidential battleground over the last few years, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) would be president today if he had won both Virginia and Colorado.

The electoral map that has emerged from this election shows Republicans in control of the South, Democrats the Northeast. Democrats gained ground in the Midwest, but it remains a vitally important battleground.

Farther west, Rocky Mountain states are becoming the newest areas for competition between the parties. Democrats now control the governors' offices in Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming and Montana, and they have pushed Nevada to the front of their caucus-primary calendar in 2008 in the hope of spurring a shift in their direction there as well.

The Pacific Coast still looks like a Democratic bastion, although California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has shown that a less doctrinaire brand of Republican -- Sen. John McCain or Rudolph W. Giuliani, for example -- could put the nation's most populous state in play.

Republicans reject Democratic claims that Tuesday's results stopped conservatism's rise in its tracks. "This election was a rejection of Republicans," said Whit Ayres, a Republican pollster. "It wasn't an acceptance of Democrats, especially since they provided no recognizable alternative agenda."

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said the party -- as distinct from its core philosophy -- took a beating, but he called it a setback from which the party could emerge much healthier. "Since the ascendancy began, there have been a number of years when we've had setback elections: 1976, 1986, 1992," he said, referring to the rise of conservatism. "We have been stronger in the end because we learned from them."

That was a way of warning Republicans not to dismiss last week's results as an aberration. "If we dismiss this, we give Democrats a huge opportunity," he said. "We need to learn from this and do better."

Simon Rosenberg, who heads the Democratic group NDN, saw the election in fundamentally different terms -- as a marker in which the public rejected conservatism as an alternative governing philosophy to what Democrats had offered in the past. Still, he was not prepared to call it the arrival of a new era of Democratic dominance.

"We're now back at a much more even playing field," he said at a post-election review of the results. "We're entering a whole new period in American history, where neither party or ideology has an advantage."

The midterms will be remembered as a referendum on the Iraq election, and the voters' verdict will push the White House and the Democrats toward agreement on potentially significant changes. Both parties now have an incentive to resolve their differences -- Republicans to remove the single biggest reason for their losses on Tuesday, Democrats to avoid what happened to them during the Vietnam era, when they bore the blame for the unsatisfying way an unpopular war was ended.

The competition for the center of the electorate ultimately will be fought and won in the general election in 2008. But before either party gets to that, they will have to resolve internal differences on Iraq, terrorism, health care, entitlement reform, taxes, trade and a cluster of social issues.

Both the legislative priorities set out by the president and leaders in the 110th Congress and the upcoming presidential primaries will serve as forums for settling some of these questions. That makes the 2008 election more than a contest of big personalities, even though a possible race between Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and McCain (R-Ariz.) already has the cable talk shows in a lather.

Democrats face internal debates over just how populist the party's economic message should be, and on the war in Iraq. Many elected officials favor a reduction in troops but no fixed timeline. But Eli Pariser, who heads the MoveOn.org political action committee, said many Democratic voters want an explicit timeline. "People weren't just vaguely wanting a change on Iraq," he told a post-election conference. "They wanted something specific."

William A. Galston of the Brookings Institution, who served as domestic policy adviser to President Bill Clinton, said Democrats were brought back to power because of protest against Republicans, and now they must show they can govern. "The American people are prepared to watch and listen," he said. "But I think they will be evaluating the performance of the new Democratic majority very carefully."

DOJ_NMG_0092799

Republicans must resolve their own questions: Can they reconstitute conservatism to make it attractive once again beyond the party's base? GOP strategist Mary Matalin said the Reaganite model of low taxes, smaller government and strong defense can again serve the party well, if it is updated. "It needs to put some Britney Spears clothes on it," she said.

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) said the party should ignore moderates' calls to spend money to attract new groups of voters. But the GOP has seen erosion among one group that it has spent years wooing -- Hispanics, who defected apparently over the party's tough stand on illegal immigration, which included passage of legislation for a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"I am concerned about where we stand with Hispanic voters," Mehlman said. "The day we become just the party of the wall, not only won't we secure the borders, but we will substantially limit the growth of the party."

The Democrats' victories last week ended a dozen years of Republican rule in Congress and dealt a significant blow to Bush's presidency. The next two years will answer which party best learned the lessons of what the voters were saying.

The Media's Dark Role (WT)

By Douglas Mackinnon

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Nov. 7, 2006, will be remembered as the day the Democratic Party took back control of Congress for three distinct and critically important reasons.

First and foremost was the series of Republican missteps -- such as corruption, the leadership turning a blind eye to the corruption, budget-busting earmarks and a lack of real action on illegal immigration. These actions not only suppressed the vote for the Republican Party, but actually energized a number of Democratic voters.

Second was the number of incredibly well-run Democratic campaigns and their own very impressive get-out-the-vote machine. This was great stuff by any honest assessment.

Third, Nov. 7 needs to be remembered for something even Republicans don't have the stomach to address at the moment: that the remnants of objectivity in the mainstream media were all but exterminated by some on the left. A chilling and ominous development that played some role in the Democratic wave that is still splashing around the red states.

Make no mistake. Along with the multitude of Republican gaffes, and the hard work of the Democrats, there can be no doubt that the left-of-center mainstream media helped to manufacture this election victory for the Democratic Party. For parts of the last two years, many in the media have worked in concert with the Democratic spin doctors to indoctrinate the American voter into believing this election had to be a referendum on President Bush and the "failed" war in Iraq.

Horrified by Mr. Bush's re-election in 2004, as well as the historic Republican gains in the House and the Senate that year, some liberals in the media were determined to do everything in their power to ensure that there was no GOP celebration in 2006, even if that meant confirming to the world that they proudly abandon professionalism and ethics in the name of partisanship and ideology.

To make the election of 2006 a referendum on Mr. Bush and "his" war, the media knew full well they had to present that conflict in the worst possible light for as long as possible on their nightly newscasts, cable programs and front pages. Then, after force-feeding the American people a steady diet of this carnage for weeks at a time, the same media outlets would then "poll" the voters to get their impressions of Iraq and Mr. Bush.

Amazingly, against the protests of soldiers fighting and dying in Iraq, the mainstream media stuck with this partisan plan to only showcase the negative, the misery and the gore. They ignored the pleas of these soldiers to show that not only did they liberate a nation from a genocidal tyrant, but with compassion and great decency (often at the cost of their own lives), they helped to rebuild the country and connect with its people on a much-needed human level. The good far out-numbers the bad in Iraq, but the good was the enemy of a Democratic victory on Nov. 7.

Worse than becoming a public-relations arm for the Democrats, did some in the media actually aid and abet al Qaeda with their biased coverage? It has been fully documented that al Qaeda and the insurgents believe that if you kill enough American soldiers and have those deaths played on a loop by the American media, then the American people and their politicians will grow weak in the knee and call for a withdrawal.

Knowing that to be a stated goal of al Qaeda, and just before the election, CNN still decided to take a horrific video given to them by the insurgents, and put it on the air for the world to see. And just what was on this video? Only heroic American soldiers being murdered in cold blood by al Qaeda snipers. Other than to damage the administration or advance a partisan agenda, why would CNN air such disgusting footage?

Next, to all but ensure the desired outcome, a number of left-of-center "journalists" decided it was necessary to prematurely crown the Democrats the victors. Their thinking was that if you tell a lie or predetermine the results often enough, it becomes fact. So, months before the election, on the front page of the top one hundred left-of-center newspapers in the United States -- with a readership well north of 70 million people -- banner headlines proclaimed that the Democrats were all but certain to take both houses of Congress. Day after day, week after week, these liberal papers foretold a future beneficial to the Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0092800

This is a future that has now come true. To be sure, the majority of the blame rests with the Republican Party and its lemming-like march to become what it defeated in 1994. That said, it is not partisan, nor out of line, to ask if some in the media carried water for the Democrats in this election.

While it is certainly true that left-of-center media outlets continue to hemorrhage readers and viewers in search of fairness and balance, for the moment they don't seem to care. Because of the unethical actions of some within their industry, they helped determine an election.

The Democrats won, but democracy has paid a price. Who in the media is willing to address that?

Douglas MacKinnon was press secretary to former Sen. Bob Dole. He is also a former White House and Pentagon official.

For Democrats, How Long A Honeymoon? (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

The media kept saying the war was going badly. The Bush administration said progress in Iraq was being obscured by relentlessly negative coverage.

The media kept saying the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina was badly botched. President Bush initially said his administration was doing a heckuva job.

The media kept saying the Democrats were heading for a big win on Election Day. Karl Rove, when told by National Public Radio's Robert Siegel that he was reading the same campaign polls as the White House strategist, declared: "No, you're not. No, you're not. No, you're not. I'm looking at 68 polls a week . . . and I add up to a Republican Senate and Republican House."

The GOP lost control of Capitol Hill last week for a number of reasons, particularly the war (the televised pictures of growing casualties were hard to shake off) and the scandals involving Jack Abramoff, Tom DeLay, Duke Cunningham and Mark Foley (all of which were broken by news organizations). At times it seemed journalists and administration officials were offering two different versions of reality. But in the end the polls accurately forecast the thumping to come.

Now the question is whether a press corps that has been openly at odds with the president will hold the newly empowered Democrats to the same tough standards.

As with any new regime, Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi are enjoying a media honeymoon for the moment -- especially Pelosi, because of her status as the first woman in line to become House speaker and her grandmother-of-five persona. That may not last long. But where will journalists set the performance bar?

If the Democrats don't pass much legislation, or if they craft bills that Bush vetoes, will the press blame them for gridlock? If they start rejecting one Bush nominee after another, will the press say they are obstructionist? If, after railing against Republican corruption, they pass only cosmetic ethics reform, will the press say they were all talk and no action?

When Democratic committee chairmen issue subpoenas and conduct oversight hearings, will news accounts portray them as harassing the White House? Or will journalists recognize that aggressive congressional inquiries were a normal practice until the GOP Congress, which loved to investigate the Clinton White House, essentially stopped scrutinizing the Bush administration? And if Senate Republicans who denounced Democratic filibusters start trying to talk things to death, will journalists call them on the double standard?

While Bush retains the biggest megaphone, Democratic leaders will be getting more television time now that they control the House and Senate. In a media-drenched culture, the sound-bite warfare may prove as important as the legislative maneuvering.

The biggest change may be in store for liberal commentators, radio hosts and bloggers, some of whom enjoyed a good long gloat last week. For years now, they have been on offense against the administration and the war, and taking potshots is plenty of fun, as conservative pundits learned during the height of the Clinton scandals. But now the lefties will have to spend time defending the Democratic leadership for any missteps and failures. And if Reid and Pelosi compromise with their more moderate colleagues, will hard-driving liberal bloggers turn on them?

For much of his tenure, Bush has used the media as a foil, limiting access, criticizing news organizations for disclosing national security secrets, and mocking the "prognosticators" who said the Republicans were headed for defeat. But as his popularity has declined, he has held more news conferences and invited more journalists over for White House chats. If the president can mend fences with his Democratic antagonists, maybe peace with the Fourth Estate is also at hand.Cutting the Chatter

Free speech is getting less frequent on the "CBS Evening News."

DOJ_NMG_0092801

A daily commentary segment that was launched when Katie Couric took over the newscast, "Free Speech" has opened up the program to outside voices but also drawn strong criticism from some network staffers.

Now Couric and her executive producer, Rome Hartman, have decided to cut back the feature to somewhere between one and three times a week, in part to make room for more news.

"We had to figure out how it would work and how it wouldn't work, to see what soared and what splatted," Hartman says. "We've learned that timeliness is important," and that it's better to have the commentaries "feel like they're part of the news rather than out of left field."

Among the network's correspondents, he says, "some people felt it was taking up air time that might otherwise go to them, which is understandable. And some people just didn't like the idea of opinion. But a significant number of people felt the other way."

"Free Speech," which has also provided the umbrella for Bob Schieffer's weekly commentary -- the status of which is now unclear -- did not air at all last week.

The segment has provided a precious 90 seconds of the newscast, for example, to a protesting Gallaudet University student and an illegal immigrant identified only as Carlos. When an 89-year-old driver was convicted of killing 10 people in Santa Monica, Calif., CBS gave air time to a physician who was hospitalized for three months after being hit by an elderly driver.

But the segment has also given a forum to those who already have pretty big platforms: Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity, Arianna Huffington, National Public Radio's Juan Williams and Katrina vanden Heuvel, editor of the Nation, along with such prominent politicians as Rudy Giuliani and Sen. Barack Obama.

Hartman says he and Couric are now leaning more toward "regular folks" over "the I'm-famous-and-I-have-something-to-say model."Parting Words

In another change for "CBS Evening News," the program now has to get along without Jim Stewart, who is retiring to Florida.

During his 17 years as a correspondent, it became increasingly difficult to stick to his mission of covering the FBI, CIA and terrorism, Stewart says.

"More and more of my time was spent answering to the whim of the moment, even if it wasn't going to be put on the air, and less time covering my beat," he says. "It was to answer the question in the mind of an executive in a nanosecond about something they saw on a cable channel. Literally 15 times a week, I would get what are called check-it-outs. It would be breaking news on MSNBC that white powder was found on a subway in Chicago, or something like that."

Stewart, 60, is admired in the business for his aggressive style. He says the networks have been hurt by the shrinking number of Washington correspondents and the loss of those specializing in such beats as the State Department, aviation or the environment.

"When you lose beat reporters, you lose depth," he says. "You lose a sense of what you're talking about." With the exception of ABC's disclosure of Rep. Mark Foley's e-mails to congressional pages, he says, "I don't remember a time lately when the networks really broke big news. Certainly there's less expertise available to the networks. We've become generalists, to our detriment."

Stewart had considered retiring earlier, but "the money in broadcast journalism can be very intoxicating and make you almost addicted to sticking around for that one more contract."

Stewart says Katie Couric was indirectly responsible for his 1990 hiring. CBS decided it needed a second reporter at the Pentagon, he says, after NBC tapped Couric as the No. 2 correspondent there.

But he struggled to make the transition from his previous job at Cox Newspapers. "For the first six months I was lost," Stewart says. But he says he became more valuable to the network after Iraq invaded Kuwait, triggering the Persian Gulf War.

"Saddam saved my job," says Stewart.Howzat?

"Poll: Afghans Express Confidence in Country's Direction, Security" -- Thursday's USA Today

"Afghans Losing Faith in Nation's Path, Poll Shows" -- Thursday's New York Times.

McCain Edges Toward '08 Presidential Run (AP-Y)

By Hope Yen

AP, November 13, 2006

Republican Sen. John McCain said Sunday he is taking the initial steps for a White House bid in 2008, setting up a committee that allows a potential candidate to raise money and travel the country to gauge support.

Democratic Sen. Joe Biden reaffirmed his intention to seek his party's nomination, though an announcement about establishing an exploratory committee probably will not come until early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0092802

The anticipated wide-open campaign — for the first time since the 1928 race, the field will not include a sitting president or vice president — lost one possible participant when Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., decided against a long-shot run.

McCain, R-Ariz., said he is moving toward a 2008 bid by "doing things organizationally and legally" but will not make a final decision until early next year.

McCain, considered the front-runner for his party's presidential nomination, said he could create an exploratory committee as early as this week.

"Are we doing the things organizationally and legally that need to be done? Yes," he said. "There are certain things legally you have to comply with in order to continue to raise money and set up an organization."

"The important thing is we will not make a decision until I sit down with my family, but we will be prepared," McCain said.

GOP officials last week said McCain would set up an exploratory committee and has opened a bank account for the committee.

On Sunday, McCain characterized the moves as preliminary until he decides over the holidays about a possible bid. He unsuccessfully sought his party's nomination for president in 2000.

If McCain were to run, he would turn 72 on Aug. 29, 2008, at the height of the campaign. Only Ronald Reagan was older — 73 at the start of his second term. McCain's health also could be an issue because he has had several cancerous lesions removed from his skin.

McCain is a former Navy pilot who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam. He was elected to the Senate in 1986, and served in the House for four years before that.

During the 2006 election cycle, McCain attended 346 events and raising more than $10.5 million on behalf of Republican candidates. He also donated nearly $1.5 million to federal, state and county parties.

The 63-year-old Biden, who is line to take over as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, also ran for president before, dropping from the 1988 race after it became known he had lifted a portion of a speech from a British politician without attribution.

Biden, first elected to the Senate in 1972, said Sunday he would address the issue of an exploratory committee early in 2007. "I still plan on running. I haven't, quite frankly, thought through all of the ... mechanics of it at this point in terms of when to announce setting up an exploratory committee, but I plan on doing that," he said.

One potential challenger he will not have to contend with is Feingold, who said he wanted to focus on his work in the Senate. Feingold, 53, is an outspoken opponent of the Iraq war, the Patriot Act and other Bush administration policies.

"I never got to the point where I felt strongly I wanted to run," Feingold told The Associated Press. "Then I saw the result Tuesday and thought what a great opportunity to do my work in the Senate."

Last week Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack announced his candidacy. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is widely considered the front-runner. Others mentioned include Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 nominee; former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the vice presidential nominee two years ago; Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois, Evan Bayh of Indiana and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Republicans talked about for 2008 are Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney; Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee; Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

GOP Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said last month he is forming an exploratory committee.

McCain To Form Committee To Explore White House Bid (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Sen. John McCain of Arizona said he will form an exploratory committee as the first step toward a possible run for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008.

The action had been widely expected from McCain, who lost a primary bid in 2000 to George W. Bush and who is the most popular prospective candidate for the nomination in 2008.

McCain, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press" yesterday, said that while he won't make a decision until talking with his family over the holidays, "Are we doing the things organizationally and legally that need to be done to prepare for it? Yes." McCain indicated that the formation of an exploratory committee is imminent.

Just five days after midterm elections that returned control of the House and Senate to Democrats, prospective presidential candidates in both parties put down markers about their intentions for 2008. Accelerated primary schedules and fundraising requirements will make it necessary for candidates to start their campaigns in the next few months.

DOJ_NMG_0092803

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on ABC News's "This Week" that "I still plan on running."

Another prospective candidate, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), said he will not run, citing the Democrats' midterm wins. He told supporters in an e-mail that he will decline the "great adventure" of a presidential run because his three-term seniority in the Senate will allow him to "best advance" liberal causes.

The 2008 race is expected to be particularly active because it will be the first time in decades that neither party has an incumbent president or vice president in the race.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack last week became the first to announce his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination. Others who have expressed interest are Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who leads in opinion polls; Barack Obama (Ill.); Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.); Evan Bayh (Ind.) and John F. Kerry (Mass); former senator John Edwards (N.C.) and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson. Another contender, former Virginia governor Mark Warner, announced before the midterm elections that he wouldn't run.

In addition to McCain, prospective Republican candidates include Govs. Mitt Romney (Mass.) and Mike Huckabee (Ark.), Sens. Bill Frist (Tenn.) and Sam Brownback (Kan.), and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Two other possible candidates, Sens. George Allen (Va.) and Rick Santorum (Pa.), lost reelection bids last week.

McCain positioned himself yesterday as a candidate who would restore Republican principles. He said voters decided last week "that we Republicans have lost our way, that we came to Washington to change government, and government changed us: the spending, the ethics, the massive programs such as Medicare prescription drug program, our failure to address their priorities as opposed to our own."

The NBC interviewer, Tim Russert, noted that McCain did 346 campaign events for 2006 Republican candidates. "Did a lot of good, didn't it?" the senator said.

McCain Takes Step Toward 2008 Race (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Sen. John McCain yesterday announced that he will create a presidential exploratory committee, the usual prelude to a formal entrance into the race, and said he would decide during the Christmas holidays whether to officially enter the 2008 White House race.

"I always said I would decide early next year, and I'll sit down over the holidays with my family and make that decision," the Arizona Republican said during an appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press." "Are we doing the things organizationally and legally that need to be done to prepare for it? Yes."

When asked whether he would form an exploratory committee, Mr. McCain said, "I think so."

Mr. McCain also sought to secure his conservative credentials during the appearance, saying he considers himself a conservative in the mold of President Reagan. He also said he thinks Republican losses last week will prove a temporary setback for his party.

"I believe America is still a conservative right-of-center nation, and our message, our Republican message, is best."

Although Mr. McCain is not the favorite prospective candidate of some grass-roots conservatives, some observers think his prospects for securing the Republican presidential nomination have improved since last Tuesday's elections.

Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania were previously considered as contenders for the nomination, but both Republicans lost their re-election campaigns this year. Neither men have officially ruled out a 2008 campaign, but most observers agree that would be difficult to do so coming off the heels of a recent electoral defeat.

The field of prospective 2008 Democrat candidates also continues to shift. Yesterday, Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat, posted a letter to supporters on his campaign Web site announcing that he will not pursue his party's nomination.

"I'm sure a campaign for president would have been a great adventure and helpful in advancing a progressive agenda," Mr. Feingold wrote. "At this time, however, I believe I can best advance that progressive agenda as a senator with significant seniority in the new Senate serving on the Foreign Relations, Intelligence, Judiciary and Budget committees."

Mr. Feingold's decision not to run comes on the heels of popular former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner also deciding to pass on seeking the Democrat's nomination.

As is widely expected, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said he is still planning to run for president.

"I'm going to address that after the first of the year," he said during an appearance yesterday on ABC's "This Week." "I still plan on running. I haven't, quite frankly, thought through all of the, you know, the mechanics of it at this point in terms of when to announce setting up an exploratory committee, but I plan on doing that."

DOJ_NMG_0092804

Mr. Biden last made a run for the White House in 1988 and is considered by many to be one of his party's leading authorities on foreign-policy matters.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, is considered the front-runner for her party's nomination. However, a number of Democrats say they are open to an alternative to Mrs. Clinton because while many polls show her winning the Democrat's nomination, most of those same polls show her trailing against her potential Republican rivals in a general election.

Much speculation lately has focused on first-term Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat. Mr. Obama recently announced that he is considering a White House run.

A recent poll by Rasmussen Reports shows 22 percent of Democrats supporting Mr. Obama in 2008, compared with 29 percent supporting Mrs. Clinton.

"Look, Barack has done an enormous amount for the party," said Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean during an appearance yesterday on "Fox News Sunday."

However, Mr. Dean added, "I don't comment on 2008, because I really do have to be the referee and have to be entirely neutral, and I'm going to continue to be entirely neutral."

And They're Off! (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

CHARLESTON, W.VA.—John McCain gazed longingly at his plate of baked chicken and penne pasta in white sauce but managed to devour only a few morsels before the first stranger arrived. One by one or in small groups, the well-wishers interrupted McCain's lunch with requests to shake his hand or share a snapshot. The silver-haired senator didn't mind. He remains accessible and loquacious, just as he was in his 2000 presidential campaign, in contrast to other candidates at his level, who are walled off by aides and bodyguards. He parlays all this-the likability factor-for all it's worth.

And it's worth quite a lot. "John McCain has made his reputation as a man who is outside the system, a guy who does things differently, who reaches across the aisle to the opposition, and people like that," says a senior Republican strategist. "People like his frankness. They know where he stands. And they think he would be a good guy to have a beer with." And that, in a nutshell, is why McCain is the early leader for the Republican nomination in 2008.

Blunt. The senator from Arizona wasn't hoisting any beers last week after the midterm elections. But he was typically blunt in assessing the Republican disaster. GOP leaders, he said, had departed from core party principles such as less government, lower spending, solid stewardship, and fighting corruption. The Bush administration, he added, had failed to send enough troops to Iraq to begin with and had falsely raised American expectations for a quick victory. Now McCain favors dispatching more troops in the "short term" to help Baghdad's government put down sectarian violence and stabilize the country. And he opposes setting a firm date for U.S. withdrawal, because, he says, that would only cause "chaos in the region" and embolden the terrorists.

Those views on Iraq seem to run counter to the nation's antiwar mood, but McCain has stayed true to his hawkish beliefs. And he has emerged from the midterms in good shape as the GOP front-runner for '08, in the view of many party professionals. For one thing, voters seem more and more attracted to the kind of independence and get-it-done bipartisanship that have been McCain's hallmarks in the Senate. For another, independents turned out in droves last week, and that's a good sign for a man who has always done well with swing voters and the unaffiliated.

"McCain is a formidable candidate," says Joe Lockhart, a Democratic strategist and former White House press secretary for President Bill Clinton. "He's the one guy out there who people don't see as a politician."

Yet McCain has also tried to demonstrate that he is a loyal party man. He attended 346 events and raised $10.5 million for the GOP and the party's candidates for the 2006 midterm cycle. On the eve of the election, in fact, Florida's Republican gubernatorial candidate, Charlie Crist, skipped a scheduled joint appearance with President Bush in Pensacola in favor of appearing with McCain in Jacksonville.

McCain, 70, knows that when there's no incumbent seeking re-election, Republican front-runners have a good chance to win their party's endorsement. Among the early front-runners to win the nomination were George W. Bush in 2000, Bob Dole in 1996, Ronald Reagan in 1980, and Richard Nixon in 1968.

Shaken And Stirred (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, November 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092805

Last week's election didn't just change the lineup in Congress; it also winnowed the Republican presidential field. The big casualties were Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and George Allen of Virginia, two conservatives who lost their bids for re-election-and probably any hope for the White House.

That still leaves plenty of presidential wannabes for '08, led by Arizona Sen. John McCain. But two other men are generating buzz as they jockey for position as the main alternative to the front-runner. First on the list is former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who leads some public-opinion polls. In a recent Gallup survey, 29 percent of Republicans supported him, compared with 24 percent for McCain (everyone else was in single digits). But Giuliani's position is based largely on name recognition and his reputation as a dynamic leader in the aftermath of 9/11. "He is the gold standard for leadership in the war on terrorism," says a key GOP strategist. As such, Giuliani has been a big draw as a fundraiser for GOP candidates.

The former mayor says he is considering a run, but political pros say his popularity could melt away once GOP voters understand his liberal views on issues like gay unions, abortion, and gun control. His abrasive manner can also be a turnoff. "Rudy plays well in the boroughs of New York but not in the Republican heartland," says a GOP critic.

Perhaps the most aggressive behind-the-scenes campaign is being waged by outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a strong conservative with movie-star looks and big-time charisma. Romney is modeling his approach on George W. Bush's pattern from 1999, when Bush, then governor of Texas, invited party leaders to Austin for persuasive get-acquainted sessions. Romney is doing the same thing in Boston and is apparently making a good impression as a fresh-faced Washington outsider who radiates competence and optimism while advocating smaller government. He is also a good listener, which impresses many of his guests, and in the past has appealed to independent voters and some Democrats in Massachusetts.

Drawbacks. Romney's Mormon faith, however, is greeted with suspicion by many evangelical Christians, while his lack of national-security experience could drag him down if the war on terrorism and the conflict in Iraq remain top concerns. Just as important, his popularity back home in Massachusetts has declined, which isn't a good sign.

Among the others who have expressed an interest in running are Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and Gov. George Pataki of New York (both of whom are leaving office), Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Sam Brownback of Kansas, and Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas.

One of the longest of long shots is Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, the gruff chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. Hunter has little national following; in fact, few have heard of him outside Washington and his home district in San Diego. That hasn't stopped him from declaring his candidacy as he attempts to find a niche as a hard-liner on national security and illegal immigration.

In a blast from the past, former House Speaker Newt Gingrich is impressing the GOP faithful as he talks of a need to return to Republican ideals of smaller government, a strong national defense, and tough-minded realism in foreign policy.

But Gingrich was a polarizing figure in Congress, and voters may be more interested in a less divisive style of leadership for 2008. "People are fed up with politics as usual," says a prominent Republican who advises the White House. "They want to see politicians work together. That's one lesson we learned from last week's election."

Time In Senate May Be Irrelevant If Obama Runs (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) might be well advised to stay in the Senate several more years before running for president, as many strategists have suggested. But there are at least 40 reasons to challenge that advice.

That is the number of senators who have tried, and failed, to reach the White House since Sen. John F. Kennedy (D-Mass.) accomplished the feat in 1960. Nearly all of them had more Senate experience than Obama, underscoring the light regard that American voters show for senatorial longevity and expertise in presidential elections.

If Obama's aim is to become a more respected and knowledgeable senator -- in the mold of, say, Robert J. Dole (18 years in the Senate before his 1996 presidential race), Henry "Scoop" Jackson (20 Senate years before his 1972 bid) or Richard G. Lugar (20 Senate years before his 1996 try) -- it may be a laudable goal. But it's a highly questionable presidential strategy.

"The Senate historically has not been a great place from which to run for president," said former senator Bob Graham (D-Fla.), who personally learned the lesson in 2004. "Senator Obama might feel he would be better off to run while he has not been tainted by an excessive period in the Senate."

In the nation's history, only Kennedy and Warren G. Harding have been elected directly from the Senate to the presidency. But the dismal statistics have not dissuaded dozens of senators from trying, including big names (John Glenn, Edward M. Kennedy), largely forgotten names (Larry Pressler, Carol Moseley Braun) and plenty in between.

U.S. voters repeatedly have shown a preference for governors, especially during the 52-year stretch from Grover Cleveland's first election through Franklin D. Roosevelt's fourth, and again in recent years, when seven of the past eight presidential campaigns have been won by former governors. The 2008 presidential race seems certain to focus special scrutiny on why senators with impressive rÃ©sumÃ©s have fared so poorly in White House bids.

DOJ_NMG_0092806

Not only did Obama cause a sensation last month by simply saying he would consider a 2008 campaign, but the early front-runners in both parties are senators: Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.).

Perhaps no governor will emerge from the pack, as Bill Clinton and George W. Bush did, and 2008 will prove the exception to the rule. But scholars of presidential campaigns have their doubts.

"I'm skeptical that a senator can make it," said Barry C. Burden, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin at Madison who has written on the subject. "Just looking at the historical record, the odds are not very good."

Burden said voters generally like the executive experience of governors. Additionally, governors, more than senators, are much more able to set their own agendas, make bold decisions, and avoid complicated legislative debates and votes that opponents can exploit.

"The skills that make a person a good legislator are not the skills that make a person a good presidential candidate," Burden said. "The kind of compromises that make you successful in Congress don't make you successful in a presidential campaign."

Analysts say veteran lawmakers often are prone to legislative jargon and explanations that baffle voters. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) damaged his 2004 presidential campaign when he said of a spending package for the Afghanistan and Iraq wars: "I actually did vote for the $87 billion before I voted against it." Republicans ridiculed the remark, but many people on Capitol Hill understood that Kerry supported the package when it was linked to repeals of tax cuts for the wealthy and that he opposed it when the link was dropped.

As a veteran lawmaker, "you have lots of votes under your belt, which the opposition-research guys can use to twist you into a pretzel," said Scott Reed, Dole's campaign manager for his 1996 bid.

Obama, who is 45 and just two years removed from the Illinois legislature, has a third option that is less viable for McCain and Clinton. He could angle for the vice presidency, a route to the Oval Office for former senators Harry S. Truman, Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon -- but not for Hubert H. Humphrey, Walter F. Mondale, Dan Quayle and Al Gore.

First, however, Obama must sift through the bountiful and conflicting advice of whether to seek the big prize now. Graham, who was Florida's governor before joining the Senate, said: "My advice would be to lay out a plan of action to have him fully ready to be president in 2013. That schedule would just about coincide with what President Kennedy did" -- that is, becoming president after eight years in the Senate.

But Reed thinks 2008 may be the year to break the senatorial jinx, in part because the primary season will be shorter. That should help front-runners such as McCain and Clinton, he said, or perhaps a shooting star such as Obama.

"The old axiom may go out the window this year," Reed said of 2008. "I'd advise Obama that if he has any interest in serving [as president], to take the race. You can't go back in this business and recapture what you had."

Hillary's Dilemma (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

ROCHESTER, N.Y.—If Hillary Rodham Clinton wins the White House, it will be thanks to voters like Barbara Paris. A conservative Democrat who has nonetheless supported Republicans as far back as Ronald Reagan, Paris hated Clinton when she first ran for U.S. Senate from New York in 2000. The 58-year-old tax adviser considered the first lady to be a carpetbagger, and, worse, a political opportunist for sticking with her husband after the Monica Lewinsky affair. So she supported Clinton's Republican opponent.

Last week, though, Paris was one of the New Yorkers who sent Clinton back to Washington with 67 percent of the vote. "It was a long shot, but she's proven herself," Paris said while attending a Clinton speech here just before Election Day. "She's spent lots of time in Rochester." Paris has become such a fan that she begged her daughter to let her take her granddaughter out of school to see Clinton, whom Paris now calls a role model.

Across the Empire State, voter after voter tells a similar story, of deep skepticism toward the former first lady giving way to admiration during her first term. They cite her forays to all corners of the state and her focus on local issues, including staving off closure of the Niagara Falls Air Reserve Station and securing $20 billion after 9/11. But with Clinton now having to decide whether to seek the White House in '08, she faces a familiar dilemma: Can she overcome the nation's entrenched views of her—and her husband—in a presidential campaign? For the presumed Democratic front-runner, the answer is unclear. A Gallup Poll this year found that 17 percent of Americans would definitely back her and that 49 percent would definitely not, but that less than 1 percent had no opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0092807

Converts. To be sure, Clinton has converted plenty of skeptics in the Senate. "Older members had this 'We're going to put her in her place' attitude," says Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. "But she has the power to change minds. Those who stereotype her don't know what they're talking about."

So far, though, Clinton has changed minds by countering that stereotype in person, with audiences much smaller than the national electorate. Having difficulty winning support from women in New York in 2000, she organized informal meetings with groups of a few dozen women, then let the positive reviews spread by word of mouth. Replicating that operation even in the four early primary states—Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire, and South Carolina—would be daunting. And unlike her husband, former President Bill Clinton, Senator Clinton has had trouble winning converts through TV ads and interviews.

Of course, Clinton also has major assets. "She's got a huge fundraising base, a campaign team of die-hard Hillary lovers, and has rock-star status," says a Democratic strategist. "Plus, she's very smart and has been down this [presidential] track a few times." Clinton's money machine, which raked in $38 million for last week's election, has other candidates asking donors to consider them as backups, should Clinton decide not to run.

Flank Stakes (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, November 13, 2006

The returns had just begun to trickle in Tuesday night when former Sen. John Edwards joined a conference call with liberals at MoveOn.org to talk up the prospect of Democrats taking back the White House. "This tsunami starts today and goes through the 2008 election," the 2004 vice presidential nominee said. "We're going to get away from being the country of Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo."

As Edwards was thanking the Democratic base for fueling the congressional takeover, other Democrats with White House ambitions took a different view. "Independent and moderate voters gave us a chance last night, and those are the voters we need in 2008," Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh told U.S. News , noting that three of the Democrats' House pickups had come from his conservative Hoosier State. "I hope our party doesn't get the impression that the country has fallen in love with strident partisan Democrats." As nearly a dozen Democrats start carving their niches for the '08 presidential contests, Edwards and Bayh reflect the two broad flanks now emerging: one to the left of Hillary Rodham Clinton and another in line with her more centrist positioning-but without the baggage she brings.

At this stage, Edwards has some advantages among the liberals. He placed second to John Kerry in the all-important Iowa caucuses in 2004 and still has a loyal network of volunteers there. Edwards may also benefit from the addition of two states to the early primary lineup-his native South Carolina and Nevada, where he has strong ties to unionized hotel and restaurant workers. With last month's news that former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner will sit '08 out, Edwards is the lone southerner in the Democratic field, unless former NATO Commander Wesley Clark runs again. That gives Edwards an air of electability that eludes other liberals.

Kerry, meanwhile, may look more unelectable than ever after his botched Iraq war joke. But he has an unmatched E-mail list of 3 million backers from '04 and has earned loyalty by doling out $14 million to 260 candidates during the midterms. And with the Iraq war likely to be an issue even as 2008's primaries get underway 14 months from now, Kerry could be a hit with liberal primary voters. "The midterms were a referendum on the president's policies in Iraq," says a top Kerry adviser. "It both mobilized the base and brought independents to vote for change."

Money. Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold, who voted against the Iraq war and the Patriot Act, is reminding audiences in Iowa and New Hampshire that both measures passed Congress with Democratic support. "Too many times, Democrats have folded," says Trevor Miller, spokesman for Feingold's political action committee. Unlike the independently wealthy Edwards or Kerry, who can rely on some '04 donors, Feingold is one of the candidates who need a fundraising base, possibly to be found in the liberal online "netroots." Joe Trippi, who managed Howard Dean's '04 campaign and raised $59 million online, predicts that the right candidate can collect almost 10 times that much in '08. "How many people you sign up online and how many small donors you have," he says, "will be a new measure" of viability. Serious contenders will very likely need $40 million by the time of the Iowa caucuses.

Of course, Democratic stars like Al Gore and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama could become the anti-Clinton darlings of the netroots, making them the two biggest x factors. "If you are a possible front-runner, you get in as late as you can because you don't want eight other banshees trying to take you down," says Trippi. "If you're the little-known insurgent, you don't want to wait too long." Gore says he won't run, but Obama says he might. With his bestselling book The Audacity of Hope, Obama is the second-most popular U.S. politician after Rudolph Giuliani, according to a poll last summer. But he has no foreign policy experience in times that demand it, and a short Washington résumé; he's not yet finished the second year of this term.

DOJ_NMG_0092808

Experience is not a problem for long-shot centrists like Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, or New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, another long shot, declared his candidacy last week. And the field is likely to grow before it starts shrinking.

Bill, George Show Keeps Laughs Coming (AP-Y)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 13, 2006

They're separated by more than 20 years, they come from opposing political parties, and one evicted the other from the White House. But Bill Clinton and George Bush act like a team, a pair of touring comedians with a well-honed act.

The two former presidents even have their entrance down pat, striding in with arms aloft, music pounding, lights flashing, the crowd standing and going wild.

The pair addressed more than 25,000 people attending the National Association of Realtors convention on Saturday, drawing at least six standing ovations and almost continuous applause.

Bush and Clinton thanked the real estate agents for holding their convention in New Orleans. It's the biggest convention to come to the city since Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, 2005, and the pair has raised $130 million to aid New Orleans and the Gulf Coast in recovering from the storm.

Retirement has been good, Bush said, although he misses some of the perks of the presidency.

One problem with retirement, Bush said, is that memories do not fail on certain topics.

"After 14 years no one forgets if you throw up on the Japanese premier," he said.

However, he said, years of being badgered by the news media have left him with a simple philosophy: "Now if I don't like your questions, the heck with it, then I'm not going to answer them."

Clinton played second banana after Bush's round of jokes.

"You've just witnessed George Bush's revenge for the 1992 campaign," Clinton said of the year he defeated Bush for the presidency. "I'm condemned for the rest of my life to be his straight man."

Bush can get away with some things more easily, said Clinton, whose presidency was marked by the Monica Lewinsky scandal, noting that if he were to repeat one off-color joke that Bush told, "the New York papers would kill me."

What's more, the 60-year-old Clinton told the crowd, Bush, at 82, is in better shape.

"Make no mistake about it," said Clinton, who has undergone quadruple bypass surgery. "George Bush will speak at my funeral."

As for the recent election, both said they had to deal with congresses controlled for most or all of their presidencies by the other party. They said some of the best legislation during that time were made through compromises.

Clinton said he did not think his wife, Sen. Hillary Clinton, had decided yet whether she would run for the presidency.

"If she were to be elected I think she would do a good job," Clinton said.

"Yeah," Bush interjected, "but I'm having a little difficulty picturing this fellow walking behind her like Prince Philip behind the queen."

YESTERDAY (WP)

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Ford, who turned 93 on July 14, became the oldest president by living to 93 years and 121 days.

"The length of one's days matters less than the love of one's family and friends," Ford said in a statement last week from the Rancho Mirage compound he shares with his wife, Betty Ford, 88.

Ford was president from Aug. 9, 1974, when Richard M. Nixon resigned, until January 1977. He has suffered a variety of health problems in recent years and underwent heart procedures at the Mayo Clinic in August.

"He's doing very well. He's still recuperating," said Ford's chief of staff, Penny Circle.

In the statement released by Circle, the former president said: "I thank God for the gift of every sunrise and, even more, for all the years he has blessed me with Betty and the children, with our extended family and the friends of a lifetime."

The calculation of the milestone was done by Ford's staff and was based on full days.

Ford, a longtime Michigan congressman, was House minority leader when Nixon chose him as vice president to replace Spiro Agnew in 1973. Ford became president the following year when Nixon resigned amid the Watergate scandal. Ford, a Republican, is the only president in U.S. history never elected as either president or vice president. He served as president nearly 2 1/2 years, losing to Democrat Jimmy Carter in 1976.

Reagan, born Feb. 6, 1911, was 93 years 120 days old when he died, on June 5, 2004. He surpassed the longevity milestone of John Adams, the nation's second president, in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0092809

Duke Blackwood, director of the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, Calif., said, "We all send our best to President Ford for reaching this milestone." And he added: "If President Reagan were alive, he'd probably say, 'Finally, somebody's talking about another president's age.' "

The oldest living former first lady is Lady Bird Johnson, who turns 94 next month. Bess Truman, who died in 1982 at age 97, was the longest-living first lady.

A Charity With An Unusual Interest In The Bottom Line (NYT)

By Jennifer 8. Lee

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

THE idea befuddled donors and Internal Revenue Service lawyers alike when Jacqueline Novogratz approached them six years ago. A philanthropic venture capital fund?

On one hand, the Acumen Fund would be a nonprofit charity. On the other, it would invest in companies and groups that tackled global poverty.

It was an unusual idea to pitch to philanthropists, said Ms. Novogratz. “They had never seen an organization like us: raising charitable money but wanting the flexibility of grants, loans and equity investments in for-profit and nonprofit organizations.”

Ms. Novogratz, who has an M.B.A., has backgrounds in both in finance and philanthropy and worked as a banker at Chase Manhattan and as a manager of special projects at the Rockefeller Foundation before starting Acumen. She established a foothold in international philanthropy in 1986 when she went to Rwanda and worked on microfinance projects, long before the words “microfinance” or “Rwanda” entered the social lexicon.

She may have been ahead of her time. But two key people intuitively grasped the Acumen Fund’s mission: Larry Page and Sergey Brin, the co-founders of Google, whom Ms. Novogratz first met at a Technology Entertainment and Design conference two years ago. During the period when Google’s new charitable foundation, Google.org, was defining itself, the company’s founders knew they shared a vision with Ms. Novogratz — a desire to reinvent philanthropy and push the boundaries of how people who had done well could also do good.

“We were looking at different models of philanthropy,” said Sheryl Sandberg, a vice president at Google and a Google.org board member. “We are looking at the most efficient and effective ways to solve the world’s largest problems.”

They saw a lot of potential in the Acumen Fund, which has invested in projects meant to help people on the lowest rungs of the socioeconomic ladder: drip irrigation systems in India, rural health clinics in Kenya and a low-cost mortgage program in Pakistan.

Acumen models itself after a venture capital fund and brings in management and entrepreneurial expertise to help build the companies’ financial independence. To that end, Acumen has a mantra on business fundamentals on how to design, price, distribute and market goods and services. But the audience it is focusing on are people who live on less than $4 a day, and Acumen’s goal is to provide them affordable, critical goods and services that have otherwise been neglected by the marketplace. So when Google.org was little more than a Web page promising information to come, the Acumen Fund appeared as its first partner. To date, the Acumen Fund has been the recipient of Google.org’s largest-single grant: $5 million to strengthen Acumen’s operations. “It was a really progressive and thoughtful contribution,” Ms. Novogratz said. “It was about building the institution.”

To further cement the ties, Google announced in September that the Acumen Fund would be moving from its offices overlooking Trinity Church in the financial district of Manhattan to Google’s corporate offices in the Chelsea neighborhood uptown. “We believe that our model and Jackie’s model and Acumen’s model is the next wave of philanthropy,” Ms. Sandberg said. “It’s addressing the critical needs of the world’s poor, but in much more of a venture capital mode: to use seed capital to address the world’s problems and to do so in a sustainable way.”

Among Acumen’s most notable projects is an investment in International Development Enterprises in India, a nonprofit group that manufacturers a drip irrigation system that it sells to poor farmers for under $30, a fraction of the price of traditional irrigation systems. Because the cost is so modest, the increased land productivity helps the system pay for itself in a short time, Ms. Novogratz said. “Their lives change almost overnight if they make that investment,” she said. “They see their income double or triple — that allows them enough income to buy a second system. That is how they accumulate wealth.” So far, more than 30,000 units have been sold.

In the twin worlds of philanthropy and venture capital, where billion is a commonly used measure, the Acumen Fund can seem modest. It has about 29 full-time staff members and seven fellows in offices in New York, India, Pakistan and, soon, Kenya. Of the $40 million dollars it has raised since it formally began in 2001, it has distributed only around $20 million — a small amount by traditional philanthropic standards. Yet Ms. Novogratz explained that the firm’s approach was expensive. “The business acumen costs money," she said. "We are highly labor intensive." Many of the managers hold M.B.A's and have résumés studded with stints at Goldman Sachs, Credit Suisse First Boston, McKinsey.

DOJ_NMG_0092810

Rather than simply focusing on potential profitability, Acumen evaluates projects for social impact, financial sustainability, replicability and what Ms. Novogratz calls "breakthrough insights" — knowledge that can be applied elsewhere.

For example, they have spent a lot of time understanding when the poor act like mainstream customers and when they don't. Another insight prompted them to eliminate grants, and limit Acumen to loans and equity investments. "Grants do not provide the same amount of clarity of expectations or financial discipline, or the same power as a conduit into more traditional financial markets," Ms. Novogratz said.

"What we need in this sector is these kinds of ideas and models to get others to think frankly of doing their business in a similar way," said Allen S. Grossman, a professor at Harvard Business School who studies entrepreneurship in the social sector.

Those insights are critical to charting new territory, said Dr. Grossman, who also advises Acumen. "You can't take business practices and superimpose them when it comes to social issues," he said. "What they do is a very effective social adaptation so that there is not a conflict between good business practices and achievement of a social mission."

But often local entrepreneurs do feel tension between business and philanthropy, said Yasmina Zaidman, who manages water projects for Acumen. They are caught because nonprofits tell them to "stop making money off the poor" while business executives say, "If you want to make money, get serious, stop messing around in the rural areas," Ms. Zaidman added. "They haven't been supported or acknowledged."

Like any investment fund, Acumen has its disappointments. Of 21 projects, 15 are still active. Last year, for example, Acumen pulled out of a fluoride filtration company in India when the company changed its strategy and started pursuing subsidized government contracts. "It was frustrating, but that lesson has influenced us so much since then," Ms. Zaidman said.

An earlier project, centered around a $42 hearing aid, failed to take off in India despite the product's relatively low cost. "We were jumping up and down thinking we hit the ball out of the park," Ms. Novogratz said. Acumen helped distribute 10,000 of the hearing aids, but low demand and a poor distribution network prevented it from becoming an independent business. "We learned that technology alone does not solve problems," she said, "and that what is as important — or more important — than the technology is the business model for bringing services to poor people."

While Ms. Novogratz was in Rwanda, she helped women there set up a bakery called Duterimbere, which means "to go work with enthusiasm" in the local Rwandan language. "We cornered the snack food market," she said.

Her farewell present from the women was a tapestry depicting scenes from the bakery, the town and a local school. It blends into the Acumen office décor — a mix of the dot-com aesthetic of Aeron chairs and ethnic handicrafts from Ms. Novogratz's travels. Glancing at the Rwandan tapestry, Ms. Novogratz said, "Unfortunately, all the women created it were killed in the genocide, so it's even more important." She added, "Acumen Fund is my prayer in response to genocide and what happened in Rwanda."

Confessions Of A Values Voter (USAT)

By Tom Krattenmaker

USA Today, November 13, 2006

I am a values voter.

Given my progressive political and religious beliefs, some might find this a dubious claim — especially members of the Christian right, who with their rhetoric about "values voters" suggest that only those who share their positions on abortion and same-sex couples possess something deserving of the term "values."

Social conservatives' skewed deployment of the "v-word" floods the public square these days. (Though it didn't help Republicans this time as it did in 2004.) President Bush, on the campaign trail, called on voters to support candidates who defend "traditional values."

Consider two events organized this past year by leading religious right figures — the "Values Voters Summit," held earlier this fall with a lineup of speakers that included the flame-throwing Ann Coulter, and the high-profile "War on Christians and the Values Voter" conference in March. Consider the ValuesVoters.com website operated by the conservative American Family Association, and the declaration by leading social conservative Gary Bauer that 2004 was the "year of the values voter."

Apparently, those of us who hold different positions on the hot-button issues as framed by social conservatives — those of us who turn our attention and hearts to other imperatives such as peace-making, poverty relief, environmental preservation and tolerance — have no values. According to the rhetoric of social conservatives, progressives are the "anything goes" lot. Secularists, liberal Christians and followers of other faiths — we're the ones tearing America down with our moral weakness and hostility to the conservative Christian worldview.

DOJ_NMG_0092811

Let's move past this hubris and damn-the-opponents rhetoric. We all have values. Let the majority of us who are not members of the "values voters" club continue to take back the v-word and proclaim the values that we've always acted — and voted — upon.

Does opposition to the war in Iraq represent an absence of values? Anything but. What is it if not deeply rooted principles and ideals — values, in other words — that moves so many Americans to oppose the war? We insist on truth-telling by our political leaders. We respect human life, which is why it saddens and outrages us to contemplate the deaths of American soldiers and of many tens of thousands of Iraqis. We hope and pray for a peaceful world in which war, if it must come, is a last resort, not a favored option.

Dwight Moody, a Baptist minister and writer on religion and culture, had this to say about values in a recent e-mail exchange with me: "Progressives, moderates and liberals are also undergirded by deeply held moral convictions, much of it driven by a religious and Christian view of the world: the value of creation, the dignity of the human person, the need for equity and justice, the cause of the poor and the dispossessed. These are values rarely articulated by the religious right, but they run deep and wide in the Bible."

Granted, liberals have been too shy about framing their political positions in moral terms, and too reluctant to use words such as "evil" to describe the acts of terrorists. The sexual adventures of high-profile Democrats such as Bill Clinton and the revolving-door domestic arrangements of Hollywood stars have lent fodder to conservatives who would blast their opponents as godless hedonists. Liberals have paid at the ballot box.

Thankfully, change is coming. Everywhere I look, I see progressives beginning to invoke values in ways that might startle religious conservatives, and in ways that probably helped Democrats win last week.

In Oregon, a recently formed ecumenical group proclaims the v-word in its name: the Oregon Center for Christian Values. These are "Christian values" rooted in human rights, economic justice for the disadvantaged and care for the environment. "Our commitment to Christ," the organization declares in its literature, "compels us to reach beyond the traditional 'moral values' issues often discussed in American politics today. Our goal is to call Christians to reclaim the radical, transformational vision for culture and society that reverberates in the teachings of Jesus."

A group called Red Letter Christians — a reference to the use of red letters in some Bibles to mark the words of Jesus — urged Bible-believers in the run-up to the elections to "vote their values" by treating the environment, poverty and the Iraq war as religious issues. William Sinkford, president of the Unitarian Universalist Association, invokes values in describing the approach to sexuality education adopted by the theologically liberal Unitarians — an approach that directly acknowledges that people will have sex outside of the opposite-sex, husband-and-wife contexts. "Sexuality education is about much more than just biology and rules," Sinkford wrote recently. "It is about values, including self-worth, sexual health, responsibility, justice and inclusivity and communication."

In the analyses and proclamations following last Tuesday's vote, "values" have been popping up in upside-down new ways. The prime example may be the Democrat who won the seat of disgraced Republican congressman Mark Foley and promptly pledged to take immediate action to make sure "our values and morals are represented" in Washington.

As progressives wield language that once belonged solely to conservatives, may we do so fairly, in a way that acknowledges that the other side of the debate also has values. In so doing, we'll model other core values of ours: inclusiveness and respect for differing viewpoints.

The truth about values is that we all have them, but that in our diverse, religiously pluralistic society, we don't share the same ones. What some of us consider a core value can offend others. Tolerance, for example, is a central value to progressives; to some conservatives, it's the root of our problems. Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, has unfairly blamed homosexuality, and our liberal society's tolerance thereof, for Foley's improprieties with pages and for the slow speed with which Capitol Hill Republicans responded to reports of Foley's misdeeds.

Perkins was hitting hard on the "values voters" theme in the weeks leading up to the elections. Responding to reports of evangelical disenchantment with Bush and the Republicans and forecasts of lower turnout by the bloc credited with winning the president's re-election in 2004, Perkins urged social conservatives to rediscover their zest for voting. "Values voters across the nation," Perkins wrote in September in his daily e-mail report, "are beginning to see … what will happen if they sit idly by and allow the rudderless liberals to set a course for our nation." Closer to the elections, Perkins admitted that religious conservative enthusiasm was not what it was in 2004. "If you are tempted to sit this election out, I encourage you not to," he wrote. "Vote your values."

Vote your values. That's certainly what I did. That's what we all did.

Tom Krattenmaker, who lives in Portland, Ore., specializes in religion in public life and is a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors. He is working on a book about the Christianization of professional sports.

DOJ_NMG_0092812

Tax Epiphany (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

A bright light descended from the sky last week and shone upon the world's economic planners. It came courtesy of the World Bank, of all unlikely places; its toiling economists have discovered that simplified tax systems promote economic growth.

In a report titled "Paying Taxes -- The Global Picture," the World Bank and its co-authors at PricewaterhouseCoopers make the case for simplifying business taxes. Burdensome rules and multiple levies, they argue, promote tax evasion even when individual corporate tax rates are low. Make the system transparent and simple, and the private sector will pony up. It's an argument that could be made for personal income taxes, too.

Released as an elaboration of the Bank's broader and valuable "Doing Business Report," the survey examines the tax regimes of 175 countries between April and July this year. It looks at the administrative tax burden that a hypothetical, limited liability company with 60 employees would face.

The Bank's findings echo that of the flat-tax camp; namely, simple tax regimes promote compliance and efficiency. By "simple," the Bank doesn't just mean unifying rates; it includes making the forms easy to read, understand and file. World-wide it takes an average of 332 hours a year for businesses to comply with tax requirements, ranging from 2,600 hours in Brazil to 325 in the U.S. to 68 in Switzerland. There's no reason a tax form can't fit on a few pages, as in Hong Kong, or be filed over the Internet, as in Singapore.

Tax simplification also means trimming the tax regime itself. The Bank found that corporate income taxes compose only 36%, on average, of businesses' annual tax burden. Property, dividend, capital gains, municipal, and social security taxes, among others, make up the rest -- not to mention the various loopholes carved out for certain industries. Countries such as Egypt, which unified its corporate tax rates and eliminated about 3,000 corporate exemptions and tax holidays last year, saw tax filings double. Russia implemented a flat tax in 2004 and saw tax revenues soar.

The Bank pulls no punches for its main clientele: poor countries that have trouble raising funds. Many make the mistake of setting high tax rates. By doing so, they tacitly encourage tax evasion and create opportunities for corruption. Little wonder that the bottom 30 countries in the "Doing Business" survey "are twice as likely as those in the top 30 to report that bribery is a problem."

If only the high-tax prophets at the International Monetary Fund were paying attention. In a recent working paper, three Fund economists -- writing in a "personal" capacity -- put out an anti-flat tax screed. We don't have the space to dissect the entire paper here, but in essence they wave away the experience of Hong Kong and Russia and argue that the pro-market signals flat taxes send won't do any good for developed nations.

We never thought we'd say this, but perhaps the World Bank can lend the Fund a few economists for some re-education assistance. The IMF bias has long been to elevate balanced budgets as the highest fiscal priority, with tax levels and tax incidence as secondary matters. The Bank business tax survey implicitly exposes the error of the Fund's ways. Combined with President Paul Wolfowitz's long-needed campaign against corruption, the tax report also marks a welcome turn at the Bank in a pro-growth direction.

The Bank's report should also inspire a more thoughtful debate over the virtue of value-added taxes, or VATs. More than 130 countries have adopted VATs, with the IMF pushing hard for its implementation in places like Hong Kong. The VAT is a highly efficient tax and in that way has an advantage over a corporate income tax regime with high rates but many loopholes. But that very efficiency also makes a VAT dangerous as an engine of bigger government because its incidence tends to be hidden and politicians are tempted to raise the rate whenever they want a little more revenue. Some built-in restraint on that political impulse is needed.

The overriding goal of any tax system should be to raise the revenue that governments need for public purposes with the least amount of economic distortion and evasion. The lesson of the World Bank report is that the more transparent and simple a tax scheme, the more it will achieve that purpose.

As Vietnam Trip Nears, Bush Rejects Iraq Link (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush travels this week to the site of an old military conflict casting a shadow over the United States and Iraq: Vietnam.

Bush's trip, including stops in Singapore and Indonesia, is mainly to promote trade at a conference in Hanoi and discuss ways to combat terrorism in the region. But the eight-day journey also includes reminders of how the Vietnam War roiled U.S. politics and society and raises questions about whether the same thing is happening with Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0092813

"The few similarities dwarf all the differences," said historian Robert Brigham, author of the book Is Iraq Another Vietnam?

Among them, Brigham said: an inability to transform military strength into political influence in the region, a steady drain of public support for the war, and harsh lessons about the limits of U.S. power.

Bush stressed what he said were the differences with reporters last week. He said Iraqis overthrew Saddam Hussein with U.S. help, approved a new constitution and formed a government that is trying to move forward despite sectarian violence.

Vietnam endured a civil war in which the communist North, backed by China and the Soviet Union, defeated a U.S.-supported government in the South.

The Iraq war is also being fought with a volunteer army, Bush said, without the compulsory draft that inspired protests in the 1960s and early '70s. The president also said U.S. troops in Iraq are receiving more support from the American people than those in Vietnam did.

"I see the differences," he said, "I really do."

Bush leaves Tuesday for Singapore, where he will deliver a speech on U.S.-Asian relations, the prospects for trade and North Korea's nuclear ambitions. Then he goes to Vietnam and Indonesia, and makes a quick stop in Hawaii before returning to Washington.

The Asia trip comes a week after Republicans lost control of Congress in an election in which, Bush said, voters expressed "displeasure" with the Iraq war. Some members of the new Democratic majority in Congress want U.S. troops out of Iraq, and some, such as Ohio Sen.-elect Sherrod Brown, campaigned against free trade as a threat to Americans' jobs.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said that unlike in Vietnam, a loss in Iraq would pose a direct threat to the United States because Iraq would become a "safe haven for terrorists." He said another key difference is that U.S. servicemembers support the mission in Iraq and the war on terrorism.

Historian Robert Dallek, who chronicled the Vietnam War in biographies of Presidents Lyndon Johnson and John Kennedy, said a loss in Iraq would not be fatal to the United States.

"We lost in Vietnam, and we won the larger Cold War," he pointed out.

Among other differences: The opposition in Iraq lacks a single, charismatic leader in the mold of Ho Chi Minh, former president of North Vietnam. Brigham pointed out that the Vietnam conflict began as an insurgency and ended as a conventional war; the opposite happened in Iraq.

More than 2,800 U.S. troops have lost their lives in Iraq, compared with more than 58,000 in Vietnam.

The Vietnam conflict continues to exert a powerful hold on U.S. politics. Bill Clinton and Bush, who served in the Texas Air National Guard, each spent part of their presidential campaigns explaining how they avoided being sent to the war zone. The attacks on 2004 Democratic nominee John Kerry by fellow swift boat veterans revived the ghosts of the Vietnam War.

Historian Douglas Brinkley, who wrote a book about Kerry and Vietnam, said that the war occurred at a tumultuous time in American history, amid the civil rights and women's movements, the emergence of the counterculture, and the assassinations of political leaders such as President Kennedy, his brother Robert and Martin Luther King Jr.

Today, life in the USA isn't as tumultuous, though similar political divisions are emerging over Iraq, Brinkley said. Because there is no military draft, few Americans are touched directly by the Iraq war unless family or friends are serving there, he said.

For that reason, Brinkley called Iraq more of a "low-grade" Vietnam. "Even today," he said, "you say the word Vietnam and it brings out polar reactions."

After the Persian Gulf War, the first President Bush said, "By God, we've kicked the Vietnam syndrome once and for all."

Historians such as Stanley Karnow said that statement is questionable because of Iraq. Karnow, author of a history of Vietnam, said the USA can't escape the shadow of Vietnam any more than the Civil War or any other "seminal experience."

"People will go on talking about it and debating it forever," he said.

In Vietnam, Old Foes Take Aim At War's Toxic Legacy (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

DA NANG, Vietnam -- For a stark reminder of the Vietnam War, people living near the airport in this central industrial city can still stroll along the old stone walls that once surrounded a U.S. military base. But Luu Thi Nguyen, a 31-year-old homemaker, needs only to look into the face of her young daughter.

Van, 5, spends her days at home, playing by herself on the concrete floor because local school officials say her appearance frightens other children. She has an oversize head and a severely deformed mouth, and her upper body is covered in a rash so severe her skin appears to have been boiled. According to Vietnamese medical authorities, she is part of a new generation of Agent Orange victims, forever scarred by the U.S.-made herbicide containing dioxin, one of the world's most toxic pollutants.

DOJ_NMG_0092814

For decades, the United States and Vietnam have wrangled over the question of responsibility for the U.S. military's deployment of Agent Orange. But officials say they are now moving to jointly address at least one important aspect of the spraying's aftermath -- environmental damage at Vietnamese "hot spots" such as Nguyen's city, Da Nang -- that are still contaminated with dioxin 31 years after the fall of Saigon.

Though neither Nguyen nor her husband was exposed to the Agent Orange sprayed by U.S. forces from 1962 to 1971, officials here say they believe the couple genetically passed on dioxin's side effects after eating fish from contaminated canals. "I am not interested in blaming anyone at this point," the soft-spoken Nguyen said on a recent day, stroking her daughter's face. "But the contamination should not keep doing this to our children. It must be cleaned up."

Vietnamese and U.S. officials last year conducted their first joint scientific research project related to Agent Orange. Testing of the soil near Da Nang's airport, where farmers say they have been unable to grow rice or fruit trees for decades, showed dioxin levels there as much as 100 times above acceptable international standards.

Now the United States is planning to co-fund a project to remove massive amounts of the chemical from the soil. A senior U.S. official involved in Vietnam policy said the plan is evidence that the two countries, having embarked on a new era of economic cooperation, are finally collaborating to address the problem.

"The need to deal with environmental cleanup is increasingly clear, and we're moving forward from talking to taking concrete actions to respond to the issue," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the project has not yet been publicly announced.

The more politically sensitive issues of responsibility and direct compensation for victims remain unresolved. Although medical authorities here estimate that there are more than 4 million suspected dioxin victims in Vietnam, the United States maintains that there are no conclusive scientific links between Agent Orange and the severe health problems and birth defects that the Vietnamese attribute to dioxin.

Still, with a much-changed Vietnam now among Asia's most dynamic economies -- the French luxury house Louis Vuitton has opened a branch in Hanoi, and the hottest nightspot in the capital is a glitzy disco called Apocalypse Now -- both sides appear more willing to seek common ground. Ahead of President Bush's first official visit to Vietnam this week, some also express hope that they are taking the first steps toward a reconciliation on their most divisive wartime issue.Coming Together

During the war, American forces sprayed about 12 million gallons of Agent Orange over the jungle canopies and jade-green highlands of Vietnam. The most toxic of the herbicides used for military purposes, it defoliated countless trees in areas where the communist North Vietnamese troops hid supply lines and conducted guerrilla warfare.

Because Vietnam lacked the resources to conduct its own environmental cleanup, dioxin-related birth defects have been diagnosed in thousands of children whose parents were not exposed during the war. In many cases, families such as the Nguyens were not warned of the hazard until it was too late.

After doctors told them their daughter, Van, was a dioxin victim, the Nguyens cemented over the small garden in their front yard and stopped eating fish from nearby canals. Even now, however, many of their neighbors remain unaware of the danger.

"What could any of us do, anyway?" asked Luu Thi Nguyen, whose family survives on the $1.50 a day her husband makes as a day laborer. "None of us can afford to move. Now I know the soil is contaminated. My daughter has already suffered from this, and I worry about what this soil might still be doing to all of us."

Vietnamese officials estimate the cost of cleaning up the country's three worst hot spots -- including the area near the old U.S. military base in Da Nang that is now the city's main airport -- will be as much as $60 million. Before year's end, they hope to launch the first phase, the development of a plan for cleanup and land use in the city, with an initial contribution of about $300,000 from the U.S. government.

That kind of cooperation has appeared to give new momentum to the issue on other fronts. On Thursday, the Ford Foundation announced that it is putting $2.2 million toward environmental restoration, contamination education and victim relief projects related to Agent Orange. The United Nations Development Program is also set to piggyback with a major grant in coming weeks that would provide additional research funding for the cleanup effort, which Vietnamese officials hope to complete by 2010.

"Vietnam is developing economically very rapidly, and I think the passage of time has played a role in both sides coming together," said Charles R. Bailey, the Vietnam director of the Ford Foundation, which has also funded key studies used to identify the country's most contaminated areas. "There is a sense that this is the last piece of unfinished business between the two countries. It is finally starting to be bridged."

But many here stress that the United States still needs to do far more to right past wrongs, and some are anticipating that Bush will offer a measure of apology for Agent Orange's wartime use when he visits.

DOJ_NMG_0092815

"There are new signs that we are moving forward on cooperation with the U.S. on technical issues," said Le Ke Son, Vietnam's top official on Agent Orange. "It is very important to close the past, to close the war between Vietnam and the United States. But for that to happen, the U.S. must agree to cooperate with us in a bigger way."Push for Compensation

What many Vietnamese are waiting for is direct compensation for victims of Agent Orange as well as an unambiguous admission of responsibility from the U.S. government.

In 1991, Congress authorized assistance for American veterans believed to be suffering from dioxin side effects, but at the same time, the legislation noted that conclusive links between illnesses and the herbicide remained "presumptive." That allowed U.S. officials to effectively sidestep a de facto admission of guilt in Vietnam and avoid offering compensation to Vietnamese victims.

At least one group of victims has already made a formal push for compensation, filing a lawsuit in New York against the chemical companies that produced Agent Orange, including Dow Chemical and Monsanto. In the late 1970s, U.S. veterans filed a similar case and settled out of court in 1984 for a $180 million payment. The Vietnamese case was dismissed last year, but an appeal hearing is expected next month.

The recent advances toward cleaning up the environment are of little solace to these Vietnamese. In a country where birth defects are considered by some an embarrassing reflection of the ill deeds of ancestors, many of the children born with the most severe defects end up abandoned or living in squalid conditions with families too poor to pay for adequate care.

The lucky ones end up in the Peace Village ward for Agent Orange victims at a hospital in Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon. In rooms filled with stricken children, nurses tend to patients including a 2-year-old boy born without eyes and a 14-year-old girl whose head has grown bigger than her torso. Many of the 60 young patients have severely limited mental faculties, but existence appears tougher for those who are still alert.

U.S. officials have argued that Vietnam has exaggerated the extent of Agent Orange's effect, blaming the herbicide for birth defects that may have other genetic or environmental roots. But it's the kind of argument that infuriates people such as Duc Nguyen, 25, who began life as a conjoined twin.

Nguyen, born in the south-central town of Sathay, an area heavily sprayed by Agent Orange during the war, was separated from his brother, Viet Nguyen, at age 7. Doctors here say that soon after their birth, their mother's tissues were found to contain high levels of dioxin. These days, Duc Nguyen, who has one leg and severe bone distortions, works as Peace Village's information technology specialist. He spends his days in an office one floor below his noncognitive brother, who is kept tied to a bed most of the time, unable to move his stump-like body and reflexively gargling on his own saliva.

A 2004 study by the Vietnamese government indicated that birth defects in Sathay were 10 to 20 times more common than the national average. Duc Nguyen is engaged to be married next month to a beautiful young woman he met through his work at the hospital. But he is still far from finding peace.

"I find it ironic that on one hand you put [Saddam Hussein] on trial for using biological warfare, but in another country where you sprayed chemicals for warfare, you neglect your responsibility," said Duc Nguyen, who is not related to Luu Thi Nguyen in Da Nang.

"The United States must admit it's responsible and compensate the Agent Orange victims in Vietnam," he said. "It is your moral obligation. Sooner or later, it has to be done."

Vietnam Frees U.S. Citizen Convicted Of Terrorism (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

A U.S. citizen convicted of terrorism in a Vietnamese court has been released and will arrive today in the United States, her daughter said yesterday.

The case of Orlando resident Thuong Nguyen "Cuc" Foshee had complicated efforts by the Bush administration to pass a major trade bill with Vietnam. The House was due to take up the legislation today. Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) had blocked the trade bill from coming to the floor of the Senate, and on Friday he indicated he would continue to thwart the bill's passage until Foshee arrived home.

A judge at the Ho Chi Minh City People's Court on Friday sentenced Foshee and six other defendants to 15 months in prison, with credit for time served while awaiting trial, which would have meant she would not be deported until next month. The defendants admitted that they had broken Vietnamese law but denied any link to terrorism.

Foshee's daughter, Elizabeth McCausland, said in an interview yesterday that she was told her mother had been released early for "humanitarian reasons."

President Bush will arrive in Hanoi on Friday for an Asian economic summit and has pressed for the trade bill's passage before he leaves Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0092816

Vietnam, the fastest-growing market for U.S. products in Asia, was recently accepted as the 150th member of the World Trade Organization. A bill granting Vietnam permanent normal trade relations is necessary for U.S. firms to benefit from the low tariffs that Vietnam will introduce as a WTO member.

Foshee was born in Vietnam and came to the United States after marrying a U.S. Army Special Forces master sergeant. She was active in protests in the United States against the communist government of Vietnam.

Foshee and the other defendants, including two other U.S. citizens, were accused of plotting to broadcast anti-communist radio messages under the direction of an anti-government group based in California. Vietnam considers the group, called the Government of Free Vietnam, to be a terrorist organization.

One member, Vietnamese-born U.S. resident Nguyen Huu Chanh, has been suspected of planning bomb attacks on Vietnamese embassies. Chanh is detained in South Korea, but a Seoul court has refused to extradite him to Vietnam.

Bush, Putin To Bask In Trade Deal (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, November 13, 2006

President George W. Bush Wednesday holds the first of two meetings with Russian leader Vladimir Putin within five days, bearing the prize of a long sought-after pact on Moscow's entry into the WTO.

While the deal announced Friday is a landmark between two former Cold War foes, it will also throw a harsh spotlight on growing strains in US-Russian relations, as it is expected to face harsh scrutiny in Congress.

The two meetings, one in Moscow on Wednesday and one in Vietnam next Sunday, come as expectations mount of an increasingly testy relationship between Congress, captured by Democrats in Tuesday's elections, and the Kremlin.

Concern is mounting among US legislators on a list of US-Russia disagreements, spanning Moscow's reluctance to impose sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program, geopolitical concerns like Georgia and post-Soviet states, human rights, and trade spats.

There is also disquiet over how the emerging energy superpower hands out oil and gas contracts, its arms sales to US foe Venezuela and the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya.

Some Republican and Democrats also believe Bush's vaunted friendship with Putin has failed to deliver much for the United States.

The two leaders will first meet when Air Force One makes a refuelling stop in Moscow en route for Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia.

Though the meeting is being styled as an informal chat while the presidential jet replenishes its tanks, the symbolism of a stop in Russia is clear.

"We contacted the Russians and said, would you mind if we put down and refuelled ... we said no ceremony, no meetings required," said Bush's national security advisor Stephen Hadley.

"Word came back .. President Putin and Mrs Putina would like to pay a social call on the president for the 45 minutes or so that we're sitting on the tarmac to get refuelled," he said.

The more substantive meeting between the two leaders will come on Sunday November 19, after the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum in Vietnam.

"Obviously we have a lot of issues to talk about with Russia, not the least of which being Iran," said Hadley.

Analysts said Russian leaders are also wary of the incoming Democratic majority in Congress produced by Tuesday's elections.

"Historically, Democrats have always been more complicated for us than Republicans," Kremlin-connected analyst Vyacheslav Nikonov told AFP in Moscow on Thursday.

The trade deal between Russia and the United States, over a decade in the making, lifts one of the final obstacles standing in the way of Russian accession to the World Trade Organisation.

US Chamber of Commerce senior vice president Daniel Christman called on Congress to move swiftly on granting Russia "Permanent Normal Trade Relations" (PNTR) status and so abolish commercial limits imposed on the former communist country.

Without PNTR, US and Russian businesses will still not enjoy full access to each other's markets even after Moscow joins the WTO.

Some analysts say the Democrats are going to order tougher scrutiny of trade agreements once they take control of Congress in January.

Democrat Max Baucus, who is in line to chair the US Senate's powerful finance committee with responsibility for trade matters, welcomed the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0092817

"At the same time, Russia must take additional steps to earn a welcome into the WTO," he stressed, highlighting "unacceptable levels of piracy and counterfeiting" and an "unscientific" Russian ban on US beef.

SKorea Balks At Measures To Sanction North (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang

AP, November 13, 2006

South Korea balked Monday at participating in a U.S.-led plan that foresees intercepting North Korean ships suspected of carrying supplies for the regime's nuclear and missile weapons programs.

Seoul, worried that stopping and searching ships could lead to armed clashes with the North, also insisted it is already doing enough to prevent weapons proliferation by Pyongyang, which detonated a nuclear weapon on Oct. 9.

South Korea is finalizing a report on how it would carry out the U.N. sanctions slapped on North Korea in response to the nuclear test.

Park In-kook, a deputy foreign minister, said Seoul already participated in various regimes to control weapons of mass destruction, and wouldn't formally join the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, a campaign aimed largely at stopping North Korean weapons traffic by sea.

However, the South will continue a hold on regular humanitarian aid to the North, said Lee Kwan-se, a Unification Ministry official. Seoul suspended the aid in July after North Korea test-launched a series of missiles over international objections.

Lee also said South Korea will suspend its subsidies for a tourism program at the North's Diamond Mountain resort. Those subsidies are believed to be relatively small and intended simply to fund trips by those — mainly students — who can't afford the expensive, multi-day tours.

South Korea's report to the U.N. sanctions committee on how it would carry out the resolution unanimously adopted after the North's nuclear test was expected to be submitted Monday.

The resolution bans the sale of major arms to North Korea and calls for inspection of cargo entering and leaving the country. It also calls for the freezing of assets of businesses supplying the North's nuclear and ballistic weapons programs, as well as restrictions on sales of luxury goods, and travel bans on Pyongyang officials.

Park said Monday that the South would ban travel by those North Korean officials named by the U.N. committee.

Seoul has participated in the U.S.-led ship interdiction program known as the Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, only as an observer.

The two Koreas are still technically at war, as the 1950-53 Korean War ended in a truce, not a peace treaty. But their relations have warmed since the first, and only, summit of their leaders in 2000, with Seoul pursuing engagement rather than confrontation under the so-called sunshine policy.

Early December Proposed For NKorea Talks: Russia (AFP)

AFP, November 13, 2006

Six-nation talks on ending North Korea's nuclear weapons drive may be held at the beginning of December, a Russian envoy said.

The Russian ambassador to Japan, Alexander Losyukov, said dates early next month have been proposed among diplomats.

"According to the exchanges of diplomatic documents, there is a possibility that it will be held in early December," he told reporters in Tokyo.

North Korea on October 9 tested an atom bomb but agreed later in the month to return to six-nation disarmament talks which it has boycotted for a year.

Diplomats from the countries involved have repeatedly said the talks are likely to be held in November or December.

The leaders of the five nations negotiating with North Korea -- China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the United States -- are expected to discuss the resumption of six-way talks when they meet this weekend for a summit in Hanoi.

The United States and Japan have supported a tough line against the North after its nuclear test, while the other three countries have favored a more conciliatory approach.

North Korea had stayed away from talks since November last year to protest US financial sanctions against a bank accused of laundering and counterfeiting money for the regime.

Losyukov, who is a former negotiator in the six-party talks, said that the dialogue has "drastically changed" since its inception in 2003.

"North Korea once said it was a peaceful nation and that it would not go nuclear. Now it has declared the possession of nuclear weapons and its determination to protect itself with them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0092818

Losyukov, who will return to Russia this month but remain active in Moscow's Asian diplomacy, said that the "the process of the six-party talks has to speed up."

"Holding talks biannually, annually or biennially is not enough. If the six-party talks are to proceed only slowly at the current pace, the situation will only worsen and risks of conflicts will increase," he said.

Losyukov also said he believes Pyongyang "is trying to develop (nuclear) weapons because it fears its sovereignty will be infringed" through military attacks or political pressure.

The best way to solve the stalemate is "to assure North Korea that its sovereignty will be inviolable," he said, while adding that he does not know how to resolve the problem completely.

"The strategy of threatening North Korea by saying 'we will force you to abandon nuclear ambitions unless you voluntarily give them up' -- I don't think it works," he said.

Nuclear Deals Said To Be Thwarted (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, November 13, 2006

The Czech secret service disrupted three attempts last year by North Korea to purchase equipment needed for nuclear weapons production, Czech media reported.

"Last year our service halted three export deals headed for North Korea, in particular special machine tools, their components and spare parts," a secret service spokesman, Jan Subrt, told the CTK news agency.

North Korea is said to have been looking to buy special machine tools that would enable it to produce small nuclear weapons.

Pyongyang conducted its first nuclear test last month.

Olmert Tackles Iran On U.S. Visit (WT/AP)

By Amy Teibel

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert flew to Washington at the start of a five-day U.S. visit yesterday, armed with an agenda focusing on the Iranian nuclear threat and Israel's relations with the Palestinians.

On the flight, Mr. Olmert repeated his view that Iran will not scale back its nuclear ambitions unless it fears the consequences of its intransigence, spokeswoman Miri Eisin said.

The Iranians "have to be afraid of the consequences if there isn't a compromise," she quoted Mr. Olmert as having told journalists on the flight.

Mr. Olmert, however, appeared to play down a senior official's suggestion that Israel is preparing for a military strike against Iran's nuclear program. Asked to comment on Deputy Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh's remarks, Mr. Olmert replied that on such matters, "we have to be very careful about what we say," Col. Eisin said.

Mr. Sneh's comments were part of a pattern of heightened Israeli rhetoric on the Iranian nuclear issue. The Iranian Foreign Ministry yesterday said Iran's military would hit back with a "swift, strong and crushing" response to any Israeli military action against it.

Mr. Olmert has said Iran's nuclear ambitions will be the main item on his agenda in Washington. Mr. Olmert had dinner with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last night and is scheduled to meet with President Bush today.

Israel is worried about Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's repeated calls to destroy Israel and, like the United States, does not believe Tehran's claims that its nuclear program is intended solely to produce energy.

The United States has led international efforts to curb the Iranian nuclear program, but Israelis are concerned that U.S. policy might soften after the Democratic Party victory in congressional elections last week.

The fear is that with U.S. public opinion turning against the invasion of Iraq, Mr. Bush would be less likely to take decisive military or diplomatic action against Iran.

Some analysts also think the Bush administration might be willing to end its policy of isolating Iran because of Tehran's influence over armed groups in Iraq.

Mr. Olmert arrived in Washington with a gutted diplomatic agenda. He took office promising to pull Israel out of much of the West Bank, but shelved that plan after Israel's summer war against Lebanese guerrillas left Israelis with little enthusiasm for territorial concessions. A poll put his approval rating at about 20 percent.

Mr. Olmert has revived the notion of negotiating with the moderate Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, but the two men have not been able to agree on an agenda or even set a date to meet.

DOJ_NMG_0092819

There are expectations that while in Washington, Mr. Olmert will make small-scale moves on the Palestinian front, including proposed humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people.

Mr. Olmert told reporters he did not expect major developments during the trip. "This isn't a dramatic visit," Col. Eisin quoted him as saying.

Olmert Arrives In US For Talks With Bush In New Political Climate (AFP)

By Ron Bousso

AFP, November 13, 2006

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arrived in the United States for talks with President George W. Bush on Iraq, Iran and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the wake of a landmark US congressional election that may portend foreign policy shifts.

Olmert was to meet with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Sunday and have talks with Bush at the White House on Monday.

Monday's summit, which comes six months after Olmert's first meeting with Bush at the White House, has been described in Israel as "a down-to-business meeting" on Iran.

With Tehran continuing to reject international calls to halt its nuclear enrichment efforts, Israel has in recent months moved the Iranian threat to the top of its agenda.

But Israel could have reason for concern about the resignation of US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a ferocious opponent of dialogue. His expected successor, Robert Gates, has signed onto a report calling for dialogue with Iran.

Backed by the United States, Israel has said sanctions are necessary following Tehran's failure to suspend uranium enrichment, a process which Israel, the United States and several European powers say hides a secret nuclear weapons programme -- despite Iranian insistence that it is for peaceful purposes.

Israel -- widely considered the Middle East's sole, if undeclared, nuclear weapons power -- considers Iran its chief enemy, pointing to calls from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for the Jewish state to be wiped off the map.

In Los Angeles on Friday, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Tehran was merely buying time by negotiating with the international community, and warned of a regional arms race if Tehran obtained an atomic weapon.

"The UN resolution said very clearly in July, stop the enrichment or face sanctions," Livni said. "And here we are in November, and still we are talking about the next resolution for 'soft sanctions'."

Olmert ratcheted up his anti-Iranian rhetoric calling Ahmadinejad "a man who is ready to commit crimes against humanity."

Israel, the premier said, is ready for a compromise, "but I don't believe that Iran will accept such a compromise unless they have good reason to fear the consequences ... In other words, Iran must start to fear."

An Iranian foreign ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, said Sunday that Tehran would deliver a "destructive" response to any Israeli military attack on its atomic sites and that it would continue trying to boost its capacity for uranium enrichment.

Hosseini's comments came after a top Israeli official refused to rule out a strike on the Islamic republic to halt the progress of its atomic programme, with the United Nations still unable to agree on sanctions against Tehran.

Olmert has also weighed in on US policy in Iraq in the wake of the Democrats' election triumph.

Democrats, who wrested control of the US Congress from Republicans on Tuesday, have long called for a reassessment of the US strategy in Iraq, with many calling for redeployment of US forces from the country.

"If there is a premature pullout before Iraq has a robust government with a strong authority that can keep the country from collapsing into an internal civil war, America will have to think about the possible ramifications on neighboring Arab countries with moderate governments," Olmert told The Washington Post newspaper and Newsweek magazine in an interview published Sunday.

Under increasing pressure to change US policy in Iraq, Bush is awaiting conclusions of a study group that may recommend opening talks with Iran and Syria as a way of prodding them to help restore stability in neighboring Iraq.

Bush will speak to members of the Iraq Study Group on the same day he is to meet Olmert. The group is expected to deliver its final report by year-end.

Bush and Olmert will likely also talk about Lebanon, according to a senior administration official.

It will be the first Bush-Olmert meeting since Israel's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon, in which the United States lent its unfailing political support to its ally.

On Saturday, Washington vetoed an Arab-sponsored draft resolution in the UN Security Council that would have condemned an Israeli artillery barrage that killed 19 people in the Gaza Strip last week.

In New Middle East, Tests For An Old Friendship (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0092820

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 12 — Even before the American elections, a certain wariness had crept into the intimate friendship between Israel and the United States. The summer war in Lebanon produced questions in Washington about the competence of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. In Jerusalem, there were worries about the American approach to Iran and the Palestinians.

In theory, the two countries share a vision for a modern Middle East in which a thriving Israel would be accepted by its neighbors. But the Israelis balk at President Bush's embrace of regional change through promotion of Arab democracy. They view his effort as naïve and counterproductive, because it brings Islamists and Iranian clients to power.

Although Israel was grateful to see Saddam Hussein overthrown, officials here have long focused on what they consider a much bigger concern: preventing Iran from gaining nuclear weapons. They say the American policies that have empowered Iranian-backed militias in Iraq have been counterproductive to Israel's interests.

That concern is bound to be the subtext when Mr. Olmert goes to the White House on Monday. And now the Democratic sweep has created fresh concerns that the administration, whose muscular approach to Islamist terrorism and Iran has brought comfort here, will turn more to accommodation and compromise. President Bush has chosen as his next secretary of defense Robert M. Gates, who in the past has been highly critical of the administration's refusal to engage in dialogue with Iran.

The defeat for the party of Mr. Bush, "possibly the friendliest president we've ever had," said Zalman Shoval, a former Israeli ambassador to Washington, "raises question marks regarding the administration's ability to promote its diplomatic and security objectives."

In war or peace, most Israelis say they believe they have only one true ally in the world, the United States. The relationship is extraordinarily tight, especially since 9/11 and the beginning of the campaign against terrorism.

But Israel is haunted by the specter of a nuclear-armed Iran, despite Israel's own nuclear deterrent. Iran has called for Israel's destruction, flouted the United Nations by continuing to enrich uranium and has just announced that it has a new longer-range missile.

"Many Israelis feel that the free world under the leadership of the U.S. is facing a similar situation to Europe in the 1930s, when they watched the rearming of the Nazi Reich," said Yuval Steinitz, a senior member of Parliament's foreign and defense committee. "No one could predict the global catastrophe 10 years later, and Iran may be the same."

Mr. Bush says his stance on Iran is unchanged: he will never accept a nuclear-armed Iran. Yet Israelis have been increasingly anxious about the Bush approach, seeing recently a tendency to delay confrontation through further negotiations. They worry that because of Iran's ability to further inflame Iraq, Mr. Bush is hesitant to take any steps that could lead to confrontation. And Israelis are worried about what concessions an administration seeking to build an anti-Iran alliance in the Arab world might ask of them on the Palestinian question in order to bolster that alliance.

Both Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories are armed, radical, Iranian-backed Islamic groups sworn to Israel's destruction. And each has been empowered and legitimized by elections that Mr. Bush demanded, and Israel's summer war involved fighting both of them.

Lebanon: The Pressures of War

All these strains were heightened by the war against Hezbollah, set off by the capture of two Israeli soldiers, and the global criticism of Israeli tactics in Lebanon.

Halfway into the war, on July 30, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in Jerusalem, telling the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, of her concern about killing civilians. Mr. Peretz listened but did not reveal what he knew: eight hours earlier Israel had killed more than two dozen of them in the village of Qana.

When a senior aide told her of wrenching television coverage of the deaths, Ms. Rice cut the meeting short and accepted a Lebanese request that she not travel next to Beirut, as planned, with a draft cease-fire resolution. She got Israel to accept a 48-hour cessation of most airstrikes which, in her view, was broken within hours.

Still, it was two more weeks before Ms. Rice, President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney suggested to the Israelis that the war was starting to undermine Israel's long-term interests. Even then, Mr. Bush and his aides did not demand a cessation of hostilities, waiting instead for the Israelis to reach the same conclusion.

Asked in a recent interview with The New York Times whether the administration had to get the Israelis to stop their attacks, Ms. Rice said no. "I wasn't going to give the Israelis military advice," she said, adding that she "had a lot of sympathy for what the Israelis were dealing with."

It was another example of Washington's intimate relationship and patience with Israel.

The reluctance to confront is mutual, said Yossi Alpher, a former negotiator who runs a Web site promoting Israeli-Palestinian Internet dialogue, bitterlemons.com. "I'd love Israeli leaders to sit down with Bush for a mutual soul-searching, and say, 'We're concerned, dear Mr. President, that your plans are hurting us, that part of the audacity of the radical Islamists we fight comes from your decision to enfranchise them,' " he said. "But we don't dare to."

DOJ_NMG_0092821

Israel, he noted, has been highly skeptical of the idea of pushing democracy among Arab nations where the only organized opposition parties are linked to militants. It is a lot safer from Israel's perspective to deal with stable, if autocratic, states like Jordan and Egypt.

When Ms. Rice "looked at the damage in Beirut and said these are 'the birth pangs of the new Middle East,' I cringed, because I thought the Bush people had learned their lesson after the election of Hamas," Mr. Alpher said. "For Israel to manage, we need more of the old Middle East, not the new Middle East."

Those anxieties persist despite Mr. Bush's fidelity. As the Lebanon war showed, Mr. Bush has been reluctant to impose the kinds of restraints on Israel that his father employed, to press talks with the Palestinians in the style of Bill Clinton or even to push Israel to ease up on Palestinian travel.

That has pleased many of Israel's supporters, including those among an increasingly vocal, fiercely pro-Israel community of evangelicals, who visited the White House at least once during the Lebanon war to voice support for allowing the air attacks on Hezbollah to continue unabated.

As President Bush prepares to meet Prime Minister Olmert, the man the White House backed while privately coming to doubt his political and military judgment, there are questions in Israel and Washington about how the two will deal with potential disagreements over Iran and the Palestinians.

The Threat of a Nuclear Iran

Mr. Bush's aides say the fighting in Lebanon in July and August was more important than it appeared because of Hezbollah's relationship with Iran.

"We saw the conflict this summer as much more than just a border war between Israel and Hezbollah," said R. Nicholas Burns, under secretary of state for political affairs. "It was clear from the very beginning of this conflict that Iran was behind Hezbollah, providing the financing and the long-range rockets that held the Israelis hostage."

"Israel and the United States, as well as many of the Arab states, see the same threat we do," he continued, "an Iran that is expanding its influence and fundamentally trying to destabilize the Middle East through its proxies."

But Israelis worry that Mr. Bush may dither over Iran. "Our big worry is that they will wait too long to act, after it is too late to stop the Iranians from gaining the knowledge to build a bomb," said one senior Israeli official, who was not authorized to speak publicly, after long, recent discussions with top Bush administration officials. "Are they committed to keeping the Iranians from actually building a weapon? I think so. Are they committed to keeping them from putting together all the parts they need? I'm not sure."

The Israelis say Washington was disappointed in their performance against Hezbollah. They are right: inside the White House, said one senior official there, who agreed to speak about internal deliberations on condition of anonymity, "Bush and Cheney believed that this would be another Six-Day War, or on the outside, two weeks."

"They believed it because that's what the Israelis said," the official said.

For Israelis, this failure to deliver poses a risk that cannot be ignored, especially when Iran is on the table.

"Most people in Israel are not satisfied by our performance in Lebanon," said Moshe Arens, a former defense minister, foreign minister and ambassador to Washington. "So if Israel enjoys this preferred position as an ally of the U.S. and a valuable ally in the fight against terrorism and now is shown to be not that effective and maybe not even that valuable, and to some extent even disappointing, that could put something of a damper on what's happening. My guess is that's probably temporary, but I think we're going through the phase."

Itamar Rabinovich, a former Israeli ambassador to the United States who is president of Tel Aviv University, said that Israelis, no matter their appreciation for American support, could not hand over the problem of Iran to Washington. He said: "Can we rely on the United States alone and say we abdicate our responsibility for dealing with the matter, and let the United States do what it wants? No, by no means."

In an indication of Israel's concern, in late October Mr. Olmert brought a far-right party dominated by Russian immigrants into his weakened coalition, and picked its controversial leader, Avigdor Lieberman, as a deputy prime minister and strategic threats minister, with the task of "strategizing" on Iran.

Earlier in October, in Moscow, Mr. Olmert said that "Israel can never abide this type of situation" where "a country like Iran has nonconventional potential." He added, "When the head of a country says he wants to destroy us, it does not sound like an empty declaration, but something we must prepare to prevent through all acceptable and possible ways."

Diverging Interests?

DOJ_NMG_0092822

Senior Israeli officials know that Mr. Bush has a lot on his plate: a nuclear North Korea, a Democratic Congress, a weak approval rating and the bleeding of American power in Iraq. To win sanctions against Iran, he needs the support of Europe, Russia and China, all very critical of Israeli policies toward the Palestinians.

To enforce sanctions, particularly those blocking shipments of nuclear- or missile-related technology, he would need the cooperation of Iran's Arab neighbors. So Israel has another worry: that Mr. Bush will try to build an anti-Iran coalition by pressuring Israel to make concessions to the Palestinians.

In September, Israel was abuzz over a speech by an American official that got little coverage in the American news media. Philip D. Zelikow, counselor to Ms. Rice, had addressed the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, considered sympathetic to Israel's interests, on "Building Security in the Broader Middle East."

Mr. Zelikow, in the last of 10 points, suggested that to build a coalition to deal with Iran, the United States needed to make progress on solving the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"For the Arab moderates and for the Europeans, some sense of progress and momentum on the Arab-Israeli dispute is just a sine qua non for their ability to cooperate actively with the United States on a lot of other things that we care about," he said.

The message seemed perfectly clear to Israelis: the Bush administration would demand Israeli concessions on the Palestinian issue to hold together an American-led coalition on Iran. American officials were quick to insist that there was no change in American policy, and that Mr. Zelikow was speaking on his own.

But Mr. Zelikow's close ties to Ms. Rice are well known, and the furor over his comments was amplified because they appeared to some to echo criticisms published in March in The London Review of Books by two American scholars, John J. Mearsheimer of the University of Chicago and Stephen M. Walt of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard.

They suggested that from the White House to Capitol Hill, Israel's interests have been confused with America's, that Israel is more of a security burden than an asset and that the "Israel lobby" in America, including Jewish policy makers, have an undue influence over American foreign policy. In late August, appearing in front of an Islamic group in Washington, Mr. Mearsheimer extended the argument to say that American support of the war in Lebanon had been another example of Israeli interests trumping American ones.

The essay argued that without the Israel lobby the United States would not have gone to war in Iraq and implied that the same forces could drag the United States into another military confrontation on Israel's behalf, with Iran. It urged more American pressure to solve the Palestinian question as the best cure for regional instability.

Some Israelis worried that the implicit charge of dual loyalty would be underlined by the trial of two former officials of the prominent pro-Israel lobbying group, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, on charges of receiving classified information about Iran and other issues from a Defense Department official and passing it on to a journalist and an Israeli diplomat. The trial is scheduled to begin early next year.

Mr. Walt, in an interview, argued that the first President Bush had worked to restrain Israel, and that Mr. Clinton worked to attain diplomatic concessions to achieve a peace. But when this Bush administration took office, "they first had no use for the Mideast, then took a more balanced position, calling for a two-state solution, and then were completely won over by Israel's argument that it is simply fighting terrorism."

Former Israeli ambassadors to Washington like Mr. Rabinovich, Mr. Arens and Mr. Shoval all scoff at the Walt-Mearsheimer thesis, which echoes criticisms of Jewish influence as far back as the presidency of Harry S. Truman.

But given the intensifying debate in Washington about Iran, Mr. Rabinovich said, the essay is "disturbing," as are the echoes of part of the argument in Mr. Zelikow's speech. Mr. Arens said that 9/11 created "an objective reality" of an antiterrorism coalition, led by President Bush, in which Israel is a crucial member. Mr. Bush is seen here as less interested in being an honest broker than in supporting Israel as a crucial strategic partner in the region.

The Iran confrontation, Mr. Arens said, will bolster that partnership. "The president said that he sees a clear and present danger with Iran arming itself with nuclear weapons and it's obvious that this is a clear and present danger for the state of Israel," he said. "Although a small country, we are not a minor party. When people talk about the possibility of a military option, what are they talking about? The U.S. or maybe Israel to take that move, not the U.S. or Germany or France."

He acknowledged, however, "That inevitably will lead people who are critical of the position of the president to be critical of Israel, because we are seen as a partner in this campaign, and it is not a very big step to say that Israel is leading the U.S., or misleading the U.S., by the nose in this thing."

The Post-Bush World

No Israeli knows if the next American president will be as tough on Iran or as loyal to Israel as Mr. Bush. If Mr. Bush does not act, Israelis say, by the time the next president takes office, in January 2009, Iran will be well on its way to a bomb, and Washington may not back Israeli responses.

DOJ_NMG_0092823

Gidi Grinstein, a former Israeli negotiator who runs an independent policy center, the Reut Institute, says Israel and the United States share a larger goal on Iran but have "tension among their different objectives," as indicated by Mr. Zelikow.

The Iran debate in Washington is serious but unfinished, Mr. Grinstein said, noting the divisions between those who argue that a nuclear-armed Iran can be contained and those who believe that Iran must not get the technology to build a bomb, much less the weapon itself.

Mr. Alpher, the former Israeli negotiator, is concerned that if Mr. Bush ultimately negotiates with Iran, "we need to ensure that the United States doesn't sell us down the river." It is fine for Israel to say that Iran is the world's problem, he said. "But if the world solves it diplomatically," he added, "will it be at our expense?"

The world looks different to nearly all Israelis across the political spectrum than it does to people in most other countries. "Unlike Bush, an Israeli leader looks at Iran through the prism of the Holocaust and his responsibility to the ongoing existence of the Jewish people," Mr. Alpher said. "It may sound pompous, but at the end of the day it matters, and so we may be willing to do the strangest things."

Gadi Baltiansky, a former Israeli diplomat in Washington and director of the Geneva Initiative, which promotes Israeli-Palestinian peace, argues that, given the stakes, Israel also pays a price for American policy, which can go against Israeli interests.

"The dilemma is that even this president, a true friend of Israel, after 9/11 divided the world into good guys and bad guys, and we're one of the good guys, so fine," he said. "Syria is a bad guy. But what serves Israel's interests? Talking to them may be bad for the U.S., but not necessarily bad for us. But whether it's Hamas participating in elections or Syria, it's hard for us to say no to the United States."

What matters most to Israel, officials here in Jerusalem say, is the level of support it receives from ordinary Americans, no matter their political party or religion. Despite the anxieties here over Lebanon, Iran and academic essays, opinion polls show that Americans are solidly in support of Israel, with new support coming from evangelical Christians.

Mr. Arens, the former defense minister, said of the Europeans: "They don't like us — what can we do? What else is new? We would like to be liked by everyone, of course, but it's the relationship with the United States that really matters."

How Bush And Olmert Could Help Each Other (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Today two bruised, weakened and defensive politicians, George W. Bush and Ehud Olmert, will sit down together at the White House for the first time in six months. Whether the tide of extremism now roaring across the Middle East -- from the Gaza Strip to Baghdad -- can be turned back could depend on whether they find a way to buck each other up.

The last time the Israeli prime minister was in Washington it looked like the two allies still commanded the regional agenda. Bush was overseeing the formation of Iraq's first permanent democratic government; Olmert was preparing a bold plan for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank. Both men emerged from the Oval Office radiating confidence that Iran would not be permitted to acquire nuclear weapons.

Today Bush and Olmert will have to face the reality that Iran is winning -- not just in preserving its nuclear program but in a broader contest over the direction of the Middle East. Olmert's "disengagement" plan is dead, at least for now; so is Bush's hope that an Iraqi coalition government could stabilize the country. Meanwhile, Iran and its ally Syria are everywhere on the offensive. They are on the verge of reversing Lebanon's popular Cedar Revolution and handing political control over the country to the Hezbollah movement. They are blocking attempts by Palestinian moderates to form a new government in Gaza that could rebuild relations with Israel and the West. Their allies are smuggling more weapons, building more bunkers and preparing for the next round of what they call "resistance" -- a permanent war against Israel that they would use to transform the region.

In the face of this onslaught, Bush and Olmert have had little to offer. Both are in deep domestic political trouble. The vaunted military forces of both countries are badly bogged down. The two leaders could, if they let themselves, spend their time reproaching each other. Senior Israeli officials have been privately grumbling for some time that Bush's diplomatic campaign to stop an Iranian bomb is going nowhere and that there appears to be no credible American Plan B. For their part, Bush administration officials have been frustrated by Olmert's slowness to embrace even modest steps to defuse tensions with Palestinians, such as a U.S. plan to increase the flow of goods and people between Israel and Gaza.

The alternative is for Bush and Olmert to dust themselves off, put their heads together and do what comes naturally to both of them -- that is, something bold. What's needed is a game-changing initiative that would break the momentum of Iran and its allies, and energize demoralized Arab moderates -- like Ariel Sharon's 2003 proposal to withdraw from Gaza or Bush's June 2002 endorsement of a Palestinian state.

DOJ_NMG_0092824

What's possible? From the American point of view, the obvious answer is a major Israeli effort to encourage the formation of a responsible Palestinian government. Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a moderate, has been negotiating with the militant Hamas movement for months about a "unity" coalition made up of technocrats. Israeli officials tend to dismiss the effort as doomed. But what if Olmert were to spell out an aggressive Israeli plan to work with such a government? The plan could start with restoring the Palestinian tax funds that Israel collects but has impounded, and move on quickly to the release of Palestinian prisoners and talks about a negotiated version of the West Bank withdrawal Olmert proposed.

Among some senior Israeli officials a different but even bolder idea is being quietly kicked around: the opening of a dialogue with Syria. The idea is to flip Syrian President Bashar al-Assad; to induce him to drop his alliance with Iran and join the moderate Sunni alliance that is quietly lining up against Tehran. The Bush administration is loath to talk to Assad, partly because previous efforts have failed and partly because of what he wants from the United States, which is acquiescence to renewed Syrian suzerainty over Lebanon.

Israel cares less about who rules Lebanon. And it has something Assad wants at least as much: the Golan Heights. The Syrian president has been saying for months that he is ready to open talks about a swap of the territory for peace, a deal that his father came within inches of closing 6 1/2 years ago. Until recently Israel had little incentive to make that bargain with Bashar Assad. But the rise of the Iranian threat in the past year has changed the calculus for at least some of Olmert's advisers.

Imagine Ehud Olmert emerging from the White House to announce that Israel is prepared to explore peace with Syria. It might not turn the ugly tide in the Middle East. But it would, at least, get Israel and the United States back in the fight.

Q&A: Israel's P.M. On Iran, Lebanon, Palestinian State (NSWK)

By Lally Weymouth

Newsweek, November 13, 2006

Nov. 20, 2006 issue - This week Ehud Olmert makes his second visit to see President Bush in Washington. After last summer's controversial war against Hizbullah and recent allegations of corruption, the Israeli prime minister has sunk even lower in the polls than Bush. Olmert came to office promising to pull out of most of the West Bank and consolidate some large settlement blocs. He put this plan on hold after the war, but last week, when he spoke in Jerusalem with NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth, he insisted he still stands by his plan for peace. Excerpts:

WEYMOUTH: Last year you told President Bush you had a vision—your convergence plan—which was to withdraw unilaterally from large parts of the West Bank. Do you have a new vision today?

OLMERT: The "convergence" plan was a vehicle to accomplish a vision shared by President Bush and myself—this is a two-state solution.

After the war in Lebanon, you said the "convergence" plan was on hold.

After the war, and the failure of the Palestinians to cope with continued terrorist actions, I had second thoughts about my ability to accomplish the two-state solution through realignment. One thing I can promise: under no circumstances am I going to withdraw from the need to engage in a serious dialogue with the Palestinians. The Palestinian issue is on the agenda. There is no way we can ignore it. We have to find the best partner—a lot depends on the Palestinian leadership.

How do you feel about President Abu Mazen as a partner?

He has consistently shown his opposition to terror and his discomfort with Hamas. But it is incumbent upon him to do more than just say how uncomfortable he is with Hamas. He hasn't yet shown enough determination to put down this government of terrorists and to reduce the influence of Khalad Mashal, who controls the the Palestinian government from Damascus.

How would you feel if Abu Mazen entered into a unity government with Hamas?

If Hamas will formally accept Israel's right to exist, end all terror against Israel, and recognize the [prior] agreements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, then I'll be ready to sit with such a government, even if it includes Hamas representatives.

Has the United States asked you to release Palestinian leader Marwan Barghouti from prison, and would you consider it?

I made it clear long ago that I am anxious to open up a new dialogue with Abu Mazen and for that purpose I'm ready to release many prisoners. Hamas' inflexible attitude prevents the prisoners from being released because they refuse to let us have our soldier [captured Cpl. Gilad Shalit]. Hamas is not really interested in the wellbeing of its prisoners. They want to topple Abu Mazen at any cost.

You brought the ultra right-wing Avigdor Lieberman into your coalition. Will that affect your negotiating position with the Palestinians?

DOJ_NMG_0092825

I made it clear that the policies of this government are not going to be changed, and you can read my lips. I'm ready for territorial compromises, and I haven't changed my mind.

How do you see the threat posed by Iran?

President Ahmadinejad is a man who is ready to commit crimes against humanity, and he has to be stopped. My position is clear. If there can be a compromise that will stop Iran short of crossing the technological threshold that will lead them into nuclear capabilities, we will be for such a compromise. But I don't believe that Iran will accept such compromise unless they have good reason to fear the consequences of not reaching a compromise. In other words, Iran must start to fear.

Will you talk with Bush about Iran?

I think that Bush is the last person on earth who needs to be reminded of what should be done in order to stop Iran. If there is one person I can trust, it's him.

If the international community does not act, would Israel consider taking military action?

It is absolutely intolerable for Israel to accept the threat of a nuclear Iran. I prefer not to discuss the Israeli options. Israel has many options.

Do you feel the war against Hizullah decreased the group's military strength but built them up politically?

I think Israel had a strategic, military and political success. The presence of the Lebanese army in the south [of Lebanon] together with a robust international force is very significant. It is not ideal. There is a lot that ought to be done and will have to be done by the international force.

So looking back, you feel the war was worthwhile?

There were many mistakes committed but the overall picture is very significant. The main objective of Israel was to create the necessary conditions for the deployment of the Lebanese army in the south of Lebanon and to stop Hizbullah from threatening the northern part of Israel, and I think that we have achieved these objectives. We still have to work hard in order to bring back the two abducted Israeli soldiers.

Syrian President Bashar al-Assad has said that he would like to talk to Israel. Would you consider this?

I would be happy to negotiate with Bashar Assad if he stopped his support of terror and of Hizbullah. Bashar Assad doesn't show any sign that he's ready to do this.

Former secretary of State James Baker said, "You don't talk to your friends, you talk to your enemies." What's to lose by exploring whether there's anything there?

Bashar Assad has not reached the point where he can qualify as a legitimate partner. You can't say we will not negotiate with terrorists and negotiate with someone who is a great supporter of terrorists.

But you negotiated with Arafat when he was in Tunisia, and he was certainly a terrorist.

We negotiated with Arafat, and I think we learnt something about negotiations of this kind from this experience. I don't expect my enemies to be wonderful guys. But I want them to come with clean hands when they come to negotiate with us.

Wouldn't it be worth trying to separate Syria and Iran?

I don't believe Assad wants to be separated from Iran. What he wants is to recover the Golan Heights, and I don't see any signs that he understands that he needs to pay for it.

If the United States gets out of Iraq, how would this affect the region?

If there will be a premature pullout before Iraq has a robust government with a strong authority that can keep the unity of the country from collapsing into an internal civil war, then America will have to think about the possible ramifications on the neighboring Arab countries with moderate governments.

Do your low poll numbers drive you crazy?

According to the polls, I was not supposed to be prime minister. So considering the polls I'm in a good position. I don't worry.

Syria A 'Dangerous' Country, Says Rice (AFP)

AFP, November 13, 2006

The United States believes Syria is a dangerous state whose territory is being used for the accelerated arming of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview with an Israeli daily.

"This is a dangerous state that is behaving in a dangerous manner," Rice told the country's second largest daily, Maariv.

"The United States is concerned and is following closely the use of Syrian territory as a way-station for the accelerated arming of Hezbollah," the Hebrew-language newspaper quoted her as saying.

Israel has long maintained that Hezbollah, with which it fought a 34-day war this summer, receives its weapons from Iran via Syria -- a charge both these countries deny.

DOJ_NMG_0092826

But Rice repeated the allegation in the interview published on the day Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was due in Washington for talks with US President George W. Bush, herself and other top officials.

"Syria is a way-station for Iranian arms that cross the Middle East. It is not a state that contributes to stability in the Middle East," Rice said.

"This is obvious to everyone, and we are watching this situation closely. We are working with additional international agencies in order to tell Syria that it must change this behavior pattern."

"We clarified that Syria must change its behavior as soon as possible," she added.

Hamas Endorses Peace Conference (WT/AP)

By Salah Nasrawi

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

CAIRO -- The Hamas-led Palestinian government agreed yesterday to an international peace conference with Israel after the Arab League -- angered by Israel's military offensive in Gaza -- voted to end a financial blockade on the Palestinians.

Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas endorsed a statement by Arab foreign ministers calling for the peace conference during a meeting in Cairo to respond to a U.S. veto of a U.N. Security Council resolution condemning the Gaza offensive.

Mr. Zahar said the Palestinians had asked for the peace conference "in order to reach just and comprehensive solutions." The acceptance marked the first time the Hamas-led government has indicated that it would consider making amends with the Jewish state.

The West cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in international aid and tax revenues to the Palestinians after Hamas took power in March in an effort to pressure the Islamic militant group to moderate its anti-Israel ideology. The United States, Europe and Israel are demanding that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by existing agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

Mark Regev, a spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry, said he was not aware of the conference proposal. But he said Hamas could not be a party to talks with Israel unless it met the international community's stipulations.

"A multilateral conference doesn't make Hamas legitimate," Mr. Regev said. "What makes Hamas legitimate is accepting the international benchmarks."

Hamas' decision came as Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arrived in Washington ahead of a meeting with President Bush today.

The Arab League said ministers sought a conference to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict "according to international resolutions and the principal of 'land for peace.' " Arabs want Hamas to endorse a 2002 Arab initiative that calls for peace in exchange for land seized by Israel in the 1967Six-Day War -- the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem.

Yesterday was the first time that Mr. Zahar has attended an Arab foreign ministers' meeting since Hamas became the ruling party. The Arab League had refused to let him join until Hamas accepted the peace initiative.

Arab ministers also decided yesterday to end a financial blockade on the Palestinians to show their anger over U.S. veto in the Security Council on Saturday.

The U.N. draft resolution would have condemned the Israeli offensive in Gaza that has killed more than 50 people recently and also demanded that Israeli troops pull out of the territory. John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the Arab-backed resolution was "biased against Israel and politically motivated."

It was the second U.S. veto of a draft resolution on Israeli military operations in Gaza this year.

"There will no longer be an international siege," said Bahrain's foreign minister, Sheik Khalid bin Ahmed Al Khalifa.

The economic sanctions have debilitated the Palestinians and have led to clashes between Hamas and the more moderate Fatah party led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who has been trying to form a more moderate government and renew the peace process with Israel.

Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa said the decision to break the Western-led financial blockade was a message to the United States.

"Our message is loud and clear to those who take unfriendly positions against Arabs," Mr. Moussa told reporters in Cairo.

In an immediate show of support, Kuwait's foreign minister said his country would send $30 million to the Palestinians, and Bahrain's foreign minister said the Arab countries would begin contacting international financial institutions to get the money transferred to the Palestinians.

As Hezbollah Seeks Power, Lebanon Is Feeling Edgy (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

DOJ_NMG_0092827

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 11 — In the upscale center of Beirut, the normally somber atmosphere at the graveside of the assassinated former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, is increasingly tense. His former supporters, long the most powerful constituency in Lebanon, anxiously talk about the wave of Shiite political power washing over the country.

"After the first of the year, I am leaving to Qatar," one woman, Myrtha Hadidi, said Sunday, after she bowed her head and crossed herself in front of the grave. "The situation is very, very dangerous now. I think there will be a war again."

Across town, along the crowded streets of the poor Shiite neighborhood devastated by Israeli bombs during the summer war, there is despair over the destruction, but confidence in the growing power of Lebanon's Shiites.

"I am very optimistic about the future," said Ziad Kamaan, as he prepared to reopen his women's accessory store for the first time since the war ended in September.

Lebanon is in the middle of a political crisis that is not just a matter of jockeying for power, but a fundamental realignment of authority here — and perhaps in the region. It is seen in the faces of those Sunnis and Christians who visit the Hariri memorial, nervous and drawn, and the confidence of those picking their way through the debris and destruction of the Shiite neighborhood, known as Dahiya.

"Hezbollah gave us dignity and pride; they made us feel like human beings again," said Ali Berro, owner of a small grocery in the neighborhood. "It's true that America and Israel devastated this country, but we will rebuild again, ourselves."

Long in the making, the 34-day war between Israel and Hezbollah — which was waged to crush the group's militia — seems to have accelerated the rise of Lebanon's Shiites, from their onetime status as the nation's unwanted stepchild to the cusp of political dominance.

As a political party, a militia and social welfare organization, Hezbollah has used the devastation of the war with Israel to help strengthen the allegiance of Shiites, giving out money and services that the government has so far failed to deliver. Though no one knows for sure the size of each group in Lebanon — there has not been a census since the 1930s — Shiites are believed to make up more than 30 percent of the population, and by some estimates have reached a plurality. But it would require a major leap for the Shiites to realize their political goal of dominance — and their efforts to reach it could threaten long-term instability, and perhaps bring armed conflict.

"This war has improved the Shiite identity and self-image," said Judith Palmer Harik, a professor at the American University in Beirut who has studied and written about Hezbollah. "They got something out of this war that was pretty uplifting."

On Saturday, Hezbollah and its main Shiite ally, Amal, provoked a political crisis when their five ministers resigned from the government after talks broke down about giving Hezbollah's alliance more authority.

The stage is now set for a showdown between Hezbollah and its allies, which are aligned with Syria and Iran, and the Sunni, Druse and Christian leaders who control the largest bloc in Parliament and side with the West.

Hezbollah has threatened to stage demonstrations as early as Monday, but Hezbollah officials said Sunday that they were waiting to see how their opposition responded and were considering all options.

The governing coalition is expected to make its counterstrike on Monday. The coalition, led by Saad Hariri, the son of the former prime minister, has tried to tar Hezbollah and Amal as tools of Syria and contends that their ministers resigned to block creation of a tribunal to hear charges in connection with the assassination of Mr. Hariri.

Syrian officials have been implicated in the United Nations investigations. The governing coalition has also charged that Hezbollah wants to control or block the government to prevent it from carrying out the provisions of Security Council Resolution 1701, which ended the war with Israel.

The United Nations sent a proposed framework for the court to Lebanon last week, and Prime Minister Fouad Siniora has called a cabinet meeting for Monday to take up the proposal. If Lebanon does not adopt the proposal, the court could still be created by the Security Council, but it would be viewed here as having less legitimacy because it was imposed on the country.

"The hidden plot has been revealed," the governing coalition said in a statement issued Sunday. "It's a Syrian-Iranian plot to launch a coup against the legitimacy, stop the establishment of an international tribunal and foil Resolution 1701."

Mr. Siniora and his allies have said that even without the Shiite members of the cabinet, they could adopt the proposal and have it pass in Parliament. It would, however, probably be rejected by the pro-Syrian president, Émile Lahoud, who issued his own statement on Sunday saying the "government had lost its constitutional legitimacy and, as a result, any cabinet meeting is anti-constitutional and worthless."

But the maneuvering over the court is one piece of a much larger battle with Hezbollah on the offensive. Hezbollah is insisting that its alliance be given seats in the cabinet, to have veto power over all decisions. One Hezbollah official said the outcome of this fight could jeopardize the delicate system of power sharing between religious communities that was established in the Taif agreement of 1989, which brought an end to 15 years of civil war. "If they want to govern without Shiite ministers, then nothing would prevent a Shiite from running for president in the future," said Tarrad Hamadeh, the Hezbollah minister of labor, who resigned Saturday. "They are messing with the country's future."

DOJ_NMG_0092828

In war-torn neighborhoods of the south, in the Bekaa Valley, and in Dahiya, often the only sign of authority is Hezbollah's yellow flag. Hezbollah remains the de facto government within its communities. "We can make a revolution in Lebanon, we can occupy Lebanon, but this is not what we want," said Bilal Naeim, a Hezbollah politburo member who is overseeing the group's relief effort. "We could make a coup d'état."

Mr. Naeim works out of a large tent that Hezbollah put up in Dahiya to serve as a sort of office for reconstruction and distribution of assistance. Its office was flattened by Israeli bombs, but its work was not stopped. On Sunday, Ali Ahmed Raychouny entered the tent looking for help rebuilding his bookstore. Hezbollah is preparing to give out money for inventory damaged by the war, and since he and his employee and his landlord depend on the income from his bookstore, he wanted to make sure he was on the list.

"I never expect anything from the government of our country," he said. "I have five kids and I support three families. Hezbollah is in my blood."

Iran Vows Retaliation If Israel Strikes (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 13, 2006

Iran's military will retaliate swiftly and strongly if Israel attacks any Iranian nuclear sites, the Foreign Ministry said Sunday.

The warning came two days after Israel's deputy defense minister suggested Israel might be forced to launch a military strike against Iran's disputed nuclear program as "a last resort."

"If the Zionist regime commits such stupidity, the response by the Iranian military will be swift, strong and crushing," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini said. "Iran will take no longer than a second to respond."

The comments by Israeli Deputy Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh were the clearest yet from a high-ranking official of possible military action against Iran. However, the Israeli government later said the comments did not necessarily reflect its views or those of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Israel bombed Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor in 1981 to destroy Saddam Hussein's nuclear weapons program. While Israel neither acknowledges nor denies possessing nuclear arms, it is thought to have about 100-200 nuclear warheads, according to a 2006 report by the Center for Nonproliferation Studies at the Monterey Institute of International Studies.

Hosseini downplayed the possibility of an Israeli attack. "The situation and capability of the Zionist regime are far too small to threaten Iran," he said.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, again criticized the U.N. Security Council over its efforts to impose sanctions on Iran because of its nuclear program. Iran says its program is for peaceful energy purposes, but the United States and other Western countries fear its a cover for developing weapons.

"It is most embarrassing that the U.N Security Council, which should be the defender of nations' security and rights, threatens countries pursuing nuclear fuel for peaceful purposes under the law," Ahmadinejad said, addressing the general assembly of Asian Parliaments Association for Peace in the capital, Tehran.

He accused the U.N. of applying a double standard, saying it was pursuing Iran "while those countries, armed with nuclear weapons, deny the rights of other countries to produce nuclear fuel and exploit it for peaceful purposes."

The Iranian president also criticized the United Nations for what he described as its lack of concern for the Palestinians. He condemned the United States for vetoing a U.N. Security Council draft resolution that criticized an Israeli military offensive in the Gaza Strip, including an artillery barrage that killed 19 civilians last week.

"While this fake regime commits crimes, the U.N. has not taken a single positive and operative step to restore the rights of the Palestinian nation," he said.

Hosseini, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, also said Iran began installing an additional 3,000 centrifuges at its uranium enrichment plant in Natanz with the knowledge of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog.

In October, Iran injected uranium gas into a second network of 164 centrifuges.

Injecting gas into centrifuges can either yield nuclear fuel or material for a warhead, but does not represent a major technological breakthrough and is unlikely to bring Iran within grasp of a weapon.

Iran produced a small batch of low-enriched uranium — suitable as nuclear fuel but not weapons grade — in February, using its initial cascade of 164 centrifuges at Natanz.

Earlier this year, Tehran said it planned to install 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz by year's end, but it would take 54,000 centrifuges to fuel a reactor.

DOJ_NMG_0092829

Iran Criticizes Security Council Over Threat Of Sanctions (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

TEHRAN, Nov. 12 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Sunday described efforts by the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran as "disgraceful."

"It is disgraceful that the Security Council, which should be the defender of nations' security and rights, creates cases against countries that seek to produce nuclear fuel for peaceful purposes and threatens them," he said, addressing the general assembly of the Association of Asian Parliaments for Peace, which was founded in 1999 to promote peace and development and now has 39 members. It is meeting in Tehran.

The five permanent members of the Security Council — Britain, France, the United States, China and Russia — are scheduled, along with Germany, to resume talks Monday on a European draft resolution that would impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its uranium enrichment program.

Iran contends that its nuclear program is peaceful and that its aim is to produce fuel for its nuclear power plants.

Mr. Ahmadinejad accused the United Nations of applying a double standard for not objecting to development of unconventional weapons by Britain, the United States and Israel. He said the nuclear-armed countries sought to deny the right of other countries to produce nuclear fuel for peaceful purposes because they feared they could lose their monopoly over the technology.

"They are afraid that independent countries, such as the Islamic Republic, would not let them maintain their monopoly over nuclear fuel," he said.

Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, returned from Moscow on Sunday after a series of talks with Russian officials. Russia is urging the other five countries that are discussing the sanctions to resume talks with Iran.

Mr. Larijani said Friday in Moscow that Iran would not halt its program and that sanctions would not harm it, the ISNA news agency reported. He also said, commenting on the results of the American elections, that he believed that the Democrats would adopt a softer approach toward Iran over its nuclear program to avoid more tension.

Islamic Militants Claim Capture Of Town (AP)

By Mohamed Sheik Nor

AP, November 13, 2006

Islamic militants said they captured a town in central Somalia on Sunday after they came under attack from pro-government militiamen backed by troops from Ethiopia and a semiautonomous region in northern Somalia.

The fighting erupted near the border of the Puntland region, one of the few areas in Somalia still outside the control of the Islamic movement. The group said it captured the town of Bandiradley, about 430 miles north of the capital, Mogadishu, and two of its fighters were killed in the battle.

"The fighting is continuing and we are pursuing Puntland troops," Mohamed Mahmud Agaweyne, spokesman for the Islamic group in central Somalia, told The Associated Press by telephone.

Sa'id Abdirahman Dakaweyne, a colonel with the Puntland militia, confirmed the fighting. Puntland officials said they had put their troops on full alert.

Government officials declined to say if anyone from their militia had been killed.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991 when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on each other. The new interim government was formed with the help of the U.N. two years ago. But it has failed to assert any real control outside the southern town of Baidoa where it is based.

The Islamic courts militia, meanwhile, has been rising since June and now controls most of the country's south and the capital. The United States has accused the group of sheltering suspects in the 1998 al-Qaida bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

Experts warn Somalia could become a proxy battleground for neighboring Ethiopia and Eritrea, which broke away from Ethiopia in 1991 following a civil war. Eritrea supports the Islamic militia, while Ethiopia backs the interim government.

A confidential U.N. report obtained recently by The Associated Press said 6,000-8,000 Ethiopian troops were in Somalia or along the border. It also said 2,000 soldiers from Eritrea were inside the country. Eritrea denies having any troops in Somalia, while Ethiopia insists it has sent only a few hundred advisers.

Agaweyne said the Islamic fighters had captured two tanks and 11 pickup trucks mounted with machine guns. Islamic forces said the tanks had Ethiopian markings.

Ethiopian officials were not immediately available for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0092830

Sporadic skirmishes have broken out in central Somalia since May, when the Islamic movement took the town of Jowhar and began extending northward toward Puntland, which has close ties to Ethiopia and opposes the spread of the Islamic forces.

Puntland declared itself an autonomous state within Somalia in 1998. It has generally been spared the violence that has wracked the southern part of the country.

Several peace initiatives between Somalia's interim government and the Islamic movement have failed to take hold. A peace deal agreed to Friday by a renegade lawmaker and the Islamists was rejected 24 hours later by the interim administration, which said it was done without its approval.

Meanwhile, Kenya announced that all flights to Somalia would be suspended as of Monday due to security reasons. The order affects almost daily service from Nairobi to Mogadishu and three other towns in Somalia.

Late last week, the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi warned that extremists in Somalia were planning suicide attacks in Kenya and Ethiopia.

___

Associated Press writer Salad Duhul and Mohamed Ali in Mogadishu also contributed to this report.

Tension Rises In Somalia As Islamists Expand Reach (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 12 — Islamist forces expanded their reach in Somalia on Sunday by seizing towns near Galcaio, in the country's north, which until now had been relatively peaceful.

The Islamists then turned their guns toward Galcaio and began shelling the outskirts of the city, witnesses said.

The fighting threatened to push Somalia closer to the brink of an all-out war between the Islamist forces that rule Mogadishu, the seaside capital, and the weak, so-called transitional government based in the inland city of Baidoa. The militias that were routed Sunday were loyal to the transitional government, and their defeat was interpreted as another sign of its weakness.

Each side blamed the other for the bloodshed, which claimed as many as 10 lives.

"The government troops ambushed us," said Abdulrahim Ali Modei, spokesman for the Council of Islamic Courts, the network of Islamist forces ruling Mogadishu, according to [a news service].

However, an official with the transitional government denied that, saying that the Islamists attacked first.

On Saturday, leaders of the transitional government rejected a deal to restart peace talks, though several members of the transitional government had agreed to negotiate with Islamist leaders.

Somalia has been engulfed in anarchy for years, but many Western officials in East Africa worry that the conflict on the horizon could be worse than before because it has the potential to drag in Somalia's neighbors. Already, Ethiopia has sent hundreds and possibly thousands of troops into Somalia to support the transitional government, and several Arab countries are suspected of backing the Islamists.

"If there is a war," said a high-ranking American military official, who spoke last week on condition of anonymity, "the fighting ends up protracted and long and spills across the border."

On Saturday, Kenyan authorities banned all scheduled flights in and out of Somalia, citing security risks. The United States recently issued a warning that said suicide bombers from Somalia might be plotting attacks in Kenya and Ethiopia.

Hizbollah Ministers Quit Lebanon's Cabinet (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, November 13, 2006

Lebanon's political crisis deepened over the weekend with the resignation from the cabinet of all five Shia ministers from the pro-Syrian Hizbollah movement and its allies as unity talks collapsed.

Hizbollah repeated its threat to stage "peaceful" demonstrations to back up its demand for a decisive say in the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora or else to force new elections.

The anti-Syrian majority that controls the government and Parliament has vowed that the cabinet will meet on Monday as planned to approve a UN draft for an international tribunal to try suspects in the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, who was killed in a massive bomb blast along with more than 20 others in February last year.

The country's pro-Syrian president, Emile Lahoud, said that the resignation of the Shia ministers renders any new cabinet decision "anti-constitutional". But the anti-Syrian majority, as well as constitutional experts, have denied this.

DOJ_NMG_0092831

Anti-Syrian politicians accused Hizbollah and its allies of forcing the crisis to block Lebanese approval of the international tribunal. The UN last week sent a draft of the framework for such a tribunal to the government after the permanent members of the Security Council reached a consensus.

The Shia ministers last year suspended their participation in the cabinet for several weeks over the issue of the tribunal.

Hizbollah's deputy leader, Sheikh Naim Kassem, said that the crisis "has nothing to do" with the international tribunal. He accused the anti-Syrian majority of using the issue to obscure their responsibility for the failure of the political talks and said Hizbollah would stage peaceful street protests to back up its demands but it was not clear yet when these would start.

Anti-Syrian politicians have expressed fears that Hizbollah's protests will turn violent. They have vowed counter-demonstrations by their own supporters.

Several leading politicians will be out of the country until the middle of the week and there is a feeling that the demonstrations or renewed talks will only take place after they return.

Hizbollah's leader, Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, said last month that he is demanding more of a say in the government for himself and his allies in order to stop the anti-Syrian majority from giving in to the "American-Israeli demand" to disarm the movement.

Hizbollah feels under pressure because of the presence of the beefed-up UNIFIL international military presence in its heartland in the south of the country following this summer's war with Israel.

Hizbollah wants to bring its main Christian ally, former General Michel Aoun, and his bloc, into the government. The movement has demanded a share of one-third-plus-one of the cabinet seats for itself and its allies, which would give it veto power over the most important decisions.

The anti-Syrian majority has said that it may consider bringing Gen Aoun into the government but it refuses to grant its opponents veto power.

Both the president and the powerful speaker of Parliament, Nabih Berri of the Shia Amal movement, are pro-Syrian.

If the pro-Syrians were to get veto power in the cabinet, the results of last year's elections in which the anti-Syrian coalition triumphed, would be neutralised.

Lebanese Cabinet Thrown Into Crisis By Hezbollah Exit (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, November 13, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- Hezbollah, having defied efforts by Israel to eliminate it as a military force, is flexing its political muscle, jeopardizing the stability of a Lebanese government that the Bush administration presents as a democratic beacon for the Middle East.

The political crisis here, triggered by the collapse of talks to calm mounting tension, further darkens the White House's vision of a "new Middle East." It could also fortify Washington's two biggest foes in the region, Syria and Iran.

Hezbollah, along with its Shiite Muslim allies, on Saturday withdrew its representatives in the cabinet, where they had a minority voice. The group, which has organized huge rallies in the past, has also threatened street protests to press demands for a new government in which Hezbollah and its political allies would have effective veto power.

The political wrangling complicates one of Washington's principal foreign-policy goals in the region: the establishment of an international tribunal to judge Syrian officials implicated in the murder in February last year of Rafik Hariri, former prime minister of Lebanon. The Lebanese cabinet was supposed to meet today to discuss tribunal proposals endorsed last week by the United Nations Security Council.

Though small, with less than four million people, Lebanon has outsize significance as a proxy for the geopolitical ambitions of more powerful nations. Hezbollah is the focus of these rivalries. The group is denounced by Israel and the U.S. as a terrorist organization.

Meanwhile, the group is hailed by Iran, Syria and many ordinary Muslims around the world as a legitimate resistance movement.

"Whether they like it or not, there is a new Middle East in the making, but it is the antithesis of what America wanted," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a Beirut-based scholar who has written a sympathetic book about Hezbollah.

Hezbollah suffered heavy losses during its summer war with Israel but nonetheless escaped obliteration by the region's most powerful military. Hassan Nasrallah, the militant group's leader, declared this a "victory from God" -- a play on his own surname, which means the same thing in Arabic.

Since then, he has been pushing for a bigger role in the generally pro-American cabinet of Fuad Siniora, a former banker. Hezbollah also seems to have been emboldened by the Republican Party's rout in U.S. midterm elections last week.

DOJ_NMG_0092832

"America has failed in Iraq and Bush has now failed in America," Sheik Naim Qassem, Hezbollah's deputy leader, said in a speech Saturday. In an apparent reference to Prime Minister Siniora and other pro-American forces in Lebanon, he said: "It is important for those who follow Bush to reassess their stand."

Mr. Qassem drew titters from his audience by mocking Donald Rumsfeld, who resigned last week as U.S. defense secretary.

Wary of Hezbollah's growing clout, the Bush administration has ramped up its rhetoric. Hezbollah and Iran, said White House spokesman Tony Snow on Saturday, "remain a dangerous, global nexus of terrorism." Mr. Snow earlier accused Hezbollah, along with Iran and Syria, of "preparing plans to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government."

Lebanon's cabinet, though now shorn of Shiite ministers, can in theory still endorse the establishment of a tribunal to pursue the Hariri murder case. But the norms of Lebanon's delicate sectarian politics generally require that all groups take part in major decisions. Lebanon's pro-Syrian president, Emile Lahoud, yesterday sent a letter to Prime Minister Siniora, who is backed by the U.S. and its allies in Lebanon, warning that the departure of Shiite ministers had rendered the cabinet unconstitutional.

Parliamentary speaker Nabih Berri, who heads a Shiite group allied with Hezbollah, expressed modest hope that a compromise might still be found. Speaking in Iran, where he is attending a conference, Mr. Berri said Lebanon's rival groups were near divorce but "had not yet hit a brick wall."

Hezbollah, meanwhile, has suggested it will wait before calling its supporters into the streets.

The U.S., seeking to buttress Lebanon's fragile government, last week agreed to provide American military equipment valued at $10.5 million, the latest installment of $230 million pledged by Washington after the war this summer. American aid, however, has had far less impact on public opinion, particularly among Lebanon's Shiite population, than bundles of cash handed out by Hezbollah to help people whose homes were destroyed by Israeli bombs. Most of this cash, say U.S. officials, came from Iran. "The other side is doing an excellent job," conceded an American official.

China Sub Secretly Stalked U.S. Fleet (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 13, 2006

A Chinese submarine stalked a U.S. aircraft carrier battle group in the Pacific last month and surfaced within firing range of its torpedoes and missiles before being detected, The Washington Times has learned.

The surprise encounter highlights China's continuing efforts to prepare for a future conflict with the U.S., despite Pentagon efforts to try to boost relations with Beijing's communist-ruled military.

The submarine encounter with the USS Kitty Hawk and its accompanying warships also is an embarrassment to the commander of U.S. forces in the Pacific, Adm. William J. Fallon, who is engaged in an ambitious military exchange program with China aimed at improving relations between the two nations' militaries.

Disclosure of the incident comes as Adm. Gary Roughead, commander of the U.S. Navy's Pacific Fleet, is making his first visit to China. The four-star admiral was scheduled to meet senior Chinese military leaders during the weeklong visit, which began over the weekend.

According to the defense officials, the Chinese Song-class diesel-powered attack submarine shadowed the Kitty Hawk undetected and surfaced within five miles of the carrier Oct. 26.

The surfaced submarine was spotted by a routine surveillance flight by one of the carrier group's planes. The Kitty Hawk battle group includes an attack submarine and anti-submarine helicopters that are charged with protecting the warships from submarine attack.

According to the officials, the submarine is equipped with Russian-made wake-homing torpedoes and anti-ship cruise missiles.

The Kitty Hawk and several other warships were deployed in ocean waters near Okinawa at the time, as part of a routine fall deployment program. The officials said Chinese submarines rarely have operated in deep water far from Chinese shores or shadowed U.S. vessels.

A Pacific Command spokesman declined to comment on the incident, saying details were classified.

Pentagon spokesmen also declined to comment.

The incident is a setback for the aggressive U.S.-China military exchange program being promoted by Adm. Fallon, who has made several visits to China in recent months in an attempt to develop closer ties.

However, critics of the program in the Pentagon say China has not reciprocated and continues to deny U.S. military visitors access to key facilities, including a Beijing command center. In contrast, Chinese military visitors have been invited to military exercises and sensitive U.S. facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0092833

Additionally, military intelligence officials said Adm. Fallon has restricted U.S. intelligence-gathering activities against China, fearing that disclosure of the activities would upset relations with Beijing.

The restrictions are hindering efforts to know more about China's military buildup, the officials said.

"This is a harbinger of a stronger Chinese reaction to America's military presence in East Asia," said Richard Fisher, a Chinese military specialist with the International Assessment and Strategy Center, who called the submarine incident alarming.

"Given the long range of new Chinese sub-launched anti-ship missiles and those purchased from Russia, this incident is very serious," he said. "It will likely happen again, only because Chinese submarine captains of 40 to 50 new modern submarines entering their navy will want to test their mettle against the 7th Fleet."

Pentagon intelligence officials say China's military buildup in recent years has produced large numbers of submarines and surface ships, seeking to control larger portions of international waters in Asia, a move U.S. officials fear could restrict the flow of oil from the Middle East to Asia in the future.

Between 2002 and last year, China built 14 new submarines, including new Song-class vessels and several other types, both diesel- and nuclear-powered.

Since 1996, when the United States dispatched two aircraft carrier battle groups to waters near Taiwan in a show of force, Beijing also has bought and built weapons designed specifically to attack U.S. aircraft carriers and other warships.

"The Chinese have made it clear that they understand the importance of the submarine in any kind of offensive or defensive strategy to deal with a military conflict," an intelligence official said recently.

In late 2004, China dispatched a Han-class submarine to waters near Guam, Taiwan and Japan. Japan's military went on emergency alert after the submarine surfaced in Japanese waters. Beijing apologized for the incursion.

The Pentagon's latest annual report on Chinese military power stated that China is investing heavily in weapons designed "to interdict, at long ranges, aircraft carrier and expeditionary strike groups that might deploy to the western Pacific."

It could not be learned whether the U.S. government lodged a protest with China's government over the incident or otherwise raised the matter in official channels.

U.S.: Castro's Health Is Deteriorating (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, November 13, 2006

The government believes Fidel Castro's health is deteriorating and that the Cuban dictator is unlikely to live through 2007.

That dire view was reinforced last week when Cuba's foreign minister backed away from his prediction the ailing Castro would return to power by early December. "It's a subject on which I don't want to speculate," Felipe Perez Roque told The Associated Press in Havana.

U.S. government officials say there is still some mystery about Castro's diagnosis, his treatment and how he is responding. But these officials believe the 80-year-old leader has cancer of the stomach, colon or pancreas.

He was seen weakened and thinner in official state photos released late last month, and it is considered unlikely that he will return to power or survive through the end of next year, said the U.S. government and defense officials. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the politically sensitive topic.

With chemotherapy, Castro may live up to 18 months, said the defense official. Without it, expected survival would drop to three months to eight months.

American officials will not talk publicly about how they glean clues to Castro's health. But U.S. spy agencies include physicians who study pictures, video, public statements and other information coming out of Cuba.

A planned celebration of Castro's 80th birthday next month is expected to draw international attention. The Cuban leader had planned to attend the public event, which already had been postponed once from his Aug. 13 birthday.

U.N. Envoy Meets With Ugandan Rebel (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 12 — Joseph Kony is one of the most vilified rebel leaders on the planet.

He stands accused of brainwashing countless children across northern Uganda, turning the girls into sex slaves and the boys into prepubescent killers. His so-called Christian movement, the Lord's Resistance Army, has terrorized this corner of Africa for nearly 20 years, killing tens of thousands of people, burning down huts and hacking off lips. The fact that Mr. Kony, whose followers believe he is a prophet, rarely appears in public has only added to his brutal mystique.

But on Sunday, he came out of the bush. At a camp deep in the forest on the Congo-Sudan border, Mr. Kony materialized to meet Jan Egeland, the United Nations under secretary general for humanitarian affairs and emergency relief.

DOJ_NMG_0092834

"He looked a lot younger than I expected," Mr. Egeland said by telephone from Juba, in southern Sudan. Mr. Kony is thought to be around 44 years old.

"And I was surprised how soft-spoken he was," Mr. Egeland added.

For weeks now, Mr. Egeland had been trying to arrange a tête-à-tête with the elusive Mr. Kony, who is wanted by the International Criminal Court to face charges of crimes against humanity.

Once he got the word that the meeting was set for Sunday afternoon, Mr. Egeland flew by helicopter from Juba to a little-known Sudanese Army outpost near the border of Congo, where he took a truck even deeper into the jungle.

"You can't believe how remote this was," he said. "And those roads. They were the worst possible roads you can imagine."

Mr. Kony was several hours late. With the sun dropping fast and the helicopter pilots eager to get back, Mr. Egeland said he thought the meeting was going to be a bust.

But then, he said, Mr. Kony arrived, on foot, with a small entourage of soldiers carrying machine guns and wearing thick rubber boots. He and Mr. Egeland ducked into a tent and spent a half an hour talking about a host of issues related to the fragile peace treaty that was signed in August between Mr. Kony's army and the government of Uganda.

They began with child soldiers, and Mr. Egeland said he pressed Mr. Kony to release them. For the past several years, according to the Ugandan military, Mr. Kony has been living in a remote corner of Congo, near the borders of Sudan and Uganda, surrounded by a harem of child brides and protected by a battalion of child soldiers.

"I listed all of our humanitarian concerns and urged him to free women, children, the sick and the wounded," Mr. Egeland said. "But Kony insisted he didn't have anyone who fit that description."

The two also talked about the government of Uganda and ways to keep the peace efforts moving.

"But Kony still has a lot of mistrust," Mr. Egeland said.

The stickiest issue, Mr. Egeland said, was the arrest warrants issued by the International Criminal Court against Mr. Kony and four of his commanders. Mr. Kony has said he will never surrender as long as he faces the risk of being arrested. The Ugandan government has said that it will support dropping the charges, but that Mr. Kony must surrender first.

The impasse frustrates many Ugandans, who are sick of war and say they would rather the charges go away than the war grind on. Tens of thousands of people have been killed and nearly two million displaced since the rebellion started in the mid-1980s. It began as a war between the Acholi people, a long dispossessed ethnic group in northern Uganda, and the central government. Even though the bloodshed has diminished from its apex in the mid-1990s, human rights groups continue to document abductions and killings.

Mr. Egeland said he told Mr. Kony that he did not wield any influence with the International Criminal Court, which is based in The Hague and is independent of the United Nations.

"But I did tell him that it would benefit his cause if he made some humanitarian gestures, like releasing the women and children," Mr. Egeland said.

He said that although no great results were achieved on Sunday, he was glad he went.

"We can now talk," Mr. Egeland said.

As for the actual talking, Mr. Kony spoke in Acholi, his native language, during the meeting (though several interpreters were present). He was dressed in green army fatigues and accompanied by a handful of top commanders.

Mr. Egeland said Mr. Kony seemed very guarded at first, even a little paranoid. But eventually he offered to shake hands and even smiled.

Mr. Egeland's response: "I shook his hand but I didn't smile," he said. "I know what Joseph Kony is responsible for."

Ugandan Rebel Emerges To Talk With U.N. Official (WP/AP)

By Katy Pownall

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

RI-KWANGBA, Sudan, Nov. 12 -- The top U.N. humanitarian official met Sunday with a Ugandan rebel leader accused of war crimes, but he failed to secure the immediate release of women and children held captive by the insurgent group.

The United Nations' Jan Egeland waited for two hours at a clearing in southern Sudan before Joseph Kony, the messianic leader of the Lord's Resistance Army, emerged from the bush with 30 bodyguards, bayonets fixed to their assault rifles.

Kony and Egeland shook hands before speaking for 10 minutes in a green tent erected by the United Nations. Egeland was seeking the release of women and children enslaved by the group during its 20-year conflict with the Ugandan government.

But Kony denied that his forces were holding prisoners.

"We don't have any children," he said in a brief news conference in the clearing just across Sudan's border with Congo. "We only have combatants."

DOJ_NMG_0092835

Egeland is the first high-ranking U.N. official to meet Kony, who has declared himself a Christian prophet fighting to rule Uganda and its 26 million people by the Ten Commandments.

Kony has appeared in public only a handful of times, fearing arrest and extradition to The Hague to answer war crimes charges from the International Criminal Court, which has also issued arrest warrants for his top deputies. The rebels have been accused of murder, mutilations and kidnapping children for use as soldiers and sex slaves.

Almost 2 million people have been displaced by the conflict, aid organizations say.

After the talks, Egeland described the meeting as a success, saying the rebels had agreed to give an assessment of how many women and children were in their camps.

Egeland traveled by helicopter to Ri-Kwangba, a neutral zone just north of the Congolese border where the rebels are to gather under the terms of a peace deal with the Ugandan government. About 100 Lord's Resistance Army fighters loitered on the outer edge of the clearing.

"I am a humanitarian worker; I help people by relating to people who can unlock situations," Egeland said late Saturday.

Egeland said he was unwilling to discuss the arrest warrants, which the rebels say threaten the fragile peace deal signed with the government in southern Sudan's regional capital, Juba.

The rebels want the warrants dropped before they sign a comprehensive peace deal; the Ugandan government says it will ask for them to be lifted only after a full agreement is reached.

Uganda's government welcomed Egeland's meeting with Kony.

"If he can secure the release of women and children through his meeting, then that would be a very positive boost for the Juba talks," said Ruhakana Rugunda, head of the government negotiating team and Uganda's minister of internal affairs.

The Lord's Resistance Army is made up of the remnants of a rebellion that began after Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni took power in 1986. It has set up rear bases in Sudan and Congo and has been accused of attacking civilians and threatening stability in those countries.

A New Al Jazeera With A Global Focus (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 12 — Al Jazeera, the Arab news channel that began a decade ago as an upstart, has became a thorn in the side of every dictator in the region as well as of the Bush administration.

Critics call it radical; its admirers lionize it. And the network continues to battle accusations that it is sympathetic to Al Qaeda and other extremists.

Several of its reporters have been jailed — one is in prison in Spain for ties to Al Qaeda — and its offices have been shut in almost every major Arab country at some point, and bombed by American aircraft in two wars.

Now, Al Jazeera's journalists are working to transform the channel into a conglomerate with global reach.

By the end of the year, Al Jazeera will have news channels in Arabic and English, a pan-Arab newspaper, Web sites and blogs, sports and children's outlets, and even a channel modeled after C-Span.

The network (it turned 10 on Nov. 1) is also looking to extend its sphere of influence beyond the Arab world. On Wednesday, it will start the English-language Al Jazeera International, its most ambitious initiative yet, which will go on the air from Asia to the United States.

The channel will broadcast from network hubs in Qatar, London, Washington and Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, offering news, talk and documentaries that its managing director, Nigel Parsons, said would have a decidedly different tone than on established Western channels.

In effect, Al Jazeera International intends to become for the developing world what Al Jazeera became to the Arab world: a champion of forgotten causes, a news organization willing to take the contrarian view and to risk being controversial.

"We want to be a channel that covers the untold stories," Mr. Parsons said by telephone from Qatar. "We would be anchored in the Middle East, but we intend to cover the developing world fully."

To do that, he said, Al Jazeera will use Asian reporters to cover Asia, and will have Africans talking about Africa, "rather than having instant experts land there and tell us a story."

The channel has signed prominent journalists, including the host and commentator David Frost; the former BBC correspondent Rageh Omar, and a onetime CNN anchor, Riz Khan, as well as numbers of producers and reporters from Western networks and some unknowns with a decidedly international look.

"We will carry on the tradition of showing the ugly side of conflict," Mr. Parsons said. "War has been too sanitized in the media."

DOJ_NMG_0092836

Viewers should not expect to see the Al Jazeera that the Arab world watches daily. Mr. Parsons and others stressed that Al Jazeera International was not merely a translation of Al Jazeera from Arabic. It has separate crews and editors working completely independent of the original network.

Insiders note that the cultures of the Arabic- and English- speaking teams have at times clashed, though Mr. Parsons says many of those differences have been ironed out.

Still, some analysts doubt that Al Jazeera can take significant market share away from networks like CNN and BBC. But its international offshoot is not under pressure to turn a profit anytime soon, in part because of its endowment from the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, who has underscored his long-term commitment to Al Jazeera despite pressure from many governments.

The Arab channel, largely locked out of the advertising market by Saudi businesses, who account for most ads in the region, has yet to turn a profit. Mr. Parsons says Al Jazeera International will broadcast with ads from multinational companies.

Nor is he necessarily focused on reaching American viewers.

The new channel is about the untapped world of English speakers in the East, increasingly frustrated with Western coverage of their world. When it goes live, it is expected to have access to 40 million homes — most of them outside Europe and the United States.

The station has struggled to break into American cable television markets, where most operators have decided against adding it to their offerings. Americans, though, can watch a streamed broadcast over the Internet.

"People are too concerned about how it will do in the United states, but I don't think it matters," said Marc Lynch, a political science professor at Williams College and author of "Voices of the New Arab Public: Iraq, Al Jazeera and Middle East Politics Today."

"Al Jazeera," he said, "has this huge untapped market around the world where people have English as a first or second language."

This is a world increasingly skeptical of American intentions and frustrated with American foreign policy.

"We're very proud of our brand," Mr. Parsons said, "and as a network, everybody is proud of what Al Jazeera has achieved. There is a lot of cynicism about TV journalism today. We intend to continue the tradition of being fearless and not frightened of rattling the cages."

¡Viva El Capitalismo! (NYT)

By Álvaro Vargas Llosa

The New York Times, November 13, 2006

Guatemala City

THE irony could not be more poignant. Twenty years ago today, Ronald Reagan went on national television and admitted his government's involvement in an arms deal with Iran, the proceeds of which, we later found out, were diverted to the contra rebels fighting a Marxist regime in Central America. Now Daniel Ortega, the man those funds were aimed against, has just been elected president of Nicaragua.

And the irony does not stop there. A few days before last week's elections, Oliver North, the face of the Iran-contra scandal, landed in Managua and asked Nicaraguans to vote for the right-wing Liberal Constitutionalist Party, which is made up in part of old contra sympathizers, and to stop Mr. Ortega.

Whatever else he might have been doing all these years, Mr. North has not been following Nicaraguan politics: for the last seven years, the Liberal Constitutionalists have been allied with Mr. Ortega's Sandinistas, and they paved the way for Mr. Ortega's victory by lowering the electoral bar for a first-round victory and by helping split the anti-Sandinista vote. The Gipper must be turning in his grave.

Some will be tempted to conclude that Mr. Ortega's return amounts to a revival of the cold war dynamic in the Western Hemisphere and, in particular, to a retrospective impugning of Reagan's policy in Central America. Some might also be inclined to see the vote as a confirmation that the radical left is sweeping Latin America and that the Venezuelan leader Hugo Chávez, who supported Mr. Ortega and provides municipalities under Sandinista governments with fertilizer and oil, has scored a strategic victory.

That would be giving too much credit to Nicaragua, which is today a political and economic pygmy in the region; to left-wing radicalism, which had little to do with Mr. Ortega's comeback; and to Mr. Chávez, whose favored candidates were recently repudiated in Peru and in Mexico, the two countries where he concentrated most of his efforts.

Daniel Ortega's comeback is the result of two factors. One is the power-sharing pact that the former President Arnoldo Alemán sealed with the Sandinistas in 1999, with a view to protecting himself and his Liberal Constitutionalist cronies from charges of corruption after leaving office. (It didn't work out well for Mr. Alemán, who in 2003 was given a 20-year sentence.) The deal they came up with gave Mr. Ortega, who was politically moribund at the time, the kiss of life and gave the Sandinistas seats on the Supreme Court and control of some key institutions, including the election authority.

DOJ_NMG_0092837

The other factor was Mr. Ortega's betrayal of his own creed. The Sandinista leader shed his Marxist rhetoric and, conscious of the need to seduce a profoundly Catholic nation, mended fences with the Roman Catholic Church he had once persecuted. His old nemesis, Cardinal Miguel Obando, presided over the religious (should I say bourgeois?) ceremony in which Mr. Ortega married his longtime partner last year.

The man responsible for the infamous "piñata" — a series of laws put in place just before he lost power in 1990 that allowed the Sandinista leaders to take for themselves confiscated property worth hundreds of millions of dollars — is now talking about his respect for private property and foreign investment.

He has tossed the olive green fatigues and the red and black flag; his campaign colors were pink and turquoise, and his theme song a Spanish version of John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance." He apologized for the massacre of the indigenous Miskito people that took place in the north of the country during his first regime and, finally, he instructed his legislators to vote for a bill banning abortion even in cases of a threat to the woman's life.

What this farcical saga tells us is that Daniel Ortega was much more interested in being president than in being principled and, more important, that anyone who wants to lead today's Nicaragua needs to persuade voters that he will respect the rule of law and private property, will try to lure investment and will be sensitive to the nation's religious heritage. The fact that Mr. Ortega's past conduct casts a shadow over the proclamation that he is a reformed character does not detract from the fact that Nicaragua has not voted for radical leftist policies.

What about the broader claims — that Mr. Ortega's victory is a confirmation that radical left-wing politics are back in Latin America? True, in addition to Mr. Chávez, leftists have taken power in Brazil, Chile, Panama, and Uruguay. (Mr. Chávez's efforts have apparently led the Bush administration to quietly lift a ban on the training of military personnel from 11 Latin American countries in the United States.) But these other Latin American socialists belong to the "vegetarian left" rather than the "carnivorous left." Other than the occasional Castro-like rhetorical flourish, the new leaders are avoiding the mistakes of the old left, including confrontation with the United States and Europe, fiscal profligacy and nationalization of industry.

Hugo Chávez has been unable to reproduce his regime in any other country except in Bolivia, where President Evo Morales is now increasingly unpopular and has been forced to backtrack on some of his revolutionary announcements. Mr. Morales, for example, campaigned on a promise to force the nationalization of Bolivia's natural gas fields, but last month came to a deal in which two major Brazilian companies agreed to share revenues and operate as service providers to the state energy company. He even sent his vice president to Washington in July to appeal to the White House for renewed trade preferences.

And in the week since his victory, Mr. Ortega has been sending the signal that he thinks joining the "vegetarians" will bring him more credit than being a clone of Hugo Chávez without the oil. "No one is going to allow the seizure of property big or small," he told a group of Nicaraguan businessmen after his victory. "We need to eradicate poverty, but you don't do that by getting rid of investment and those who have resources."

Now, whether the moderate left will continue to enjoy the support of the masses is an entirely different question. Since many of these new leaders are not engaging in systematic reform, it is likely that voters will hold them to account should their economies — now buoyed by the forces of globalization, through rising exports and foreign investment — start to sag. But for the moment, it's their show, and the carnivores are outside looking in.

In a sense, these moderate left-wing leaders, perhaps now including Mr. Ortega, are a lot more in sync with what Ronald Reagan and his men were aiming for in Central America in the 1980s than Oliver North would care to admit. As they fall over themselves pandering to the church, the business community and conservative voters, there's little time left over for creating a New Man.

Ortega's Encore (TIME)

By Tim Padgett

Time, November 13, 2006

Jaime Morales was a wealthy Nicaraguan bankerÂ in the 1980s when Daniel Ortega stole his six-bedroom house. Ortega, who was then Nicaragua's President, called it a justified "confiscation" on behalf of the Marxist revolution that he and his Sandinista Front were leading. Morales became a leader of the U.S.-backed contra army that waged a civil war with the Sandinistas. That conflict killed 30,000 people and led to Ortega's ouster in a 1990 election--after which he paid Morales for the house.

It's a sign of either Ortega's maturation or his opportunism--or both--that when he recaptured Nicaragua's presidency in the Nov. 5 election, his running mate was none other than Morales. Ortega still wears that drowsy look of arrogant defiance, speaks in the same mumbling cadence and insists on driving his SUV himself to cultivate a populist image. But with Morales beside him in a Managua hotel ballroom, schmoozing local and foreign investors, Ortega sounds like a changed man. "We won't eradicate poverty by eradicating capital or alienating investors but by joining forces with them," he says. Ortega is playing to the audience, but even former rivals believe that his evolution from communist strongman to nascent capitalist may be genuine. Says Morales: "Daniel Ortega deserves a chance to vindicate himself."

DOJ_NMG_0092838

That, of course, is exactly what some in Washington are afraid of. Ortega's turn-back-the-clock triumph has rekindled memories of Washington's cold war obsession with Nicaragua, which embroiled the U.S. in a bloody guerrilla campaign and nearly doomed the Reagan presidency. Although Nicaragua, a nation of 5.5 million, is one of the poorest countries in the western hemisphere, the prospect of an Ortega restoration prompted the Bush Administration to threaten to cut off more than $200 million in total aid to the country and moved cold warriors like former U.S. Marine Lieut. Colonel Oliver North to fly to Managua to campaign against him. The U.S. is concerned that Ortega will become another boisterously anti-American voice of Latin America's new left, which is led by Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez. When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with her advisory committee on democracy promotion last week, Richard Soudriette, president of the Washington-based International Foundation for Election Systems, volunteered that he had just returned from Nicaragua. "Coming from Oklahoma," he told her, "where we're familiar with people who are born again, it appears that the future President, Daniel Ortega, is at least claiming that he has had a change of heart." Rice answered tersely, "We'll see."

Ortega still likes to take shots at Washington--in one of his victory speeches, he said Bush "is seeking to start wars with the whole world"--but he has strived to adopt a more moderate look. His campaign anthem this year was sung to the tune of John Lennon's Give Peace a Chance. To underscore his warmer, fuzzier incarnation, supporters often wore pink to rallies instead of the party's more militant red and black. But whether Ortega has shed his penchant for cynicism is another question. He and his Sandinista comrades were global guerrilla heroes when they overthrew the brutal dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979. As Nicaragua's Marxist comandante, Ortega was widely criticized for being as incompetent and corrupt as he was authoritarian. Those who know him say his quest to regain the presidency--he lost elections in 1996 and 2001--stemmed less from leftist ideals than from a raw need to accumulate power and avenge his 1990 humiliation. In 2000 he formed an alliance with President Arnoldo AlemÃ¡n--a right-wing Somoza acolyte who was later jailed for embezzlement--that helped the Sandinistas dominate Congress and the courts. In 2001 a Sandinista judge who had been a high-ranking official in Ortega's first government dismissed charges by Ortega's stepdaughter ZoilamÃ©rica NarvÃ¡ez that Ortega had sexually abused her when she was a girl in the 1980s. Ortega denied the charges, but the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights said the case had merit. (Ortega's wife and NarvÃ¡ez's mother, poet Rosario Murillo, stands by Ortega.)

Ortega may have trouble solidifying his hold on power, as he won with only 38% of the vote. That was still 9 percentage points ahead of his nearest rival, U.S.-backed banker Eduardo Montealegre, leading some to conclude that Ortega profited from voter backlash against perceived U.S. meddling in the election. However, a bigger problem than Yanqui interference may have been Yanqui neglect. After Ortega was ousted from power in 1990, the U.S. did little to help war-ravaged Nicaragua get back on its feet. "We got rid of the Sandinistas and said everything else would take care of itself," says Michael Shifter, vice president for policy at the Washington-based think tank Inter-American Dialogue. "That created a lot of discontent" that aided Ortega's eventual comeback. The new Ortega may still prove to be the old caudillo, but his victory is a reminder of the price the U.S. so often pays for prematurely declaring its missions accomplished. With reporting by Tim Rogers/Managua, Elaine Shannon/ Washington

Felipe Calderón (TIME)

Time, November 13, 2006

What sort of initiatives do you plan to pursue in your first 100 days in office?

I have clearly established three priorities: combatting poverty, creating jobs--which was the principal platform of my campaign--and improving public security. Regarding poverty, I want to create a public-policy consensus, above all in education and health, that will let me move ahead quickly, and I'll need support from the Congress for these budget priorities. As for employment, I insisted during my campaign--and I still insist--that we need a competitive, job-creating economy. But in order to have that, you have to make market conditions more competitive, and that means reducing the monopoly power of some public and private companies. Third, public safety is the most difficult challenge we face. I hope to push through reforms that will address judicial and law-enforcement problems.

In the U.S., people say that Mexico is just next door, but it seems to be thousands of miles away economically, while China is thousands of miles away, but it seems to be just next door economically. Why is the Mexican economy so far behind?

There are several elements we need to reform in order to become more competitive. One is a system based on the rule of law. According to one study, the difference between developing economies that observe the rule of law and economies that don't is a more-than-3% growth in GDP. There is a lot of room for improvement in Mexico's government and judicial practices. Second,

DOJ_NMG_0092839

I am considering reducing the tax rate in order to promote a tax system that is competitive with other developing countries, such as China. Third, we need to create more jobs to take advantage of the growing number of young people entering the workforce each year.

Immigration has become one of the hottest topics in U.S. politics. Could you give me your view on this divisive issue from your side of the border?

I cannot imagine the future of North America--Canada, the U.S., Mexico--without a free market. Free in all senses of the word, in terms of goods and services and in terms of labor too. You cannot have an efficient and prosperous economy, even in the U.S., without developing a single, free market. On the other hand, I realize how important the immigration problem is for Americans. It is the same for Mexico. Every year we lose the best of our people: young, responsible, hardworking people. In Mexico you see a lot of towns made up of only women and the elderly. That is not exactly the country we want to have. I believe that migration is a bilateral problem, and it needs to be solved by creating jobs in Mexico. First we need to create a framework in order to promote investment in Mexico. Then we need to come up with government-sponsored works projects to create new jobs. My philosophy is that to stop migration, it is better to build a road in MichoacÃ¡n than a wall in Texas.

Our 'Africa' Lenses (WP)

By Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie

The Washington Post, November 13, 2006

Growing up in Nsukka, a small university town in eastern Nigeria, I often had malaria. It was so commonplace that when you went to the medical center, a nurse would say, "Malaria has come again, hasn't it?" Because I know how easily treatable malaria is, I was surprised to learn that thousands of people die from it each year. People like the relatives of David Banda, Madonna's adopted son from Malawi.

But of course most American media do not say "Malawi"; they just say "Africa." I realized that I was African when I came to the United States. Whenever Africa came up in my college classes, everyone turned to me. It didn't matter whether the subject was Namibia or Egypt; I was expected to know, to explain.

I reject this facile compression of a varied continent into a monolithic country, but I have also come to accept that African nations do have much in common with one another. Most have a history of European colonization. Most also have a failure of leadership, a long line of presidents and prime ministers and heads of state all intent on the plunder of the state.

And so I was wearing my "African" lenses as I watched Madonna on television, cautiously, earnestly explaining the media circus around her adoption. I did not think it my place to wonder what her motivation for adoption was. I did cringe, however, when she said that her greatest disappointment was that the media frenzy would discourage people who wanted to do the same thing that she had done: adopt an African child. She wanted people to go to Africa and see what she had seen; she wanted them, too, to adopt.

Later, watching David Banda's biological father speak about being grateful that she would give David a "better life," I could not help but look away. The power differential was so stark, so heartbreakingly sad; there was something about it that made Africa seem terribly dispensable.

Madonna will give David a better life, at least a materially better life: better food, housing, books. Whether this will make him a happier and normatively better human being is open to debate. What really matters is not Madonna's motivation or her supposed flouting of Malawian adoption laws (as though non-celebrities would not also hasten adoption processes if they could). Rather, it is the underlying notion that she has helped Africa by adopting David Banda, that one helps Africa by adopting Africa's children.

It is easy to romanticize poverty, to see poor people as inherently lacking agency and will. It is easy to strip them of human dignity, to reduce them to objects of pity. This has never been clearer than in the view of Africa from the American media, in which we are shown poverty and conflicts without any context.

If I were not African, I would, after watching the coverage, think of Africa as a place of magnificent wild animals in which black Africans exist as tour guides, or as a place of desperately poor people who kill or are killed by one another for little or no reason.

I once watched CNN's Anderson Cooper, who is undoubtedly well-meaning, interview a Belgian (who, we were told, was a "Congo expert") about the conflict in that country, while Congolese people stood in the background and watched. Surely there was a Congolese who was qualified to speak about Congo. Surely there are Congolese who are working just as hard as the foreigners and who don't fit into the category of either killer or killed. Surely the future for Africa should be one in which Africans are in a position to raise their own children.

Which brings me back to Madonna. I applauded her funding of orphanages in Malawi. I wish, however, that instead of asking television viewers to go to Africa and adopt, she had asked them to send a check to malaria-eradication organizations. I wish she had added, after one of those thoughtfully dramatic pauses, that Africa cannot depend on aid alone, that aid is like salted peanuts: The more failed leaders got, the more they wanted. I wish she had said that she was setting up an organization to use donations as micro-credit and that this organization, by the way, would be run by locals rather than expatriate staff members who would raise rents out of the reach of the people they were supposed to be helping.

DOJ_NMG_0092840

I wish she had pointed out, with suitable celebrity-style rage, that Western countries need to stop appeasing and propping up hopeless African leaders, that Western banks must stop enabling and accepting stolen money from these leaders, that Western donors who insist on the free movement of capital across borders must also insist on the free movement of labor. I wish she had then shown, with graphs on the screen, how these things affect the father and relatives of David Banda.

Of course this isn't really about Madonna. It is about a formula that well-meaning people have adopted in looking at Africa, a surface-only, let's-ignore-the-real-reasons template that African experiences have all been forced to fit in order to be authentically "African." If I were not African, I wonder whether it would be clear to me that Africa is a place where the people do not need limp gifts of fish but sturdy fishing rods and fair access to the pond. I wonder whether I would realize that while African nations have a failure of leadership, they also have dynamic people with agency and voices. I wonder whether I would know that Africa has class divisions, that wealthy Africans who have not stolen from their countries actually exist. I wonder whether I would know that corrupt African countries are also full of fiercely honest people and that violent conflicts are about resource control in an environment of (sometimes artificial) scarcity.

DOJ_NMG_0092841

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, November 13, 2006 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, November 13, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061113.pdf; agnb061113.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ To Argue For Ressam Sentence Before 9th Circuit Panel....2

War News:

Democrats Will Seek To Begin Withdrawing Troops From Iraq....3
White House Readies For "Busy Week" On Iraq Policy....4
White House Downplays Honors For Bush Iraq Advisers....5
Iraqi Prime Minister Announces Government Shake-Up....5
Iraqi Government Scheduling Mass Executions....6
Three US Soldiers Killed As Violence Claims 159 Lives In Iraq....6
Bolten Says Partitioning Iraq Not A Good Idea....7
Dalai Lama Urges That Saddam's Life Be Spared....7
Afghan Insurgents Launching Over 600 Attacks Per Month....7
Pakistani PM Says Military Action Alone Not Enough To Defeat Terrorists....7

Corporate Scandals:

KB Home CEO Resigns Amid Options Probe....8
Convicted Officials Forced To Sell Assets....8

Criminal Law:

Probes Focus On Halliburton's Role In Nigerian Bribery....8
Witness Against DC Murder Inc. Gang Gains Freedom....9
ID Thieves Often Close To Family....9
Maritime Officials Crack Down On Modern-Day Pirates....9
Report: Sighting Of Fugitive Mobster Discredited....10
Police Believe Maryland FedEx Shooting Was Random....10
Many DC Homicides Sparked By Petty Disputes....10
Virginia State Police Opt For Fewer Coded Messages....10

Civil Law:

WPost Says "Partial Birth" Law Before High Court Identical To Previous Case....11

Civil Rights:

Television Show About Sexual Predators Raises Rights Issues....11
WSJournal Criticizes Wal-Mart, Costco Gender Discrimination Lawsuits....11

Antitrust:

Private Equity Fund Buyouts Come Under Scrutiny....12

Environment:

Snowe, Rockefeller Blast New Exxon CEO Over Global Warming....12

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Attorneys Challenge Arrest Of Accused Arellano Félix Cartel Leader....12
Man Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Case....12
Grand Jury In Rhode Island Indicts 7 In Drug-Trafficking Case....13
DEA Agent Says "Pro-Pot" Advocates Relay Misinformation....13
Authorities Link Colombian Nationals To Jewelry Theft Ring 13
Report Says Drug Trade Fuels Insurgency In Afghanistan....13

Immigration:

Virginia Courthouse Behavior Unravels Vast Immigrant Marriage Scam....14
Democrats Take Cautious Stance On Immigration....14

Congress-Administration:

Bush 41, Baker Thought To Have Engineered White House Shake-Up....14
Democrats Want To Deal With Gates Nomination During Lame-Duck....16
Democrats, Bush Seen As Likely To Cooperate On Few Issues....17
Full Agenda Planned For Lame-Duck, But Progress May Be Limited....18
Bolton Not Expected To Win Confirmation....18

Automakers To Press Bush On Health Care, Weak Yen..... 19
Bolten Says Bush Would Conditionally Support Minimum Wage Hike 19
Dean Cautions Democrats To "Be Careful" Regarding Tax Cuts 20
Pelosi Will Push To Require Identification Of Earmark Sponsors 20
Stark Says Democrats Need To Move Quickly To Revamp Medicare Drug Plan 21
Parties May Clash On Science, Technology Issues..... 21
Bolten Sees GOP Losses As An Opportunity For Bush 21
Pelosi Backs Murtha In Race For House Majority Leader..... 22
Pence Praised As Candidate For House Minority Leader Post 22
Lieberman Declines To Rule Out Future Party Switch 22
McConnell Unopposed For Senate Minority Leader 23
Most FEHBP Enrollees Will Not See Premiums Increase 23
NYTimes Urges Democrats To Focus On Appropriations Oversight 23
NYTimes Says Democrats, GOP Must Address Trade Deficit23

Other News:

Rove's Pre-Election Optimism Scrutinized 24
Steele Expresses Interest In RNC Post 25
Democratic Georgia Incumbents Buck Countervailing Trend To Survive 25
Tester Described As "Your Grandfather's Democrat."..... 25
Debate Underway Over Whether Democratic Wins Amount To "Wave." 26
McCain Forms '08 Exploratory Committee 26
Biden To Announce Plans On Exploratory Committee Next Year 27
Senatorial Experience May Not Serve Obama Well If He Seeks Presidency..... 28
Polls Show Clinton's Still Hampered By Public's "Entrenched" Views 28
Elder Bush, Clinton Address Realtors Convention In New Orleans 28
Ford Becomes Oldest Living President In History..... 28
Acumen Fund Designed To Be "Philanthropic Venture" Fund 28
Liberals Urged To Co-Opt "Values" Debate..... 29
WSJournal Notes World Bank Study Says Simple Tax Systems Promote Growth 29
Bush To Visit Vietnam This Week 29
Bush To Discuss Trade With Putin..... 30
Seoul Rejects US-Led Measures To Sanction North 30
Olmert Arrives In Washington For Talks On Palestinian Conflict, Iran..... 30
Cabinet Resignations Shake Beirut 32
Iran Says It Will Retaliate If Attacked By Israel 32
Islamists Capture Somali Town 32
Chinese Sub Stalked US Aircraft Carrier Last Month 33
US Says Castro's Health Deteriorating..... 33
UN Official Meets With "Brutal" Ugandan Leader 33
Al Jazeera Seeks To Extends Its Reach, Influence 33
Ortega's Transformation In 2006 Campaign Examined 33
Calderon Describes Immigration In Context Of Free Markets34
US Media Coverage Of Africa Criticized 34

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 34

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 35

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ To Argue For Ressam Sentence Before 9th Circuit Panel. The AP (11/13, Johnson) reports, "The Justice Department says there is 'precious little' to explain why Ahmed Ressam received a sentence of only 22 years for plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on the eve of the millennium. Ressam's lawyers say the sentence was a decade too long." The AP continues, "A three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear their arguments Monday. … Both sides are challenging aspects of the punishment U.S. District Judge John C. Coughenour imposed last year. Ressam's lawyers, Thomas Hillier and Michael Filipovic, believe that one of the nine counts he was convicted of should be thrown out, which would reduce the sentence by 10 years." The AP adds, "The U.S. Attorney's Office has suggested that Coughenour's decision to sentence Ressam to less than the 35 years it requested may have been colored by a distaste for the Bush administration's treatment of 'enemy combatants.' In their appeal, prosecutors repeatedly cited Coughenour's comments at sentencing, when he said Ressam's case illustrated that U.S. courts are plenty capable of handling terrorism cases. … 'We did not need to use a secret military tribunal,' the judge said at the time, 'or detain the defendant indefinitely as an enemy combatant, or deny him the right to counsel, or invoke any proceedings beyond those guaranteed by or contrary to the United States Constitution.'" The AP notes, "Customs agents in Port Angeles, across the Strait of Juan de Fuca from Canada, caught Ressam with explosives in the trunk of his rental car when he arrived by ferry in December 1999. The arrest prompted the cancellation of millennium celebrations at Seattle's Space Needle. He was convicted of terrorism and explosives charges at trial in 2001, then decided to tell investigators what he knew about al-Qaida in an effort to win a shorter sentence."

DOJ_NMG_0092844

WAR NEWS:

Democrats Will Seek To Begin Withdrawing Troops From Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Miller, 850K) reports Democrats appearing on the Sunday political shows said they "would press to begin a phased U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq within four to six months, part of an agenda aimed at overhauling key aspects of U.S. policy in the Middle East." But senior White House officials "countered that setting timetables for U.S. troop withdrawals would weaken the Iraq government and embolden insurgents." Still, they "acknowledged a need for fresh ideas on Iraq and expressed a new willingness to negotiate with Democrats on an array of foreign policy issues. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten indicated that the president would block legislation calling for a scheduled withdrawal." The front-page New York Times (11/13, Stolberg, Mazzetti, 1.16M) story paints the White House as conciliatory, saying the Administration "signaled a willingness to listen to the Democrats' proposals," with Bolten "saying in two television appearances that the president was open to 'fresh ideas' and a 'fresh look.'"

The Financial Times (11/13, Guha, Eaglesham) says that while "courteous in tone, the renewed sparring shows how difficult it will be to sustain the bipartisan approach to government pledged by leaders of both parties following last week's vote, in which the Democrats won control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years." A Washington Times (11/13, Pfeiffer, 88K) report is more blunt, saying that Joseph Biden of Foreign Relations and Carl Levin of Armed Services, the "two top Senate Democrats on foreign policy yesterday said they will introduce a resolution in January calling for troops to start being withdrawn from Iraq by this summer, a move that Sen. John McCain said would put the U.S. in the worst of both worlds." USA Today (11/13, 4A, 2.27M) also runs a summary of the Sunday morning back-and-forth.

Bolten said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "Everybody's objective here is to succeed in Iraq. I think that's true of Democrats as well as Republicans. What the President has said is that we need to get fresh eyes on the problem. We need a fresh perspective. And that's why he has his Pentagon" and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace "conducting a review of all of our options in Iraq. He's asked his other national security agencies to do the same in parallel. We're looking forward to the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton bipartisan Iraq Study Group. And we're looking forward to a dialogue with bipartisan leaders in Congress." On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Bolten made an almost identical case, noting the reviews by the Pentagon and other agencies and the upcoming Baker-Hamilton report.

As for a timetable, Bolten said on ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), "I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out, because that could be a true disaster for the Iraqi people. But what we've always been prepared to do and remain prepared to do is…put pressure on the Iraqi government to take over themselves. It's what Prime Minister Maliki wants himself to do."

Senate Democrats Say Change In Course Needed. On CBS's Face the Nation (11/12, Schieffer) Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said, "We need to have a redeployment in Iraq. What does that mean, pull everybody out now? Of course not. But it does mean that we need to change our operation there to counterinsurgency, better training and force protection. Number two, we need to revitalize the reconstruction. … And also what we need to do is have a regional conference led by the President of the United States and participated in by Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Egypt, Syria. It's a regional problem. It's not all our problem."

On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Levin said, "First order of business is to change the direction of Iraq policy. The people spoke dramatically, overwhelmingly, resoundingly to change the course in Iraq, in a message that was heard around the world. I hope it was heard in the White House."

DOJ_NMG_0092845

Biden, also on ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), said the only leverage Democrats have "is international and domestic public opinion, and, most importantly, the pressure coming from [the President's] own Republican colleagues. The last thing the senators who are up for reelection in 2008 want is to be saddled with a continued failure in Iraq as a consequence of Republican policy, that is the President's policy."

Sen. Charles Schumer said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "The present strategy in Iraq is not working, and there needs to be a change in course. Many of us took the fact that Secretary Rumsfeld is no longer defense secretary as a first step, a signal that they were open to new ideas. And we'd like very much to work with the President and try to get some kind of change of course in Iraq."

Iraq Debate Expected To Spark Dissension In Democratic Camp. Newsweek (11/20, Darman, 3.12M) reports, "The most difficult debate facing the Democrats will be over Iraq. After six years of decrying their lack of oversight on military policy, party leaders now have co-ownership of the Iraq account. Many Democrats say the party should focus its energy on pressing the White House for a change of course in current policy, rather than dredging up old debates over the manner in which the administration took the country to war. But Carl Levin, the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, says he also intends to demand access to some 58 internal Defense Department memos dealing with prewar Iraq intelligence and military planning. These memos involve the Pentagon's Office of Special Plans and the Counter-Terrorism Policy Evaluation Group, two secretive units that have been accused of cooking the books on Saddam's weapons of mass destruction and alleged ties to Al Qaeda."

U.S. News and World Report (11/20, Brush, 2.03M) reports, "The new crop of Democrats is a pretty varied lot-Iraq veterans, antiwar candidates, social conservatives, gun-control foes, fiscal hawks. … Indeed, the election of majority leader-a contest likely to pit John Murtha, the Pennsylvania Vietnam vet who called for troop redeployments, against current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, who's more cautious on Iraq-is already exposing the deep tensions within the party."

U.S. News and World Report's Gloria Borger (11/20) writes, "This election wasn't really about the Democrats. It was about the other guys-and how they couldn't run Washington or manage the war. There was no Democratic agenda beyond their 'Had Enough?' bumper sticker. Did it work? Yep. But did it produce a mandate? Nope-at least not beyond the marching orders to clean up Washington, fix Iraq, and get something done. It's a huge opportunity for the Democrats. If they're smart, they'll find a way to grab it-and fast. Immigration reform and the minimum wage top the list. Then, of course, there's finding a way out of Iraq. That's what the voters want."

Pelosi Calls US Troops In Iraq "A Magnet For Terrorists." In an interview with Time (11/20, Bacon, 4.03M) House minority leader Nancy Pelosi was asked if she would like to see "at least 30,000 troops…home from Iraq by this time next year," Pelosi responded, "Yes. I would hope at least that number would be out of harm's way. They are viewed as an occupation force. Our presence there is a magnet for terrorists."

Lieberman A "Wild Card" On Iraq In Senate. The Washington Post (11/13, A4, Murray, 690K) writes that along with the election of "war critics" like Sherrod Brown, Bernard Sanders, and James Webb to the Senate last week, voters "also gave a fourth term to Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, a staunch supporter of the war, and in the narrowly divided Senate that will convene in January, the veteran Connecticut Democrat is positioning himself to become a key figure in discussions" about US Iraq policy. And "both sides are seeking to please this political wild card."

White House Readies For "Busy Week" On Iraq Policy. The CBS Evening News (11/12, lead story, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) led with the White House's preparations for "a busy week, one that could set in motion a change of policy in Iraq. The President meets this week with a group of advisors charged with re-examining US involvement there." And it is "back to the future for the President with friends of his father, front and center." CBS (Chen) added, "He is politically bruised and heading into the lame duck years of his term, but the President's team says don't count him out just yet." White House Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten: "As of today, we have 800 days left in this Administration, which is a long time." Chen: On Monday morning, "Bush meets with the Iraq Study Group, aiming to take on the single issue that cost his party most of the polls. As he tries to salvage his own legacy, Mr. Bush is turning to help from some old hands, wise men from his father's Administration. … The crew is full of familiar faces from the first Bush Administration: James Baker, former Secretary of State; longtime confidante and former Wyoming Sen. Allen Simpson; and Lawrence Eagleberger, also a key player for 'Bush 41.' He steps in for Robert Gates, the former President's CIA Director. Gates was tapped last week to take over the Pentagon in a post-election concession that the current approach to Iraq isn't working." The report also mentioned the Newsweek poll pegging the President's at "just 31%, that is a new low. But if it is any consolation to him, it is still two points higher than his father's lowest point."

DOJ_NMG_0092846

McCain Reiterates His Call For Additional US Troops In Iraq. Sen. John McCain, on NBC's Meet the Press (11/12, Russert), said, "I believe that a withdrawal, or a date for withdrawal, will lead to chaos in the region, and most military experts think the same thing. I believe that there are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops. Now, if you want to give up on Iraq, then fine, and take the consequences. I think there will be chaos in the region. But we need to control this insurgency, we need to embed people with the police and the military, we need to clear and hold -- and hold is the important part -- so we can expand areas of security." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, also on NBC's Meet the Press (11/12, Russert), said, "I wouldn't send more troops just for the sake of sending more troops. But I would if it is tied to a success strategy."

Kristol, Kagan Say Bush Should Send More Troops. In a Financial Times (11/13, Kagan, Kristol) op-ed, William Kristol and Robert Kagan of the Weekly Standard write, "Instead of looking for a face-saving way to lose in Iraq," Bush "could finally demand of his top advisers a strategy to succeed: provide the US force levels necessary to achieve even minimal political objectives. This could begin by increasing US troops in Iraq by at least 50,000 in order to clear and hold Baghdad without shifting troops from other parts of Iraq. These operations could then be expanded into areas of insurgency. This strategy would not stabilise the country right away but could secure Iraq's vital centre and provide real hope for progress."

Harvard Scholar Says "Iraq Is Gone." In a Washington Post (11/13, A21, 690K) op-ed, Monica Duffy Toft of Harvard's Kennedy School of Government writes under the headline "Iraq Is Gone. Now What?" that Iraq "is rapidly disintegrating, and there is no longer anything that can stop the disintegration, save perhaps an invasion by Israel, Iran or Syria." The US "is now faced with an awful choice: leave and allow events to run their course or lend its dwindling support to one or more of the emerging states. … It is high time" the US and its allies "began national discussions about the relative merits of leaving or staying and, if they stay, about the merits of supporting the Sunnis, Shiites or Kurds. Either way, what we now think of as Iraq is almost certainly as gone as what we once thought of as Yugoslavia, and for the same reasons."

White House Downplays Honors For Bush Iraq Advisers. The Washington Post (11/13, A19, Williamson, 690K) reports that on Wednesday, "on the hung-over morning after midterm voters told President Bush what they thought of the Iraq war, a White House news release arrived in our inbox, with the cryptic subject line 'PERSONNEL ANNOUNCEMENT.' Hidden therein was a list of this year's National Medal of Arts and National Humanities Medal winners, to be honored the next day by the president and first lady Laura Bush in the Oval Office. No invite, no number to call for information, just a list." The Post adds, "Why so little fanfare? Could it have been because the humanities honorees included Middle East scholars-turned-Bush advisers Fouad Ajami and Bernard Lewis, whose views helped get us into Iraq in the first place? On the day of the prestigious ceremony, the White House Web site featured -- nothing."

Iraqi Prime Minister Announces Government Shake-Up. Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki Sunday announced that he was planning a major shake-up of his cabinet. The New York Times (11/13, Semple, 1.16M) says the move is aimed at "redress[ing] his six-month-old government's failure to curb widespread corruption, reduce sectarian violence and improve public services." Speaking to a closed session of Parliament, Maliki "suggested that some of his ministers were incompetent but said he had been forced to accept his cabinet under pressure from the country's major political blocs." During the session, Maliki "did not disclose which ministers he planned to replace. But legislators close to the prime minister said he did not intend to change the political distribution of the cabinet seats," which is mostly Shiite. The Times notes that the Maliki administration "has been facing mounting criticism from American officials and some Iraqi leaders impatient with the prime minister's inability -- or unwillingness -- to disarm militias, particularly those linked to the most powerful Shiite parties that form the basis of his ruling political alliance."

DOJ_NMG_0092847

The Financial Times (11/13, Negus) reports that the declaration is "part of an apparent push to revive an initiative to bring the country's quarrelling sectarian blocs into a national pact, after the government was accused by both Sunni and Shia of failing to protect them." According to the Times, "Criticisms have focused on the vital interior and defence ministries, which control the security forces," and warns that "in choosing new ministers, Mr. Maliki will face the challenge of winning approval from parties that have seen little interest in reaching compromises, and instead appear to have sought control over government agencies to give them an edge in the country's sectarian conflict."

In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/13, A1, Raghavan, 690K) calls the shake-up "the latest blow to US and Iraqi efforts to strengthen the country's fledgling security forces." According to Hasan Suneid, a lawmaker and close aide of the prime minister's, Maliki "told lawmakers in the closed session that he had been forced to accept ministers chosen by political blocs and that some were incompetent" and "asked the blocs to nominate new people for his cabinet, based more on their qualifications than on their political loyalties."

The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Zavis, 850K) reports Maliki "scolded lawmakers at a closed Parliament session Sunday for putting sectarian concerns over national interests," and later "told journalist he has authorized the use of 'extreme force' against private militias blamed for surging bloodshed between Iraq's dominant Muslim sects that has claimed more lives lately than the anti-U.S. insurgency." USA Today (11/13, 2.27M), Los Angeles Times (11/13, Zavis, 850K) and Washington Times/AP (11/13, Hurst) also report the story.

Sadr Seen As Losing Hold On His Base. The New York Times (11/13, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports on the "taming" of Moktada al-Sadr, and says "the more settled he becomes in the establishment, the looser his grip is over his fighters on the streets and those increasingly infiltrating the security forces. In the two years since they fought against American tanks at Mr. Sadr's command, many have broken away from the confines of compromise that bind him, and have taken a far more active role in killing, something his supporters say worries him. He says he is trying to weed them out -- 40 were publicly dismissed last month." The Times adds, "The increasing violence of some of his followers mirrors the overall unraveling of Iraq, which has become less centrally controlled and far more criminal since the American invasion in 2003."

USA Today (11/13, Jervis, 2.27M), under the headline "Cleric Al-Sadr May Hold Iraq's Future In His Hands," says Sadr "has emerged as one of the most powerful forces in Iraq, commanding a large militia and a growing political organization. … As President Bush and the Democrats in charge of a new Congress plot a new direction in Iraq, al-Sadr remains a huge obstacle unless the Iraqi government does what it has been unwilling or unable to do so far: neutralize him through political negotiations or a military confrontation."

Iraqi Government Scheduling Mass Executions. Time (11/20, Bennett, 4.03M) reports, "Since September 2005, when three men were hanged in the southwestern city of Kut after being convicted of running a murder-and-kidnapping ring, the Iraqi government has executed 50 prisoners convicted of murder or kidnapping, says spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh. An adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki says the government plans to execute 'two or three more batches of 14 or 15 each' in the coming months."

Three US Soldiers Killed As Violence Claims 159 Lives In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 2, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The US military announced today three American soldiers died yesterday in fighting in Iraq's Anbar Province. Four British troops were killed and three seriously injured today in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra. A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a police recruiting center in Baghdad killing at least 35 people. And the Iraqi police and military reported finding at least 75 dead bodies today in Baghdad and Baqubah. Officials say around 1600 bodies were taken to Baghdad's morgues in October." The AP (11/13, Hurst) reports "raging sectarian violence…claimed at least 159 more lives, including 35 men blown apart while waiting to join Iraq's police force." The Washington Post (11/13, A1, Raghavan, 690K) also reports the story.

Fifty-Five Journalists Have Been Killed This Year. The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Peterson, 59K) reports, "The label 'independent' media in Iraq has become a death sentence, in what has become the world's most dangerous environment for local journalists. Already this year 55 Iraqi journalists have been killed -- more than any other year -- and four remain hostages. … A growing number of incidents in recent months have demonstrated the insurgency and militia's power to target and intimidate. There have been a string of media murders against print, radio, and TV journalists."

DOJ_NMG_0092848

Stopping "Brutal Fanatic" Abu Deraa A Top US Priority. The Washington Times (11/13, Freeman, 88K) reports, "Less than six months after an American air strike ended Abu Musab Zarqawi's campaign of Sunni terrorism, an equally brutal fanatic has emerged on the Shi'ite side of the religious divide." Abu Deraa's "trademark method of killing is a drill through the skull rather than a sword to the neck, but his work rate is just as prolific as the former al Qaeda in Iraq leader's and shows the same diabolical artistry. In the past year, he and his followers are thought to have killed thousands of Sunnis, their victims' bodies symbolically dumped in road craters left by al Qaeda car bombs." The Times adds, "Stopping monsters such as Abu Deraa -- whose nom de guerre means 'the shield' -- is a top US priority as it tries to halt sectarian violence, which regularly claims 100 lives a day." But "the Shi'ite-dominated government has shown a marked reluctance to sanction the kind of large-scale operation necessary to arrest him in his stronghold of Sadr City, a vast Shi'ite slum in eastern Baghdad."

Bolten Says Partitioning Iraq Not A Good Idea. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "Most of the experts that I have heard from, and certainly almost all of the Iraqis that have been heard from, think that some sort of partition is a bad idea. Now, federalism is a notion that has always been in mind in constructing a modern, democratic and multi-ethnic Iraq. So somewhere on that continuum there is the right solution. Partition does not seem to be the right solution."

Dalai Lama Urges That Saddam's Life Be Spared. AFP (11/12) reports, "Tibet's exiled spiritual leader the Dalai Lama has appealed for Saddam Hussein's life to be spared, saying the deposed Iraqi president was not beyond redemption. 'The death penalty is said to fulfill a preventive function, yet it is clearly a form of revenge,' the Nobel peace laureate told reporters as he ended a two-week visit to Japan."

Afghan Insurgents Launching Over 600 Attacks Per Month. The AP (11/13, Straziuso) reports, "Insurgent activity in Afghanistan has risen fourfold this year, and militants now launch more than 600 attacks a month, a rising wave of violence that has resulted in 3,700 deaths in 2006, a bleak new report released Sunday found. … The new report said insurgents were launching more than 600 attacks a month as of the end of September, up from 300 a month at the end of March this year. The violence has killed more than 3,700 people this year, it said."

Afghan Army Struggling. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Zucchino, 850K) reports in a critical, 2,751-word front page story about frustrating efforts by the US and NATO to train the Afghan army: "Many of [its] soldiers fought for or against the Russians, against the Taliban or for various warlords — except those so young they had never picked up a rifle. From this unwieldy mix, the U.S. military and the Afghan government are attempting to create something Afghanistan has never had: a national army that is made up of all the country's ethnic groups and represents a unified central government. ... Instilling loyalty to the national government will require changing the nature of Afghanistan. The army is a place to start." However, "Afghan privates and generals alike complain that they are sent into battle in ordinary Ford Ranger pickups with no body armor or helmets ... U.S. trainers, while praising Afghans for their courage, complain of lax discipline, petty thefts and poor maintenance of weapons and equipment. The Afghans will often run up hills or charge into caves wearing virtually no armor and without waiting for backup."

Pakistani PM Says Military Action Alone Not Enough To Defeat Terrorists. The Washington Times (11/13, Pisik, 88K) reports, "Pakistan, a key ally in the war on terror, welcomes an expected reappraisal of U.S. policy in Iran and Afghanistan, and thinks military action alone is "not the answer" to the threat posed by extremists in the two countries, its prime minister says." Shaukat Aziz told the Washington Times that "he would like to see a more nuanced approach to battling extremism, which includes massive investment and economic assistance to the two countries in order to build a sense of well-being for the poor and disenfranchised." In New York for meetings at the United Nations, Aziz also "said the world needs to focus more seriously on Afghanistan's narcotics trade, which is becoming an increasingly important source of terrorist financing. By some estimates, the trade accounts for half of Afghanistan's gross domestic product."

Asked on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer) about the possibility of the US use of "drone Predator aircraft to fire missiles inside Pakistani territory against high-value terrorist targets," Aziz said, "We've always said that we are very capable of tackling such activities ourselves. Our armed forces are well-equipped. We do not allow any country to violate our sovereignty. We are committed to fighting terrorism, but it has to be fought together." Also on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer) Aziz addressed the theories about Osama Bin Laden's whereabouts. He said, "The truth is, nobody knows where he is. Because if anybody knew where he is, they would go after him. … And frankly, because of the situation in Afghanistan, it is not always possible to know who is where. We have no clue where he is. If he were ever in our territory and we found out, we would go after him."

DOJ_NMG_0092849

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KB Home CEO Resigns Amid Options Probe. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A3, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "The stock-options fraud scandal claimed one of the nation's most successful and highly paid chief executives, KB Home's Bruce Karatz, who agreed to leave the company after an internal investigation found that he backdated his own option grants to increase his pay." The Journal continues, "KB Home, a home-construction company once known as Kaufman & Broad, said Mr. Karatz would immediately leave his posts as president, CEO and chairman. He will forfeit about $13 million in gains from the backdating as part of an agreement with the company, based in Los Angeles. … Also departing is Richard B. Hirst, executive vice president and chief legal officer, and Gary A. Ray, the head of human resources. Mr. Hirst resigned, and Mr. Ray was terminated, the company said. A person familiar with the investigation said both Mr. Karatz and Mr. Hirst cooperated with the internal investigation." The Journal adds, "Mr. Karatz is one of the highest-profile casualties of the stock-options scandal, which has now claimed the jobs of more than 50 executives and directors, including William McGuire, the chief executive of UnitedHealth Group Inc. More than 130 companies, including KB Home, are under federal investigation in a wide government action. Five former executives at the companies have been charged with criminal wrongdoing. … KB Home didn't detail how the backdated options came to pass, though it said Mr. Karatz and Mr. Ray selected the dates for the options. A person familiar with the matter said that an investigation by KB Home's board determined that the dates were selected retroactively by the two men without permission of the board, though this person said the investigation didn't conclude that there had been intentional wrongdoing. The company said the misdated options were granted between 1998 and 2005."

Convicted Officials Forced To Sell Assets. USA Today (11/13, Farrell) reports, "When CEOs sell their multimillion-dollar homes, it's usually because they're relocating to a different market, or trading up to an even bigger house. .. In the case of Walter Forbes, the former Cendant chairman whose baronial 8-acre estate in New Canaan, Conn., is on the market for $12.5 million, the reasons are a little different." USA continues, "Forbes, 63, was convicted two weeks ago of conspiracy and making false statements in connection with a massive fraud that cost Cendant investors $14 billion when it was exposed in 1998. Unless his conviction is overturned on appeal, he'll be relocating, all right, but most likely to a property surrounded by thick walls and concertina wire. … As such, Forbes is poised to join the pantheon of convicted former executives who've had to sell their trophy properties or luxury toys to pay off legal bills, settle civil lawsuits or meet criminal forfeiture requirements mandated by judges."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Probes Focus On Halliburton's Role In Nigerian Bribery. The Houston Chronicle (11/13) reports, "There are new signs of life in a sprawling four-year investigation of whether a unit of Houston's Halliburton Co. and other oil-services companies paid huge bribes in the 1990s to land a $5.6 billion construction project in the Nigerian delta." The Chronicle continues, "French and Swiss investigators are trying to gain access to specific bank records in Switzerland and other European countries to determine if tens of millions of dollars in suspected bribe money ended up in accounts linked to Nigeria's former military dictator. … In Britain, police and agents from the Serious Fraud Office this summer searched four homes and a business looking for links to the case, which began in 2002 when a French oil-services executive facing corruption charges told a judge about a $175 million "slush fund" he claimed had been used to bribe Nigerian officials." The Chronicle adds, "The U.S. Department of Justice is looking into possible criminal offenses, and the Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating possible financial misdeeds. The Nigerian government is also conducting a formal investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0092850

Witness Against DC Murder Inc. Gang Gains Freedom. The Washington Times (11/13, Mcelhatton) reports, "A former high-ranking member of the Murder Inc. crime syndicate in the District, which was charged in 31 killings, has won a 'very unusual' sentence that will keep him out of prison, newly unsealed court records show." The Times continues, "Maurice Andrews, 36, former confidant of D.C. drug kingpin Kevin Gray, faced 30 years to life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines after pleading guilty to racketeering charges related to several murders. … However, in what prosecutors call a 'very unusual' request, the U.S. Attorney's Office recently sought a sentence of time served and probation. Authorities cited Andrews' role as a key government witness in the prosecution of the violent street gang. … 'He testified in dozens, literally dozens of criminal incidents that he was aware of, ranging from individual drug deals to murder,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew G. Olsen said at Andrews' Sept. 29 sentencing." The Times notes, "U.S. District Court Judge Royce C. Lamberth sentenced Andrews, who has been in the federal witness-protection program for five years, to time served and five years' probation, according to a transcript of the hearing. … The proceedings had remained sealed until last week. … Federal authorities have called Murder Inc. the most violent gang in the District's history. It ran much of the city's crack cocaine and heroin trade during the 1990s and killed potential government witnesses, authorities said. … Several leaders of the gang -- including Gray, convicted of 19 murders, and Rodney Moore, convicted of 10 murders -- are serving sentences of life in prison without parole. A jury deadlocked on giving them the death penalty."

ID Thieves Often Close To Family. The New York Times (11/13, Leland) reports, "In the five years since his divorce, Eric Wagenhauser had moved on with his life. He had remarried and was sharing custody of the three children from his first marriage. Then, last year, Mr. Wagenhauser discovered a new wrinkle on American divorce: his former wife had used the children's Social Security numbers to apply for nine credit cards in their names. She obtained two." The Times continues, "Mr. Wagenhauser's ordeal over the next year, which involved police departments in two Texas counties, banks, credit bureaus and the Social Security Administration, is familiar to many identity theft victims — the crime often begins at home. … Though most victims never learn who stole their identities, half of those who do say the thief was a family member, a friend, a neighbor or an in-home employee, according to surveys by the Federal Trade Commission and Javelin Strategy and Research, a private research firm. The surveys estimate that 9 million to 10 million Americans have their identities stolen each year." The Times adds, "Mr. Wagenhauser's former wife, Ivy Ash, began applying for credit cards in the children's names soon after the divorce. She ran up about $200 in unpaid bills, he said, which grew to about $1,000 with late fees and interest penalties. She pleaded guilty to two counts of fraudulent use of a credit card this year and is now in a Texas prison. … But the effect of the thefts is still being felt in the Wagenhauser household." The Times notes, "Identity theft involving family members takes many forms, said Betsy Broder, assistant director of the Federal Trade Commission's division of privacy and identity protection. A child steals a parent's identity to buy drugs, one sibling steals another's identity to try to avoid arrest or debt. … Identity theft is often difficult to solve and prosecute, and, in the case of families, victims may be reluctant to report relatives to the police."

Maritime Officials Crack Down On Modern-Day Pirates. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Glionna) reports from Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, "Noel Choong was working late the night he got the distress call: Just off the Malaysian coast in the darkness, a Japanese tugboat and barge were being attacked by a dozen pirates armed with AK-47s and rocket launchers." The Times continues, "The 154-man crew aboard the barge Kuroshio was frantic. As the vessel churned slowly northward through choppy waters of the Strait of Malacca, headed for Myanmar, it had suddenly been surrounded by three fishing boats. .. .The armed men stormed the little tug. Shots were fired. The captain and two others were taken hostage. The desperate barge crew plotted a rescue mission to free their shipmates, who were being held with guns to their heads." The Times adds, "Choong is a pirate catcher, a maritime crisis negotiator who handles the high-anxiety drama of modern-day pirate attacks in real time. He's also a detective, a high-seas sleuth with a host of shadowy shipping industry informants he uses to run down hijacked ships. … In the outlaw Strait of Malacca, whose waters are considered the most pirated in the world, his services as director of the International Maritime Bureau's

DOJ_NMG_0092851

Piracy Reporting Center are in near-constant demand. … The 550-mile-long channel, flanked by Singapore and Malaysia to the east and the Indonesian island of Sumatra to the west, is one of the world's most strategic international waterways and its busiest shipping lane. Each year, 60,000 vessels, the equivalent of nearly half the world's entire merchant fleet, negotiate the funnel-shaped shortcut between the Pacific and Indian oceans. They range from mammoth supertankers as large as city skyscrapers to tugs and barges. … Such seaborne commercial traffic attracts a sophisticated brand of piracy that has moved far beyond the scabbards and cutlasses of the 17th century."

Report: Sighting Of Fugitive Mobster Discredited. The Boston Globe (11/10, Abel) reports authorities in California "have investigated and discredited the latest reported sighting of fugitive Boston mobster James 'Whitey' Bulger. Bulger, 77, one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted fugitives, fled a month before his 1995 federal racketeering indictment and was later revealed to be a longtime FBI informant and charged with the murder of 19 people. … Darrell Foxworth, an FBI agent in San Diego, said he had received reports from police about the alleged sighting, but he also determined they were not legitimate."

Bulger Reportedly Sighted At Theater. The Boston Herald (11/10) reports sources "said an off-duty police officer spied…Bulger - or at least someone matching his description - leaving a downtown theater after watching the film, which stars Jack Nicholson as a dead ringer for the South Boston crime lord. … The incident is the latest possible sighting of the crime boss who vanished in 1995 as an organized crime strike force made up of state police, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Internal Revenue Service closed in. A longtime snitch, Bulger fled the night before he was indicted for 19 gruesome mob murders, thanks to a tip from his boyhood pal and longtime FBI handler John Connolly."

Police Believe Maryland FedEx Shooting Was Random. The Washington Post (11/13, B01, Bahrampour) reports, "For Marlyn Evans, the American dream was working out well. … She had emigrated from Guyana 19 years ago to give her children, Reina and Colin, a better life. After raising them and a younger daughter, Chantal, in a townhouse in Silver Spring, she moved to a spacious two-story brick house in Bowie. In August, Reina moved in, with her own two children, to save money to pursue her dream of becoming a nurse, like her mother." The Post continues, "That dream ended Saturday when Reina Natasha Lynch, 26, was found dead of a gunshot wound at the FedEx Ground distribution center in Beltsville, where she worked as a security guard. A colleague discovered her body at 7 a.m. in the booth at the entrance to the fenced compound on Trolley Lane. … Prince George's County police said yesterday that they had not found a motive. 'We believe this was a random event,' said Cpl. Stephen Pacheco. Investigators are looking for clues in Lynch's car and in security camera footage, he said."

Many DC Homicides Sparked By Petty Disputes. The Washington Times (11/13, Cella) reports, "The motive for most homicides in the District are arguments and petty disputes over perceived slights, accounting for more killings last year than robberies, domestic disputes, gang activity and drug wars combined, according to the Metropolitan Police Department. … 'It's a pretty big deal among some people,' said Chief Charles H. Ramsey. 'A guy gets upset -- you know, "You're disrespecting me." Or they don't like the way you're looking at them. You'd be surprised at how many silly homicides we see.'" The Times continues, "The police department last year attributed 57 of the city's 196 killings to arguments, compared with 50 such killings among the city's 198 in 2004, according to a recently released department report tracking homicide information from 2001 to 2005. … During those five years, 1,126 persons were killed in the District, 901 of them fatally shot. The report also states that about 1,058 of the homicide victims were black, about 36 were Hispanic and about 32 were white." The Times notes, "Arguments have accounted for a steady increase in the percentage of overall killings in the city since 2001, when they were the primary motive in 19 percent of the 232 homicides. .. Chief Ramsey said that guns are a big part of the problem. … 'The guns make them feel like they're more powerful,' he said. 'They overreact.' … As recently as 2002, drugs were the primary motive in more than one-third of the city's 262 killings. As a percentage of total homicides, that figure has declined each year, accounting for just 10 percent, or 19 killings, last year."

Virginia State Police Opt For Fewer Coded Messages. The Washington Post (11/13, A01, Sheridan) reports, "Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, local governments have spent millions on high-tech radios to improve communication among police forces. Now, Virginia is taking the next step: changing the very way cops talk." The Post continues, "Starting this month, Virginia State Police have banned the '10 codes' used by generations of officers to flag everything from murders to bathroom breaks. Gone is the language of '10-4' and 'What's your 10-20 [location]?' … The codes are as much a part of police culture as badges and coffee. But over time, individual police departments have adapted the codes in their own ways, creating confusion when they have to work together -- such as on Sept. 11." The Post adds, "Eager to avoid such mix-ups, Virginia's government has become one of the first in the nation to try to eliminate traditional cop talk. For months, officials in Richmond have worked with police and firefighters to come up with a substitute for 10 codes, finally deciding on a statewide 'common language protocol. … In other words, English." The Post notes, "The switch reflects why it is so challenging for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security to create a national emergency response system. If someone sets off a dirty bomb at the Pentagon, Arlington County police might be on the radio with officers arriving from Fairfax County, Alexandria, the District or Maryland."

DOJ_NMG_0092852

CIVIL LAW:

WPost Says "Partial Birth" Law Before High Court Identical To Previous Case. The Washington Post (11/13, A20, 690K) says in an editorial, "It isn't every day that the Supreme Court confronts a law materially identical to one it has already struck down. But that is what the justices faced last week when they heard oral arguments over the federal ban on partial-birth abortions. Six years ago, the court struck down state partial-birth laws -- ruling that Nebraska's ban was overly broad and lacked an exception for situations in which protecting a woman's health required the use of the disfavored procedure. In response, Congress enacted its own version of the ban, complete with nearly all of the faults from which the Nebraska statute had suffered." The Post adds the "only way to uphold this law would be to overturn the prior decision -- a step that the justices should not take, in the interest of women's health and out of respect for precedent." The "real question this case presents is whether the court, with Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired, will continue to honor its precedent."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Television Show About Sexual Predators Raises Rights Issues. The National Law Journal (11/13, Baldas) reports, "The NBC television series 'To Catch a Predator,' which features confrontations with men allegedly seeking sex with minors online, may be popular with viewers, but not with criminal defense attorneys, who claim the show raises a range of civil rights issues." The Journal continues, "Seating an unbiased jury when a client's face has been splashed all over national television is nearly impossible, they argue. Miranda rights and search-and-seizure issues are also compromised by the show, they add." The Journal adds, "In the last two years, 183 alleged online sexual predators have been formally charged as a result of being caught on the show, which has run sting operations in California, Florida, Georgia, New York and Ohio with the help of an online predator-watchdog group. More than 20 of those cases have resulted in guilty pleas or convictions, with the remaining cases still pending. … 'Without question, it tramples on their constitutional rights to due process and a fair trial,' said Blair Berk of Tarlow & Berk in Los Angeles, who is representing a doctor featured on the show that aired on Oct. 6. The man allegedly showed up at a house hoping for a date with who he thought was a 13-year-old girl he met online. People v. Wolin, No. SCR 495892 (Sonoma Co., Calif., Super. Ct.). … Berk likened the show's tactics to 'trying someone in town square without giving them due process. …"

WSJournal Criticizes Wal-Mart, Costco Gender Discrimination Lawsuits. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "We'll soon find out if that humongous gender discrimination class-action lawsuit pending against Wal-Mart is an aberration -- or the legal wave of the future. And rest assured the trial bar is hoping for the latter with dreams of riches. Last week, a U.S. District Court in San Francisco heard arguments on whether a gender discrimination lawsuit against Costco should also proceed as a nationwide class action. A decision is expected in a few weeks, and the proceedings have an air of deja vu." The "same San Francisco District Court (though not the same judge) heard the Wal-Mart case, which was initiated by the same plaintiffs' lawyer, Brad Seligman. Mr. Seligman is seeking punitive damages, back pay and injunctive relief in both cases, and he is also pushing the same legal theory as to why the claims should be pooled into a class rather than handled individually. He even has some of the same 'expert' witnesses." If "mere statistical imbalances can trigger a class action, companies will be forced to make pay decisions based on statistics rather than performance and merit. Ultimately, that leads to racial and gender quotas, all in an effort to avoid frivolous lawsuits."

DOJ_NMG_0092853

ANTITRUST:

Private Equity Fund Buyouts Come Under Scrutiny. The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Trumbull) reports, "The new birth of Burger King Corp. this year delivered the beef to the investing public: Under private management, the long-struggling company turned a corner and then made shares available on the New York Stock Exchange. … But the managers kept some major side orders to themselves. They took out a big loan and paid themselves a $367 million dividend and other fees as well. In all, they extracted cash worth about one-sixth of Burger King's market value." The Monitor continues, "That's one whopper of a payout, and it's not unusual these days. … Increasingly, investors with deep pockets are banding together to form 'private equity funds.' Just as the leveraged buyout firms did in the 1980s, they are buying up companies, restructuring them, and then selling them back on public stock exchanges - often for a supersized profit." The Monitor notes, "The practice isn't new, but it remains controversial. And the scale of the trend far exceeds what it was back when Henry Kravis and Michael Milken made their magazine cover debuts. … Hardly a week goes by without more major deals being announced. Meanwhile, the very success of these buyout funds is attracting billions more dollars from investors - raising the prospect of many more buyouts in coming months. In essence, the wealthy are deciding that if you want to make money in stocks, the stock market isn't the place to do it. … With money pouring in from pension funds and other deep pockets, the trend shows no signs of stopping. It could end up engulfing companies as diverse as the Los Angeles Times newspaper and ailing automotive supplier Delphi Corp. Just last week, Bill Gates and a Saudi prince were among the investors backing a private buyout of Four Seasons hotels, while another buyout fund announced its plan to acquire the Outback Steakhouse."

ENVIRONMENT:

Snowe, Rockefeller Blast New Exxon CEO Over Global Warming. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" column (11/13, McCaslin) reports on "the sharply critical letter that Republican Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Democratic Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia sent recently to Rex W. Tillerson, otherwise welcoming him to his new post as chairman and chief executive officer of Exxon Mobil Corp. The remainder of the three-page letter, shall we say, blasted a so-called 'climate-change denial strategy carried out by and for Exxon Mobil' against global warming -- the senators accusing the oil giant of being 'the primary funder of no fewer than 29 climate-change denial front groups in 2004 alone.' The bipartisan pair went so far as to request that Mr. Tillerson 'publicly acknowledge both the reality of the climate change and the role of humans in causing or exacerbating it,' even absent scientific proof of such a cause."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Attorneys Challenge Arrest Of Accused Arellano Félix Cartel Leader. The San Diego Union-Tribune (11/11, Soto) reports U.S. agents "used satellite equipment to track and arrest the suspected leader of the Arellano Félix drug cartel in a boat off the coast of Baja California Sur this summer. Law enforcement officials hailed the arrest of Francisco Javier Arellano Félix, accused of running the drug cartel in recent years, as a key blow to the organization they say moved tons of drugs between Mexico and California. … Investigators, led by the Drug Enforcement Administration, have been investigating the Tijuana-based cartel for years." The Union-Tribune says lawyers are questioning the use of a GPS device to find Arellano Felix and that a defense lawyer now says the arrest took place in Mexico's waters and is illegal.

Man Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Case. In Dover, Delaware, the AP (11/9) reports an accused drug dealer "suspected of distributing fentanyl-laced heroin that killed a Dover man will spend at least 20 years in prison after agreeing to plead guilty to a federal drug charge. A federal grand jury returned a six-count indictment in September against Joseph Bentley. On Wednesday in U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0092854

District Court in Wilmington, Bentley agreed to plead guilty to a single count of distribution of heroin and fentanyl resulting in the death of another individual." According to an affidavit by a DEA special agent, Bentley "told his father that a batch of heroin he had obtained had killed two of his customers."

Grand Jury In Rhode Island Indicts 7 In Drug-Trafficking Case. In Pawtucket, the Providence (RI) Journal (11/10, Pina) reports, "After a 10-month investigation, a federal grand jury has charged seven men with drug trafficking for allegedly selling crack cocaine out of the Prospect Heights housing project. … The investigation was conducted by city police and the Drug Enforcement Administration Task Force. Teams of federal agents and city officers arrested three men last week. One man was already in custody for his alleged role in robbing a delivery man at Prospect Heights."

DEA Agent Says "Pro-Pot" Advocates Relay Misinformation. In the Sacramento Bee (11/12), DEA agent Gordon D. Taylor writes, "Pro-pot advocates often spread misinformation on the subject of so-called 'medical marijuana.' It's important to show the other side of the issue. In the past 10 years, California has seen a surge of organized crime groups that have moved into the marijuana industry in a big way. Heavily armed drug cartels have made a multibillion-dollar business of going into our public lands and clear-cutting our pristine forests so they can cultivate enormous marijuana crops." Over the past two years, the DEA "has participated in six enforcement actions against pot clubs operating in the Central Valley and inland Northern California. Shockingly, three of the six pot store owners were convicted felons, each of whom was armed with a handgun during the course of the investigations."

Authorities Link Colombian Nationals To Jewelry Theft Ring. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (11/12) reports FBI agents and police "say they have broken a ring of crooks believed to have taken more than $1 million worth of goods from traveling jewelry salesmen in Missouri, Illinois and elsewhere since 2003. In a sworn statement made public in federal court in St. Louis this week, FBI Special Agent Mark Wood wrote that investigators had known for years that a group of Colombian nationals was responsible. … A motel employee tipped off investigators last month that some guests might be drug dealers. Drug Enforcement Administration agents followed the men, determined they were watching jewelry stores, and turned the matter over to the FBI and St. Louis County police." Five suspects "were arrested, and two have been charged so far."

Report Says Drug Trade Fuels Insurgency In Afghanistan. The AP (11/13, Straziuso) reports insurgent activity in Afghanistan "has risen fourfold this year, and militants now launch more than 600 attacks a month, a rising wave of violence that has resulted in 3,700 deaths in 2006, a bleak new report released Sunday found. … Afghanistan saw about 130 insurgent attacks a month last year, said the report by the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, a body of Afghan and international officials charged with overseeing the implementation of the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year reconstruction and development blueprint signed in February. … The report said that the rising drug trade in Afghanistan is fueling the insurgency in four volatile southern provinces. The slow pace of development is contributing to popular disaffection and ineffective implementation of the drug fight, it said."

UN Official Says Sharing Intelligence Would Hit Drug Traffickers Hard. The AP (11/10) reports Iran and neighboring Pakistan and Afghanistan "must share intelligence on drug smuggling," according to the head of the United Nations agency against drugs. Antonio Maria Costa, the director of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, "finished a three-day visit to Iran by praising the government's efforts against drug trafficking, according to a statement issued by the agency. … But Costa warned the world's production of opium was far greater than what was being intercepted. … 'I urge these three countries, and their international partners, to establish an intelligence-sharing platform,' he added. 'If counter-narcotics police in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iran share intelligence, they could really hit the traffickers hard.'"

Lack Of Protection Said To Anger Afghans. The Washington Post (11/10) reports many Afghans "have expressed anger over the lack of government protection and services in rural provinces, a void that has helped fortify the Taliban and allowed for an upsurge in opium cultivation. There is also growing resentment against the presence of foreign military forces, and Taliban leaders have attracted support by calling for resistance."

DOJ_NMG_0092855

IMMIGRATION:

Virginia Courthouse Behavior Unravels Vast Immigrant Marriage Scam. The Washington Post (11/13, A01, Markon) reports, "They didn't hug. They didn't kiss. They didn't even sit together. … Many couples going to the Arlington County Courthouse seemed more like strangers than people applying for marriage licenses. A man named Sam often escorted them to the sixth-floor clerk's office. Sometimes, there would be a furtive exchange of money in the elevator." The Post continues, "Before long, some of the same people would be back, filing for divorce, their court papers littered with mistakes -- always the same mistakes. … 'They misspelled "circuit,"' said David A. Bell, the longtime Circuit Court clerk. 'It was obvious something was going on.'" The Post notes, "Bell tipped off police, triggering a nearly four-year investigation that recently broke up one of the Washington region's biggest and most brazen immigration scams: an estimated 1,000 fake marriages. The scheme was centered in the area's little-noticed but rapidly growing community of immigrants from Ghana….. For immigrants, marrying a U.S. citizen is a quick ticket to citizenship. Along the East Coast and all the way to West Africa, at car dealerships, malls, parties and even a Home Depot, the word had spread: If you are in the United States illegally, go to Arlington. It's easy to get married in Virginia, because marriage laws are relatively lax. Arlington, with its proximity to the Metro system and the District, is especially convenient. … In recent weeks, 19 of 22 people charged so far in the undercover investigation have pleaded guilty in federal court in Alexandria, including bank tellers, car salesmen and health-care workers. Court testimony and interviews document how Ghanaian immigrants married U.S. citizens they had met the same day, then were coached on how to fool immigration inspectors, usually months later, into believing that the marriage was real. All they wanted, they said, was to stay in the United States. … Now, they will have to leave."

Democrats Take Cautious Stance On Immigration. The Washington Post (11/13, A3, Fears, Hsu, 690K) reports that in the "days after the election, Democratic leaders surprised pro-immigration groups by not including the issue on their list of immediate priorities. Experts said the issue is so complicated, so sensitive and so explosive that it could easily blow up in the Democrats' faces and give control of Congress back to Republicans in the next election two years from now. And a number of Democrats who took a hard line on illegal immigration were also elected to Congress."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush 41, Baker Thought To Have Engineered White House Shake-Up. Newsweek's Managing Editor Jon Meacham (11/20), in a cover story titled, "Can Bush Sr. and His Team Save Son's Presidency?," writes that "last Wednesday," former President Bush "listened as George W. Bush said the loss of Congress was a 'thumping,' promised to 'work with' a commission on Iraq chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, and announced that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was resigning. Within two hours the president was in the Oval Office with Rumsfeld and his replacement: Robert M. Gates, Bush Senior's CIA director and the president of Texas A&M University, the home of Bush 41's presidential library. … Dad's team was back -- a remarkable course correction in the political life of the son and, quite possibly, in the life of the nation." Meacham adds, "These are 41's men, and the removal of Rumsfeld -- an ancient rival of Bush Senior's from the Ford days -- is a move toward the broad middle. … Did 41 help bring Gates to the Pentagon? The White House denies it, but, as a Bush friend told NEWSWEEK, 'his fingerprints are all over this.'"

Newsweek's Evan Thomas (11/20) says "it would be widely speculated that" Baker "helped arrange the firing of Rumsfeld and the appointment of Gates as part of a fundamental power shift, a last-ditch rescue operation -- by the old guard of Bush 41 to save Bush 43 from sinking ever deeper into the Iraq morass." Baker "has reason to want to downplay his role and the prospects for success. Over the next month or so, the Iraq Study Group must find a middle way, a plan of action that can be characterized neither as 'cut and run' nor 'stay the course.'"

U.S. News and World Report's Brian Duffy (11/20) writes, "One of Washington's more tedious parlor games has been the whispered wonderings about strains in the relationship between the younger Bush and his father. The return to center stage of one of the elder Bush's most trusted aides as Rumsfeld's replacement prompted a frenzied new round of psychobabble. Not only was Bob Gates the elder

DOJ_NMG_0092856

Bush's CIA director, but he also served as deputy to Brent Scowcroft, the older man's national security adviser and close friend. Scowcroft's break with the current White House over Iraq was offered as Exhibit A in the case for a rupture in the relationship between Bush père et fils. Hmm. If armchair psychology doesn't happen to be your thing, however, and you're one of the many millions of Americans whose vote seemed to express the belief that the Bush team has slipped its intellectual and political moorings, the casting of James Baker seemed to suggest a more simple if less charitable plotline: adult-supervision time!"

Time (11/20, Duffy, 4.03M) reports Gates' "task…is to preach change to a leader who has stuck to his line -- despite all kinds of evidence to the contrary -- for years now. … Dad's former aides will present the son with a plan for saving his presidency and, with it, some remnant of the family's brand name. None of those involved will call it an intervention, but it's fair to say the nation's future is at stake. Although Gates and Baker will be out front, others who worked for the patriarch are helping behind the scenes." Time adds, "It is tantalizing to imagine that Baker, who plans to issue his report next month, pushed Bush to dump Rumsfeld for Gates. A former Baker aide last week called the coincidence of timing 'painfully obvious.' … 'Baker wasn't going to let his report come out,' says a Gates aide, 'so that Rummy could stomp all over it.' As for Bush 41, he is staying above the nitty-gritty of the takeover, says one of 41's former aides, but 'he's definitely in the loop.'"

Gates Reportedly Criticized Administration's "Incompetence." Newsweek (11/20, Ephron, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "At sessions of the Iraq Study Group over the past months, Robert Gates was careful not to show his cards. But on the commission's long flight home from a fact-finding mission to Baghdad in September, after several drinks had been poured, the Republican panelist let loose on the Bush team. 'He said they really screwed up Iraq and, to a large extent, he couldn't figure out why it happened,' a source close to Gates who was on the plane told NEWSWEEK. Particularly foolish, Gates thought, were the decisions to occupy Iraq with a relatively small force and to purge the Iraqi civil service of Baath Party members. 'He couldn't believe there was such a degree of incompetence,' said the source, who did not want to be named because panelists were trying to keep their discussions out of the media."

U.S. News and World Report (11/20, Mulrine, Whitelaw, 2.03M) reports, "The nomination of" Gates "is a clear signal that the White House is trying to shake off its history of 'stay the course' rhetoric. But while Bush's motivation might have more to do with politics than with military strategy, Gates could make a real difference. A member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group…Gates could be a critical bridge between the White House and the clutch of foreign-policy graybeards many Republicans and Democrats are looking to as a lifeline -- a last-gasp chance to reverse the downward trend in Iraq."

U.S. News and World Report's Kenneth T. Walsh (11/20) writes, "The choice of Gates allows the commander in chief to at least create the perception that he is looking for a fresh start in Iraq. … As a private citizen, Gates has criticized the administration for failing to use diplomacy aggressively enough to extract the United States from Iraq. And Gates has a track record of success."

Rumsfeld Allegedly "Humiliated" Rice. Newsweek (11/20, Barry, Hirsh, 3.12M) reports Rumsfeld "will likely go down as an erratic and arrogant manager who sullied America's reputation by allowing interrogation abuses at Abu Ghraib and other U.S.-run detention centers abroad; who haughtily dismissed advice from U.S. generals and senators alike to put in enough troops (in part because he didn't want another Vietnam), and who preferred to deny the reality of the Iraqi insurgency rather than confront it. … He offended allies, played down the State Department's role in planning for postwar Iraq and actively stymied Condoleezza Rice's efforts to do her first-term job as national-security adviser, which was to coordinate between agencies, according to numerous accounts. Sometimes he didn't even return her calls. 'Rumsfeld treated Condi like the hired help,' says a White House staffer who would discuss the relationship only if he was not identified. 'He did everything he could to humiliate her. And the president never intervened.'"

Adelman And Perle Accused Of Lacking "Contrition." In an essay for Time (11/20, 4.03M) Michael Kinsley writes, "Kenneth Adelman and Richard Perle said 'oops' earlier this month. … Both played a role in pushing the U.S. into war in Iraq--Adelman in an influential Washington Post Op-Ed promising that the war would be 'a cakewalk' and Perle warning of catastrophe if we left Saddam Hussein and his weapons unmolested. Now, interviewed in Vanity Fair, they say it all may have been a mistake. Oops! Yet in Vanity Fair's quotes, there is no note of contrition. … What is the proper way to act when you have made a boo-boo on the scale of what Perle and Adelman now admit to? A brief period of silence might be in order, followed by a bit of ideological spring cleaning."

DOJ_NMG_0092857

Iraq Study Group Encouraged To Pursue Regional Stability. Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria (11/20) writes, "Press accounts of its deliberations suggest that the much-anticipated Baker-Hamilton report will make some intelligent recommendations. The committee will point out that America's strategy in Iraq must be placed in a broader regional context. For three years, America's Iraq policy has largely ignored the rest of the Middle East. That was no accident. The neoconservative vision was always that Iraq would be made anew, shorn of the flaws and ailments of the Arab world. … This absence of a regional strategy left Iraq open to its neighbors' most irresponsible instincts. Iran and Syria have helped keep the violence there on the boil. Saudi groups and individuals have funded Sunni militants. None of the surrounding nations would benefit if Iraq actually did collapse, setting off territorial disputes, sending refugees into neighboring lands and exporting Iraq's instability. Such an outcome can still be avoided, but only with active support from these countries. The Baker-Hamilton commission can be expected to recommend a major regional effort."

Democrats Want To Deal With Gates Nomination During Lame-Duck. The Financial Times (11/13, Guha) reports "senior Democrats" are indicating that they hope to complete the confirmation process for Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates during the lame-duck session that opens today. Sen. Carl Levin, who voted against Gates' 1991 nomination to lead the CIA, "told ABC's This Week: 'I hope that his confirmation hearings can be held and that he will get a vote prior to the end of this Congress.' He reiterated his long-held reservations about the nominee but said: 'I'm going to have a fresh look at him.'" Sen. Joseph Biden, "who also voted against Mr Gates in 1991, said: 'I am inclined to vote for him now." The Wall Street Journal (11/13, C8, Spence, 2.04M) reports Gates would step down as a trustee at Fidelity Investments if confirmed.

Media reports this morning also suggest Gates will follow Rumsfeld's lead on terrorism and the military's transformation. The Washington Times (11/13, Scarborough, 88K) says current and former Pentagon officials say Gates "is not expected to rein in the aggressive global war on al Qaeda" started by Donald Rumsfeld or "reverse the transformation of the Army" Rumsfeld launched, but "instead focus on how to win in Iraq and get American troops home." One Pentagon adviser said, "He definitely is not seen as someone wimping out on the global war. How he does it, and what tools, and who he entrusts with them, that's a whole different issue." The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Collins, 59K) says "not all experts believe the transformation has been helpful in the war on terror, and the sustainability of many of his reforms may ultimately depend on the ability of people to rise above intense negative feelings about him and see beyond his failings in the Iraq war."

Former Defense Secretary William Cohen said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "Any time you bring someone new, that that individual is going have a different relationship with the President, with Capitol Hill…not to mention with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the commanders on the field. So, a different person brings a different viewpoint and a different dynamic with all of those groups. It's not enough to change the person. If the policy's going to remain the same, then in the final analysis, that won't make much difference. But I think in the beginning, a lot will change in terms of the relationships."

Bush 41 Said To Have Had "No Foreknowledge" Of Gates' Appointment. Brit Hume, on Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace), said, "The conventional wisdom in Washington, the buzz in Washington, is that 'Bush 41' and his gang are back in town. A couple of facts: Neither Baker nor 'Bush 41' were consulted ahead of time about the Gates appointment. President Bush the first got a phone call the morning of the Gates appointment giving him a heads up that it was about to happen. … The striking thing about the relationship between the first President Bush and the second is that for all the devotion between them, they don't discuss politics and political issues very much."

Bolten Said Bush Had Not Decided About Rumsfeld At Time Of Comment. Bolten also had to deal with questions about the President's pre-election comment that he expected Rumsfeld to stay on through the end of the Administration. On CNN's Late Edition (11/12), Wolf Blitzer asked Bolten, "When is it okay for the President to mislead the American public?" Bolten: "Yes -- he wasn't. He had not made a decision at that point. At the time that that interview was held, the President hadn't even met Bob Gates. Now he started his conversations with Secretary Rumsfeld about possibly getting fresh eyes on the problem. But the President…wasn't going to be comfortable making a change at the critical role of secretary of defense until he was sure he had somebody very strong to put in place." On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Bolten said much the same thing, saying that before the election, Bush "was talking about it and he was preparing to meet with Bob Gates, but he had never met Bob Gates." If Gates "had turned out to be the wrong guy, based on the conversation that the President was going to have with him, I do not expect that the President would have replaced Secretary Rumsfeld."

DOJ_NMG_0092858

White House Facing GOP Ire Over Timing Of Rumsfeld Exit. The AP (11/12, Heilprin) reports the White House "is trying to soothe Republicans who say the party might have fared better on Election Day if President Bush had not waited" to dismiss Rumsfeld. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten said, "You could argue that either way, of what political effect an earlier decision on Secretary Rumsfeld would have had. But it doesn't matter. The president correctly decided that this decision does not belong in the political realm." And Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett, during an appearance on Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace), said Bush "was not going to inject the leadership of our military during a time of war into the final weeks or throes of a presidential or a midterm congressional campaign. It would send the wrong signal."

But on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), Sen. Arlen Specter was not satisfied, saying Bush "should have done it as soon as he had made up his mind. And that's a hard thing to calculate. But it's highly doubtful that he made up his mind between the time the election returns came in on Tuesday and Wednesday when Rumsfeld was out. And if Rumsfeld had been out, you bet it would have made a difference. I'd still be chairman of the Judiciary Committee."

AEI's Rubin Sees Inconsistency In Progressives' Views Of "Realists." In a Wall Street Journal (11/13, A16, 2.04M) Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute writes, "What a difference a war makes. Today, progressives and liberals celebrate not only Mr. Rumsfeld's departure, but the resurrection of realists" like Gates and ex-Secretary of State James Baker. Today, "progressivism places personal vendetta above principle. Mr. Rumsfeld is bad, Mr. Baker is good, and consistency irrelevant."

Democrats, Bush Seen As Likely To Cooperate On Few Issues. Time (11/20, Thornburgh, 4.03M) reports, "Despite all the cordial luncheons and admissions that both sides love America, the President and the newly elected Democratic Congress aren't likely to find common ground on hot-button issues like stem-cell research and no-warrant wiretaps. Here's our pick of policies on which the two might actually do business." Time lists, the minimum wage, education, alternative energy and immigration as potential subjects for compromise. Time (11/20, Tumulty, 4.03M) reports, "now that the high fives and jubilant photo ops are behind them, Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid have to run the place. Whether anything is actually accomplished on Capitol Hill over the next two years will depend largely on the skills these two leaders develop in maneuvering through the tricky challenges ahead."

U.S. News and World Report's Michael Barone (11/20) writes, "One can foresee areas of agreement. Bush will concede a fig-leaved minimum wage. On immigration, House Democrats and a solid Senate majority favor the Bush approach blocked by House Republicans. Advancing alternative fuels is another possibility. Some Democrats want tax-free savings vehicles for lower-paid workers; that sounds a lot like the individual investment accounts Bush proposed for Social Security. On some issues there will be no agreement-tax reform, probably. But big issues have been addressed in the past by divided governments. In the process, Bush is decoupling himself from the Republican Party. House Republicans, with little chance to affect outcomes, will be mostly ignored as House Democrats were under Clinton."

Democrats Regarded As Unlikely To Enact Major Healthcare Reform. U.S. News and World Report's Josh Fischman (11/20) writes, "Crisis is a word being used more and more often to describe the U.S. healthcare system. … Lawmakers are unlikely to wake up and enact major overhauls during the next two years. Big fixes will remain stuck in ideological gridlock, though small changes-such as allowing Americans to buy drugs from abroad or expanding state insurance coverage for low-income children-are possible, say a broad spectrum of policy analysts and congressional strategists. But larger reforms, such as incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's proposal to let Medicare negotiate prices directly with drug companies, are likely to hit a wall in the Senate, where Republicans are still strong enough to hold up legislation and have genuine antipathy to expanding government programs."

Pelosi's Daughter Describes Bush's Cordial Treatment Of Her Mother. In an essay for Time (11/20, 4.03M) Alexandra Pelosi, Pelosi's daughter and creator of the documentary, "Journeys with George" about President Bush's 2000 campaign, writes, "When my parents came to have lunch with me at an Oakland airport hotel where Bush was giving a speech in March 2000, he did what he did when any member of the traveling press corps was in his or her hometown: he summoned us to his room so he could meet the parents. … The next time I saw them together, George was in the White House, and he told me, 'You ought to be proud of your mom.' At the time she was fighting her heart out on the House floor against the Iraq war. On any occasion that I have seen them together in private, they have appeared to be the best of 'frenemies' -- campaign-trail speak for politicians who keep their friends close and their enemies closer."

DOJ_NMG_0092859

Full Agenda Planned For Lame-Duck, But Progress May Be Limited. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Simon, Havemann, 850K) reports, "The ousted Republican-led Congress returns to the Capitol this week to try one last time to shorten a long legislative to-do list, while the just-elected members will vote for new leaders in races that could signal the direction the parties will take next year. The lame-duck session mixes a dispirited Republican Party and a Democratic Party that knows it will soon have the upper hand in both houses -- a potentially combustible cocktail." At a minimum, Congress "must pass a temporary spending bill to keep the government running until the next Congress takes office. Getting much else accomplished could be difficult." Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution said, "Democrats won't allow anything to pass they don't like, and Republicans have little interest in starting the Democratic reign early. It could be a very short lame-duck session."

But while progress may be hard, the New York Times (11/13, A21, Hulse, 1.16M) says in a headline that an "extensive to-do list is awaiting action." Republicans "have compiled an ambitious to-do list, hoping to dispose of energy legislation, a trade deal or two, a civilian nuclear treaty with India and other favored bills," while Democrats "have some measures they want completed as well, most notably the spending bills, to save them the added work next year." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/13, Shepard, 379K) says Bush "has urged Republicans to complete work on the spending bills to prevent the Democrats from changing his spending priorities for various agencies before the next budget cycle in 2007." The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A4, Lueck, Rogers, 2.04M) says Republican leaders "faced a mountain of work unfinished when members left town to campaign."

House GOP May Be Pressed To Accept Senate Drilling Bill. The AP (11/12, Hebert) reports, "The Democrats' return to power is increasing pressure on House Republican leaders to accept" the Senate's "limited expansion of offshore oil and gas drilling. Supporters of such exploration say the next Congress, with Democrats in control come January, probably will not tamper with the long-standing drilling bans that have protected most coastal waters for a quarter-century."

In an editorial, the New York Times (11/13, 1.16M) opposes President Bush's call for the outgoing Congress to pass legislation to authorize increased offshore drilling for oil and natural gas, calling the House bill "a broad, mischievous and badly conceived piece of work," and warning that a conference committee could "produce a bad bill much along the lines of the House measure."

WPost Offers Its Own To-Do List For Lame-Duck Session. The Washington Post (11/13, A20, 690K) editorializes that Congress should focus on "passing the 11 remaining spending bills for the 2007 fiscal year. … Another pressing task should be to give the District of Columbia full voting rights in the House." The Post also says "confirmation hearings and, if possible, a vote" on Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates "would avoid delaying Mr. Gates's start in that important job. Congress should also approve normalization of trade relations with Vietnam in advance of the president's trip there this week and extend an expiring trade deal that provides benefits to key South American countries." The Post also lists the India nuclear deal and the restoration of the Iraq reconstruction IG on its list.

Bolton Not Expected To Win Confirmation. Newsweek (11/20, 3.12M) reports that the White House has asked the Senate to confirm US Ambassador to the UN Bolton "permanently during a forthcoming lame-duck session. But Joe Biden, the Senate Democrats' incoming Foreign Relations chair, signaled that the Dems will continue to block Bolton -- unless the administration turns over a set of ultrasecret National Security Agency intercepts that Bolton requested. Bolton said he needed to find out the names of Americans mentioned in them; Bolton's critics want to be sure he wasn't spying on subordinates." Sen. Lincoln Chafee "also signaled his continuing opposition to Bolton, virtually guaranteeing the nomination will die in this Congress. To date, the administration has refused to give Dems the documents they want. … Speculation is already circulating that he could be replaced by Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador in Baghdad, or Paula Dobriansky, an under secretary of State."

DOJ_NMG_0092860

The Washington Post (11/13, A13, Heilprin, 690K) reports President Bush "will not relent in his defense" of UN Ambassador John Bolton despite "unwavering opposition from Democrats who view Bolton as too combative for international diplomacy, aides said yesterday." White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten defended Bolton on both ABC and CNN yesterday, saying on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "He's done a terrific job there. He's been the opposite of what many of his critics expected him to be. And that is, he has been a good consensus builder. He has helped lead the UN Security Council to good resolutions on Lebanon, on North Korea, a variety of other issues. So he's actually been a very effective UN ambassador, and I think the country's well-served to have him where he is." On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Bolten made a similar case, saying, "We're putting him up for confirmation. I think if he actually was able to get a vote in the full Senate, he would succeed."

But Democratic senators were no less assertive in arguing against the nomination. On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Joseph Biden said, "There's a lot of competent people. Send someone new up, Mr. President. Look, I'm not stopping Bolton. He doesn't even have the votes in the committee. He doesn't even have the votes of a Republican-controlled committee today. We're going to have a hearing on him. There is going to be a vote on him. He's going to lose."

Sen. Charles Schumer said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer) that Bolton is "for me…something of a mixed bag. On the one hand, I fully support his full support of Israel. … On the other hand, Bolton's philosophy has been very unilateral – 'The US can do it all, to heck with the rest of the world, to heck the rest of the nations.' And in this new world, where we have to fight a war on terrorism, a global war on terrorism, we can't fight it alone."

WSJournal Sees A Way Around Senate To Keep Bolton. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "So let's see. Democrats retake the Senate, and their first act of 'bipartisanship' is to declare that they'll deny a confirmation vote" for Bolton. And now, "say the arbiters of Washington manners, President Bush is supposed to show his willingness to compromise by withdrawing Mr. Bolton's nomination. If Mr. Bush obliges, he'll be taking a big step toward turning last week's GOP defeat into a rout. … Having had one recess appointment, Mr. Bolton can't get another one and be paid. But he could retain his position and be paid if Mr. Bush names him to a non-confirmable post at State and then assigns him to the U.N. Ambassador's duties. Now, that's a compromise."

Automakers To Press Bush On Health Care, Weak Yen. USA Today (11/13, 2B, Hyde, 2.27M) runs Sunday's Detroit Free Press story that says that "when the heads of Detroit's automakers finally meet with President Bush at the White House Tuesday, they will press for more recognition of their issues, from the rising cost of retiree health care to the advantages a weak yen gives the Japanese." They "also will attempt to draw distinctions between themselves and foreign automakers whose U.S. branches generate record profits." The article says, "All sides expect no firm commitments from the scheduled 45-minute session, which will include Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council."

Study Says Renewable Fuels Could Provide 25% Of US Energy By 2025. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A10, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "A new Rand Corp. study showing the falling costs of ethanol, wind power and other forms of renewable energy predicts such sources could furnish as much as 25% of the U.S.'s conventional energy by 2025 at little or no additional expense." Another study "soon to be released by the National Academy of Sciences suggests wood chips may become a plentiful source of ethanol and electricity for industrial nations... ." The Journal says, "Because use of renewable fuels to replace oil and cut emissions of carbon dioxide is an area on which Congress's coming Democratic leadership and the Bush administration agree, the studies are likely to hasten efforts to increase production incentives next year, either in a new energy bill or a farm bill."

Bolten Says Bush Would Conditionally Support Minimum Wage Hike. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "The President's always said that he would support a minimum wage that didn't end up pricing a lot of people at the lower end of the income scale out of the market, that is, costing them jobs. So, we've always been ready to do that. And we're ready work with Democrats on that issue."

DOJ_NMG_0092861

Dean Cautions Democrats To "Be Careful" Regarding Tax Cuts. DNC Chairman Howard Dean, on Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace), said, "both Speaker-to-be Pelosi and Majority Leader Harry Reid have said is that we won't raise taxes on the middle class. … In fact, many Democrats would like to give the middle class a tax cut. I think we have to be careful of that because I think, frankly, the budget deficit has been understated by about $100 billion."

Krugman Says Democrats Won On Economic Populism. In his New York Times column (11/13), Paul Krugman says Sen. George Allen "was only one of many faux populists defeated by real populists last Tuesday. Ever since movement conservatives took over, the Republican Party has pushed for policies that benefit a small minority of wealthy Americans at the expense of the great majority of voters. To hide this reality, conservatives have relied on wagging the dog and wedge issues, but they've also relied on a brilliant marketing campaign that portrays Democrats as elitists and Republicans as representatives of the average American." As "Robin Toner and Kate Zernike of The New York Times pointed out yesterday, what actually characterizes the new wave of Democrats is a 'strong streak of economic populism.'" Krugman says Sen. Joseph Lieberman "won only through denial and deception," and last week's "populist wave, among other things, vindicates the populist direction that Al Gore took in the closing months of the 2000 campaign. But will this wave be reflected in the actual direction of the Democratic Party? Not necessarily. Quite a few sitting Democrats have shown themselves nearly as willing as Republicans to bow to corporate interests." The "first big test of the new Democratic populism will come over reform of the 2003 prescription drug law. Democrats have pledged to repeal the clause in that law preventing Medicare from negotiating lower drug prices. But the fine print of how they do that is crucial."

Rubin Think Tank Seen As Source Of Democratic Economic Proposals. In his Washington Post column (11/13, A21), Sebastian Mallaby says, "During their long years in the wilderness, Democrats lashed out against trade and globalization, even though denying the economic case for trade is like pretending that tax cuts pay for themselves. Now that they have won Congress, the Democrats must prove that they are more than the mirror image of their opponents. This means reviving the pro-market centrism of the Clinton era -- a spirit that lives on in the form of the Hamilton Project," the "brainchild of Robert Rubin, Treasury secretary under Bill Clinton." Rubin's "great virtue was to be as free of ideology as is possible in politics and to recruit a team of clever pragmatists to work for him." With Peter Orszag, "a laser-brained economist at the Brookings Institution," Rubin "persuaded a number of fellow Democratic grandees to finance a center for Rubinomics in exile; and Orszag served as policy director, commissioning a series of creative pragmatists to grapple with the nation's economic challenges." Nearly "all the Hamilton proposals have three things in common. They would reduce the inequality that Democrats emphasized on the campaign trail. They would not bust the budget. And they would promote economic growth. If the political system can't make use of ideas that tick all these boxes, there is something desperately wrong with it."

Pelosi Will Push To Require Identification Of Earmark Sponsors. USA Today (11/13, Eisler, Kiely, 2.27M) reports on its front page that Democrats "aim to open the next Congress in January with a new rule that identifies lawmakers who use legislative 'earmarks' to help special interests -- a change Republicans promised but didn't implement." Likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi said her "first agenda item after being elected House speaker will be a vote to require sponsors of earmarks to be identified." However, the Los Angeles Times (11/13, Levey, Simon, 850K) says that "for years," Pelosi "has celebrated bringing home the bacon to her district." She "has not been linked to any impropriety. And not all the federal funding Pelosi boasts about came from earmarks. But the presumed new House speaker has proved a champion practitioner of the earmarking process over the years."

Reid May Have Benefited From Earmarks. Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (11/13, Neubauer, Hamburger, 850K) also reports that while Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid also "vows to make reform of congressional earmarks a priority of his tenure," 2005's "huge $286-billion federal transportation bill included a little-noticed slice of pork pushed by Reid that provided benefits not only for the casino town of Laughlin, Nev., but also, possibly, for the senator himself." Reid "called funding for construction of a bridge over the Colorado River, among other projects, 'incredibly good news for Nevada,'" but did not mention that "just across the river in Arizona, he owns 160 acres of land several miles from proposed bridge sites and that the bridge could add value to his real estate investment. Reid denies any personal financial interest in his efforts."

DOJ_NMG_0092862

Stark Says Democrats Need To Move Quickly To Revamp Medicare Drug Plan. In a USA Today op-ed (11/13), Rep. Pete Stark says, "Democrats won both houses of Congress last Tuesday because Americans supported our pledge to change direction on several major issues, including the Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit. There is no reason to wait." Stark adds, "I believe we must start work immediately to improve this incomprehensibly complicated plan, which overpays and deregulates private plans to the detriment of the beneficiaries and taxpayers. The same Republicans who certified its cost as $400 billion over 10 years, knowing the true figure was north of $550 billion, generated some of the polls showing satisfaction with Part D. Yes, premiums are lower than expected, not from market competition, but from massive Medicare subsidies to the insurance industry. With less than 3% overhead, universal coverage and lower prices, a Medicare-run plan could offer true competition."

Bartlett Says Bush Remains Opposed To Medicare Drug Purchase Negotiations. On Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace) Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, was asked if the president is "willing to allow Medicare to negotiate lower drug prices," Bartlett responded, "We had this debate during the prescription drug debate when the Medicare reforms went in place two years ago. And the interesting thing about it is we now have some experience. And what happened was all the estimates saying that prices wouldn't come down were proven wrong. … The marketplace is working. … It's been benefiting America's seniors."

Democratic Plan For Medicare To Bargain With Drug Companies Criticized. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/13, A16), Alain Enthoven, professor emeritus at the Graduate School of Business at Stanford, and Kyna Fong, a doctoral student in economics, say, "Nancy Pelosi has promised that when the Democrats come into control of the House, they will repeal the ban preventing Medicare from negotiating directly with pharmaceutical companies, within the first 100 hours. She must expect that this legislation will bring down drug prices dramatically. In fact, it is not obvious that allowing the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies will lead to lower prices than those achieved by private drug plans. There are several good reasons that government negotiations may not decrease drug costs." First, "negotiations are a bargaining process. The relative balance of bargaining power determines at which price the deal is struck." When the government "negotiates, its hands are tied because there are few drugs it can exclude without facing political backlash from doctors and the Medicare population, a very influential group of voters." Secondly, "by acting as one large buyer, the government will cause price discounts to become more expensive for pharmaceutical companies. In other words, the minimum price that the pharmaceutical company is able to accept increases. All else equal, this will lead to higher, not lower, prices." Finally, "there is the familiar economic argument that the market-determined price is the only fair price. How can the government determine what price is 'fair,' what price appropriately reimburses pharmaceutical companies for all their research and development efforts?"

Parties May Clash On Science, Technology Issues. The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Spotts, 59K) reports, "For clues to whether bipartisan cooperation in Washington will take root or disappear from the table as quickly as the china after last week's get-acquainted lunches at the White House, watch how some key science and technology issues play out. Ordinarily, broad science goals- - such as better science education or the American Competitiveness Initiative -- draw bipartisan support." But "there are some divisive science topics on the Democrats' early agenda -- namely embryonic stem-cell research -- and these highly charged science and environmental issues will be one barometer of the durability of cross-aisle cooperation." The "potential for fractiousness exists in a number of policy areas where the ideas of the new Democratic majority differ from those of Republican lawmakers or the Bush administration." Among them are "funding for research into alternative-energy sources, what to do about global warming, the future of the space program, and charges that the Bush team has muzzled federal scientists and ignored scientific results in crafting environmental and public-health regulations."

Bolten Sees GOP Losses As An Opportunity For Bush. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, on CBS's Face the Nation (11/12, Schieffer), said, "It's a big disappointment for us in the White House to have lost control of both Houses of Congress. But sometimes in adversity, there's opportunity, and hopefully we can take advantage of this opportunity and the bipartisan spirit that seems to prevail at least for the moment and get some good things done."

DOJ_NMG_0092863

Bartlett Claims US Public Wants More Bipartisanship. Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett, during an appearance on Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace), dismissed the contention that President Bush is now a "lame duck." According to Bartlett, "There's a lot of time for this president and this Congress to work together to address the big issues our country face. And I think that's the real lesson from this election this past Tuesday, is that the American people want to see their political parties in Washington work together to achieve the great goals our country faces right now, whether it be in the war on terror, whether it be keeping the strong economy growing, whether it be addressing issues such as energy independence, issues such as education."

Pelosi Backs Murtha In Race For House Majority Leader. The AP (11/13, Espo) reports incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "stepped into a postelection power struggle among fellow Democrats on Sunday with a letter of support for Rep. Jack Murtha in the race to pick a majority leader." In the letter to Murtha, Pelosi wrote, "Your presence in the leadership of our party would add a knowledgeable and respected voice to our Democratic team." The AP adds Murtha is "widely viewed as an underdog in a two-man race with Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer in this week's leadership elections."

The Washington Post (11/13, A1, Weisman, 690K) reports the "unexpected move signaled the sizable value Pelosi gives to personal loyalty and personality preferences. Hoyer competed with her in 2001 for the post of House minority whip, while Murtha managed her winning campaign. Pelosi has also all but decided she will not name the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) to chair that panel next year, a decision pregnant with personal animus." Pelosi said "she was swayed by Murtha's early stance for a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq. Her letter of endorsement yesterday made clear that she sees Iraq as the central issue of the next Congress and that she believes a decorated Marine combat veteran at the helm of the House caucus would provide Democrats ammunition in their fight against congressional Republicans and President Bush on the issue." Another "potentially fractious vote in the House Democratic Caucus was settled late last week when Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the outgoing chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, decided against running for House majority whip. Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), the only African American in the House Democratic leadership, had already announced his candidacy."

Pence Praised As Candidate For House Minority Leader Post. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/13, A17), Stephen Moore of the Journal's editorial board says if Republican Rep. Mike Pence "wins his bid this Friday for House minority leader, he will become the second most influential conservative in Washington, behind President Bush." Congressional Republicans are "engaged in a desperate search for a new revolutionary, a Newt Gingrich figure to help them rediscover who they are and what they believe in." Pence "captained a conservative revolt that fell one vote short of killing the hugely expensive" Medicare prescription drug bill, and his "first spending vote in the House was against the No Child Left Behind education bill that the Bush White House still considers one of its crowning achievements. His reasoning: 'Why are we federalizing schools and education?'" Neither of "these incidents endeared Mr. Pence to Karl Rove or the Bush White House. But perhaps his principled stance is in need more than ever." Pence "believes that his party got trounced last week because of its embrace of what he derisively calls 'big government Republicanism.'"

Novak Blasts GOP's Expected Reelection Of House Leaders. In a syndicated column appearing in today's Washington Post (11/13, 690K), Robert Novak writes, "The depleted House Republican caucus, a minority in the next Congress, convenes in the Capitol at 8 a.m. Friday on the brink of committing an act of supreme irrationality. The House members blame their leadership for their tasting the bitter dregs of defeat. Yet the consensus so far is that, in secret ballot, they will reelect some or all of those leaders. In private conversation, Republican members of Congress blame Majority Leader John Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt in no small part for their midterm election debacle." Yet "either Boehner, Blunt or both are expected to be returned to their leadership posts Friday. For good reason, the GOP often is called 'the stupid party.'"

Lieberman Declines To Rule Out Future Party Switch. Sen. Joseph Lieberman, on NBC's Meet the Press (11/12, Russert), said he will "caucus with the Democrats… because it's good for my constituents in Connecticut, because I retain my seniority." However,

DOJ_NMG_0092864

Lieberman added he has not "ruled out" switching parties, but "I hope I don't get to that point. And I must say, and with all respect to the Republicans who supported me in Connecticut, nobody ever said, 'We're doing this because we want you to switch over…and I appreciate that."

Senate Democrats Said To Have No Choice But To Govern From Center. The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Chaddock, 59K) says that for Democrats, "the pledge to govern in a bipartisan way may not be postvictory rhetoric. At least in the Senate, it's a mandate of the math." The party will be "nine votes short of the 60 votes now needed to advance controversial bills," and "the terms of the Democrats' narrow victory make a politics of the center even more imperative. Most of the new Democrats in the Senate won by running as moderates or fiscal conservatives." Political analyst Rhodes Cook said, "They were carefully chosen not to reflect the liberal mainstream of the Democratic Party, but to reflect the more conservative mainstream of their states. It might be a return to the days when Democrats were technically a majority party, but when you put Republicans together with southern Democrats, they were the majority."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (11/13, Fagan, 88K) runs brief profiles of the 10 new incoming senators, who "include a novelist and former Navy secretary, three soon-to-be former House members, a state treasurer and an organic farmer."

McConnell Unopposed For Senate Minority Leader. The AP (11/13, Zuckerbrod) reports while Sen. Mitch McConnell "regrets Democrats' control of Congress denies him the chance to become the next Senate majority leader, he sees the GOP carving out a significant, albeit slightly different role." McConnell, who is "running unopposed to be Senate Republican leader," said, "We'll be able block or shape legislation. My preference of course is to accomplish things." The AP adds that when the new Senate "convenes in January, Democrats will control 51 seats to Republicans' 49. The close split means Republicans still will have significant power, because it often takes 60 votes to pass legislation." McConnell said, "Forty-nine is a pretty robust minority. I've been there when we were at 42." The AP adds Republican senators "are to pick their leaders on Nov. 15. Utah Republican Sen. Robert Bennett said McConnell has been methodically planning for the top job, fending off potential challenges along the way."

Most FEHBP Enrollees Will Not See Premiums Increase. The Washington Post (11/13, D4, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" column reports, "For the next four weeks, federal employees and retirees will select their health insurance coverage for 2007. Many will escape the sticker shock of past years," with officials saying 63% of enrollees in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program "will see no increase in their premiums next year."

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Focus On Appropriations Oversight. The New York Times (11/13, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "There have been many examples of the shambles that the Republican-controlled Congress made of its responsibility for oversight of the Bush administration. But none was so peremptory as the mass firing of 60 House appropriations investigators last month — virtually the entire hired staff responsible for tracking spending abuses in such money pits as the Iraq war, intelligence operations and the $62 billion Hurricane Katrina relief effort." The "result is that, until the Democrats assume committee control in January, there's an investigatory vacuum on such matters as soldiers' body armor in Iraq and levee and dam spending along the Gulf Coast." Democratic Rep. David Obey "takes the committee gavel in January, and among his tasks will be restocking the investigation staff and setting the committee back on a productive, bipartisan course. This should not be a matter of party vengeance, as some Republicans fear. Rather, it's a necessity of the course set by the voters to end one-party rule and find out what the government is actually up to."

NYTimes Says Democrats, GOP Must Address Trade Deficit. The New York Times (11/13, 1.16M) reports, "With the deficit reaching new highs and Democrats now able to wield real power, it is crucial that each side back off its constituent-pleasing myths" about the trade deficit. The Bush Administration "needs to tell the truth about the vulnerability that comes with large deficits. Thus far, the United States has had no problem attracting money from abroad to plug the gaps. But there is no guarantee that will continue indefinitely. If foreigners chose to invest elsewhere — like the strengthening economies of Europe or Japan — the result would be higher interest rates and higher prices in America, perhaps sharply higher." The Democrats "need to take a more pragmatic view of the lopsided trade situation. The surest way to make American businesses more competitive — and workers more secure — is to resolve the nation's health care mess."

DOJ_NMG_0092865

OTHER NEWS:

Rove's Pre-Election Optimism Scrutinized. Newsweek (11/20, Wolffe, 3.12M) reports Karl Rove's "miscalculations began well before election night. The polls and pundits pointed to a Democratic sweep, but Rove dismissed them all. … He believed his 'metrics' were far superior to plain old polls. Two weeks before the elections, Rove showed NEWSWEEK his magic numbers: a series of graphs and bar charts that tallied early voting and voter outreach. Both were running far higher than in 2004. In fact, Rove thought the polls were obsolete because they relied on home telephones in an age of do-not-call lists and cell phones. Based on his models, he forecast a loss of 12 to 14 seats in the House -- enough to hang on to the majority." Newsweek goes on to report, "Ten days before the elections, House Majority Leader John Boehner visited Bush in the Oval Office with bad news. He told Bush that the party would lose Tom DeLay's old seat in Texas, where Bush was set to campaign. Bush brushed him off, Boehner recalls. 'Get me Karl,' the president told an aide. 'Karl has the numbers.' … Rove blames complacent candidates for much of the GOP's defeat. He says even some scandal-tainted members won when they followed what he calls 'the program' of voter contacts and early voting."

Time (11/20, Allen, 4.03M) reports Rove "now downplays his forecast. 'My job is not to be a prognosticator,' he told TIME in an interview in his West Wing office. 'I told the President, "I don't know where this is going to end up. But I see our way clear to Republican control." My job is not to go out there and wring my hands and say, "We're going to lose."' Rove chalks up the loss to corruption, incumbent overconfidence and conservative dissatisfaction with spending. He does not read the outcome as exclusively a judgment on either Iraq or Bush. 'Iraq mattered,' Rove says. 'But it was more frustration than it was an explicit call for withdrawal.'"

Bush Gave RNC $12 Million From Campaign Funds. Time (11/20, Allen, 4.03M) reports, "To keep the Republican National Committee from having to take out a loan, according to Republican officials, Bush chipped in $12 million of his campaign funds that otherwise would have gone to his presidential library."

GOP's Loss Of Congress Attributed To Bush's Iraq Policy. In his column for Newsweek (11/20, 3.12M) George Will writes, "More than any congressional elections in history, last week's turned on a single burning national issue. Control of Congress has changed because of deep discontent about Iraq. But Congress can, realistically, have little control over what we make of the mess we have made."

Time's Joe Klein (11/20) writes, "Not only did the Democrats lay a robust whupping on the Republicans in the midterm elections, but--far worse--the President was forced into a tacit acknowledgment that the defining policy of his Administration, the war in Iraq, was failing."

U.S. News and World Report's Mortimer Zuckerman (11/20) writes, "nothing hurt the Republicans more than the mess in Iraq. The possibility of success there was allowed to slip away through a fatal combination of arrogance and incompetence. Iraq, with its tortured history, was never going to be easy, but after 3 ½ years, with dozens of our troops dying each month and the nightly images of utter chaos on the evening news, is it any wonder voters are fed up?"

Democrats Expected To Capitalize On Gains In The West. Newsweek's Howard Fineman (11/20) writes, "The land west of the Mississippi, especially west of the 100th meridian, is the new swing region—and the place where Democrats hope to win the White House. 'It's our 21st-century-majority strategy,' said Simon Rosenberg of the New Democratic Network. … The Northeast turned a deeper blue. GOP moderates there are all but extinct; Democratic governors were elected by vast margins. The Republicans' Fortress South…cracked at the perimeter but largely held. The 'intermountain' West, meanwhile, was up for grabs. Democrats won the governorship in Colorado (and now have won five of the region's eight statehouses since 2002). The GOP hung onto the governorship in Nevada and a key Senate seat in Arizona."

Dean Claims Radio Ads Swung Evangelical Vote. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (11/20, Bedard) reports, "One of the big surprises for the Democrats in the elections was winning up to 33 percent of the white Christian evangelical vote. And here's how they did it: Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean says he simply bought every advertising minute available on Christian radio, effectively blocking out the GOP. Ads touted Democratic values. The real secret: 'We had the weatherman doing the ads. Why? Because he's a local person who could be trusted.'"

DOJ_NMG_0092866

Gingrich Blames DeLay For GOP's Defeat. Newsweek's Evan Thomas (11/20) writes, "Did the GOP revolutionaries, like so many revolutionaries before them, have to become the very thing they had once vowed to change?" Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "blames his successors for taking the low road to disaster. … He specifically blames former majority leader Tom DeLay, who effectively replaced Gingrich as the GOP leader in the House from 1999 through 2005. In Gingrich's judgment, DeLay, as well as other Republican leaders, threw away the power of ideas in their narrow focus on self-preservation."

GOP Coalition Described As "Shattered." Newsweek's Jonathan Alter (11/20) writes, "The election marked the exhaustion of the movement that Barry Goldwater launched with his 1964 campaign. The intellectual vitality and coherence that once characterized modern conservatism have been shattered. Karl Rove is still arguing that the hot issues of this election—Iraq, corruption, sexual hypocrisy -- are only 'transitory.' He's ignoring deep fissures in his party. Neocons have been discredited and theocons dispirited."

President Seen As Unaware Of Public's Perception Of The Economy. Newsweek's Jane Bryant Quinn (11/20) writes, "Talk about being in denial. President Bush thought that voters should credit him for a great economy, even if they opposed the war. Just look at the numbers: low unemployment, low inflation, record profits, taxes down, stocks up. But in exit polls, half the voters called the economy 'not good' or 'poor.' Only 31 percent said they were 'getting ahead' financially. Someone's not in the loop. Is it the public or the prez?"

Steele Expresses Interest In RNC Post. The AP (11/13, Witte) reports Maryland Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, "who lost his race for a Senate seat, expressed interest Sunday in becoming chairman of the Republican National Committee." On C-SPAN, Steele said, "I have not had any conversations directly with the White House yet on this." The AP adds current RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman is "stepping down when his two-year term ends in January. Mehlman made a point of emphasizing outreach to black voters and helped recruit Steele for the Maryland race." Steele, who "lost to Democratic Rep. Benjamin Cardin by a margin of 55 percent to 44 percent of the vote, said he believed it was time for the GOP to rethink its views in wake of losing both chambers of Congress in last week's midterm elections, which he described as a 'tsunami.' Steele said the electorate 'was very clear.'" Steele said, "They expected the administration and the party to step up and speak to particular issues and, failing that, there would be heck to pay — and we paid."

Democratic Georgia Incumbents Buck Countervailing Trend To Survive. The New York Times (11/13, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "Politically speaking, Georgia proved to be a mirror image of the rest of the country in the midterm elections. Republicans swept nearly every statewide office, and turnout among Democrats was low, thanks to a lackluster candidate for governor." But "two Democratic congressmen in highly competitive races in the state seem to have successfully fought those odds, though they are hanging on by the slenderest of margins and are still waiting for their opponents to concede." Democrats "Jim Marshall of Macon, in the Eighth Congressional District, and John Barrow of Savannah, in the 12th District, were on the Republican Party's short list of beatable incumbents. Their adjoining districts, which encompass large rural areas, were redrawn by a Republican legislature, their opponents were former congressmen, and the National Republican Congressional Committee poured hundreds of thousands of dollars into the races. President Bush campaigned in each district twice."

Tester Described As "Your Grandfather's Democrat." In a largely favorable profile, the New York Times (11/13, Egan, 1.16M) reports, "When he joins the United States Senate in January, big Jon Tester -- who is just under 300 pounds in his boots -- will most likely be the only person in the world's most exclusive club who knows how to butcher a cow or grease a combine. All his life, Mr. Tester, 50, has lived no more than two hours from his farm, an infinity of flat on the windswept expanse of north-central Montana, hard by the Rocky Boy's Indian Reservation." Tester "truly is your grandfather's Democrat -- a pro-gun, anti-big-business prairie pragmatist whose life is defined by the treeless patch of hard Montana dirt that has been in the family since 1916. … Friends say not to worry about Mr. Tester going native in Washington. He said he planned to return home to the farm several times a month. He promised his barber, Bill Graves, that he would continue to come back to get his hair cut in the same wheat-field bristle."

DOJ_NMG_0092867

Debate Underway Over Whether Democratic Wins Amount To "Wave." The Washington Post (11/13, A19, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "There is no doubt that Democrats did well on Tuesday, capturing almost 30 seats in the House, six seats in the Senate and control of both chambers. But was it the Democratic 'wave' that so many had believed was about to sweep the country? Republican leaders said it was not. … By some measures, the Republicans are right. Since World War II, the party in the White House has tended to lose seats in Congress in the sixth year of an administration, and the average losses matched this year's -- 29 seats in the House and six in the Senate. When there was an unpopular war, the losses were greater." But "political scientists say that assessment of Tuesday's results ignores an important change in recent years. They say Republicans have re-engineered the political map, stuffing congressional districts with supporters to make the districts reliably pro-GOP. The financial and electoral advantages of incumbency, moreover, have reached new heights."

The Washington Post (11/13, A8, Balz, 690K) reports, "Rarely has an election result been delivered with such force and clarity, and still left so many unanswered questions in its wake, as that of the 2006 midterm campaign. What happened is unmistakable. What it may portend is far less obvious, making the 2008 election, which already has begun, potentially the most important in a generation or more in shaping the nation's politics." Democrats "have been quick to claim that 2006 will be remembered as the end of a conservative era. … What the election was not, in the view of strategists in both parties, was a powerful affirmation of the Democratic Party, despite its takeover of the House and Senate. One post-election survey, conducted for the liberal groups Democracy Corps and the Campaign for America's Future, found that both Republicans and Democrats emerged from the contest with negative images." The Post adds, "Tuesday's election left American politics in a remarkably fluid state. In just six years, the political discussion has moved from analyzing the reasons for the nation's 50-50 divide, to predictions that the Republicans were close to establishing a durable majority, to questions about whether Tuesday marked a pendulum swing back toward the Democrats."

Media Role In Democratic Wins Critiqued. In a Washington Times op-ed (11/13), Douglas MacKinnon, a former press secretary to Sen. Bob Dole, says in addition to GOP "missteps" and "incredibly well-run Democratic campaigns," a third cause of the Democratic takeover of Congress is "that the remnants of objectivity in the mainstream media were all but exterminated by some on the left. A chilling and ominous development that played some role in the Democratic wave that is still splashing around the red states." There "can be no doubt that the left-of-center mainstream media helped to manufacture this election victory for the Democratic Party. For parts of the last two years, many in the media have worked in concert with the Democratic spin doctors to indoctrinate the American voter into believing this election had to be a referendum on President Bush and the 'failed' war in Iraq."

Democrats' Gains Said To Present Test Of Media's Objectivity. The Washington Post's Howard Kurtz, in his "Media Notes" column (11/13) writes, "Now the question is whether a press corps that has been openly at odds with the president will hold the newly empowered Democrats to the same tough standards. As with any new regime, Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi are enjoying a media honeymoon for the moment -- especially Pelosi, because of her status as the first woman in line to become House speaker and her grandmother-of-five persona. That may not last long. But where will journalists set the performance bar? … The biggest change may be in store for liberal commentators, radio hosts and bloggers." Kurtz asks, "If Reid and Pelosi compromise with their more moderate colleagues, will hard-driving liberal bloggers turn on them?"

McCain Forms '08 Exploratory Committee. The AP (11/13, Yen) reports Sen. John McCain "said Sunday he is taking the initial steps for a White House bid in 2008, setting up a committee that allows a potential candidate to raise money and travel the country to gauge support." McCain "said he is moving toward a 2008 bid by 'doing things organizationally and legally' but will not make a final decision until early next year." During the 2006 election cycle, McCain "attended 346 events and raising more than $10.5 million on behalf of Republican candidates. He also donated nearly $1.5 million to federal, state and county parties."

The Washington Post (11/13, A8, Milbank, 690K) reports McCain, "appearing on NBC's 'Meet the Press' yesterday, said that while he won't make a decision until talking with his family over the holidays, 'Are we doing the things organizationally and legally that need to be done to prepare for it? Yes.' McCain indicated that the formation of an exploratory committee is imminent."

DOJ_NMG_0092868

The Washington Times (11/13, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports McCain "sought to secure his conservative credentials during the appearance, saying he considers himself a conservative in the mold of President Reagan. He also said he thinks Republican losses last week will prove a temporary setback for his party." McCain said, "I believe America is still a conservative right-of-center nation, and our message, our Republican message, is best." The Times adds although McCain "is not the favorite prospective candidate of some grass-roots conservatives, some observers think his prospects for securing the Republican presidential nomination have improved since last Tuesday's elections."

McCain Blames Scandals And Spending For GOP's Defeats. Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (11/12, Russert) to describe what lessons he took away from Tuesday's elections Sen. John McCain said, "We Republicans have lost our way, that we came to Washington to change government, and government changed us. The spending, the ethics, the massive programs such as Medicare prescription drug program, our failure to address their priorities as opposed to our own, and there was obviously a reaction to it. The Iraq war obviously is very frustrating. … But I would submit, if they were all against the Iraq war that you probably would not have seen my friend Joe Lieberman…re-elected. So they're frustrated by the war, but I also believe that many of our spending, the scandals, the ongoing scandals, the large government programs. In other words, one of the pillars of the Republican Party is fiscal conservatives. They were alienated by the fact that we let spending lurch out of control."

McCain's '08 Frontrunner Status Attributed To His "Frankness." U.S. News and World Report's Kenneth T. Walsh (11/20) writes Sen. John McCain "has made his reputation as a man who is outside the system, a guy who does things differently, who reaches across the aisle to the opposition, and people like that,' says a senior Republican strategist. 'People like his frankness. They know where he stands. And they think he would be a good guy to have a beer with.' And that, in a nutshell, is why McCain is the early leader for the Republican nomination in 2008."

Giuliani, Romney Rated As Top-Tier Candidates. U.S. News and World Report's Walsh (11/20) adds, "Two other men are generating buzz as they jockey for position as the main alternative to the front-runner. First on the list is former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who leads some public-opinion polls. … Perhaps the most aggressive behind-the-scenes campaign is being waged by outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a strong conservative with movie-star looks and big-time charisma. Romney is modeling his approach on George W. Bush's pattern from 1999, when Bush, then governor of Texas, invited party leaders to Austin for persuasive get-acquainted sessions. Romney is doing the same thing in Boston and is apparently making a good impression as a fresh-faced Washington outsider who radiates competence and optimism while advocating smaller government."

Biden To Announce Plans On Exploratory Committee Next Year. The AP (11/13, Yen) reports Democratic Sen. Joe Biden "reaffirmed his intention to seek his party's nomination, though an announcement about establishing an exploratory committee probably will not come until early next year." But the "anticipated wide-open campaign — for the first time since the 1928 race, the field will not include a sitting president or vice president — lost one possible participant when Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., decided against a long-shot run." Biden, who "is line to take over as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, also ran for president before, dropping from the 1988 race after it became known he had lifted a portion of a speech from a British politician without attribution."

Biden, asked on ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos) about his planned presidential candidacy and if he is going to set up an exploratory committee, said, "I'm going to address that after the first of the year. I still plan on running. I haven't, quite frankly, thought through all of the mechanics of it at this point in terms of when to announce setting up an exploratory committee, but I plan on doing that."

The Washington Times (11/13, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Biden "last made a run for the White House in 1988 and is considered by many to be one of his party's leading authorities on foreign-policy matters. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, is considered the front-runner for her party's nomination. However, a number of Democrats say they are open to an alternative to Mrs. Clinton because while many polls show her winning the Democrat's nomination, most of those same polls show her trailing against her potential Republican rivals in a general election." The Washington Post (11/13, A8, Milbank, 690K) says Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack "last week became the first to announce his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination."

DOJ_NMG_0092869

Senatorial Experience May Not Serve Obama Well If He Seeks Presidency. The Washington Post (11/13, A19, Babington, 690K) reports Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) "might be well advised to stay in the Senate several more years before running for president, as many strategists have suggested. But there are at least 40 reasons to challenge that advice." That is "the number of senators who have tried, and failed, to reach the White House since Sen. John F. Kennedy (D-Mass.) accomplished the feat in 1960. Nearly all of them had more Senate experience than Obama, underscoring the light regard that American voters show for senatorial longevity and expertise in presidential elections." If Obama's "aim is to become a more respected and knowledgeable senator -- in the mold of, say, Robert J. Dole (18 years in the Senate before his 1996 presidential race), Henry 'Scoop' Jackson (20 Senate years before his 1972 bid) or Richard G. Lugar (20 Senate years before his 1996 try) -- it may be a laudable goal. But it's a highly questionable presidential strategy." Obama, who "is 45 and just two years removed from the Illinois legislature, has a third option that is less viable for McCain and Clinton. He could angle for the vice presidency, a route to the Oval Office for former senators Harry S. Truman, Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon -- but not for Hubert H. Humphrey, Walter F. Mondale, Dan Quayle and Al Gore."

Polls Show Clinton's Still Hampered By Public's "Entrenched" Views. U.S. News and World Report (11/20, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "faces a familiar dilemma: Can she overcome the nation's entrenched views of her—and her husband—in a presidential campaign? For the presumed Democratic front-runner, the answer is unclear. A Gallup Poll this year found that 17 percent of Americans would definitely back her and that 49 percent would definitely not, but that less than 1 percent had no opinion."

Several Democrats Competing For Liberal Base Voters. U.S. News and World Report (11/20, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports that "at this stage" former Sen. John Edwards "has some advantages among the liberals. He placed second to John Kerry in the all-important Iowa caucuses in 2004 and still has a loyal network of volunteers there. Edwards may also benefit from the addition of two states to the early primary lineup-his native South Carolina and Nevada, where he has strong ties to unionized hotel and restaurant workers." Sen. Russ Feingold, "who voted against the Iraq war and the Patriot Act, is reminding audiences in Iowa and New Hampshire that both measures passed Congress with Democratic support. … Of course, Democratic stars like Al Gore and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama could become the anti-Clinton darlings of the netroots, making them the two biggest x factors."

Elder Bush, Clinton Address Realtors Convention In New Orleans. The AP (11/13, Foster) reports they are "separated by more than 20 years, they come from opposing political parties, and one evicted the other from the White House. But Bill Clinton and George Bush act like a team, a pair of touring comedians with a well-honed act." The two former presidents "even have their entrance down pat, striding in with arms aloft, music pounding, lights flashing, the crowd standing and going wild." The pair "addressed more than 25,000 people attending the National Association of Realtors convention on Saturday, drawing at least six standing ovations and almost continuous applause." Bush and Clinton "thanked the real estate agents for holding their convention in New Orleans. It's the biggest convention to come to the city since Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, 2005, and the pair has raised $130 million to aid New Orleans and the Gulf Coast in recovering from the storm." Regarding the "recent election, both said they had to deal with congresses controlled for most or all of their presidencies by the other party. They said some of the best legislation during that time were made through compromises." Clinton said "he did not think his wife, Sen. Hillary Clinton, had decided yet whether she would run for the presidency. 'If she were to be elected I think she would do a good job,' Clinton said." Bush added, "Yeah, but I'm having a little difficulty picturing this fellow walking behind her like Prince Philip behind the queen."

Ford Becomes Oldest Living President In History. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 7, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Gerald Ford entered the history books again today by becoming our oldest living former President. At 93 years and 121 days Mr. Ford is one day older than Ronald Reagan was when he died in 2004." The Washington Post (11/13, 690K) also notes Ford's record.

Acumen Fund Designed To Be "Philanthropic Venture" Fund. The New York Times (11/13, Lee, 1.16M) reports the idea "befuddled donors and Internal Revenue Service lawyers alike when Jacqueline Novogratz approached them six years ago. A philanthropic venture capital fund?" Novogratz planned to make the Acumen Fund "a nonprofit charity" that "would invest in companies and groups that tackled global poverty." Novogratz said it was "an unusual idea to pitch to philanthropists," adding, "They had never seen an organization like us: raising charitable money but wanting the flexibility of grants, loans and equity investments in for-profit and nonprofit organizations." The Times adds Novogratz, "who has an M.B.A., has backgrounds in both in finance and philanthropy and worked as a banker at Chase Manhattan and as a manager of special projects at the Rockefeller Foundation before starting Acumen." Two "key people intuitively grasped the Acumen Fund's mission: Larry Page and Sergey Brin, the co-founders of Google, whom Ms. Novogratz first met at a Technology Entertainment and Design conference two years ago. During the period when Google's new charitable foundation, Google.org, was defining itself, the company's founders knew they shared a vision with Ms. Novogratz — a desire to reinvent philanthropy and push the boundaries of how people who had done well could also do good."

DOJ_NMG_0092870

Liberals Urged To Co-Opt "Values" Debate. In a USA Today op-ed (11/13), Tom Krattenmaker of the USA board of contributors says, "I am a values voter. Given my progressive political and religious beliefs, some might find this a dubious claim — especially members of the Christian right, who with their rhetoric about 'values voters' suggest that only those who share their positions on abortion and same-sex couples possess something deserving of the term 'values.'" Apparently, "those of us who hold different positions on the hot-button issues as framed by social conservatives — those of us who turn our attention and hearts to other imperatives such as peace-making, poverty relief, environmental preservation and tolerance — have no values. According to the rhetoric of social conservatives, progressives are the 'anything goes' lot. Secularists, liberal Christians and followers of other faiths — we're the ones tearing America down with our moral weakness and hostility to the conservative Christian worldview." As progressives "wield language that once belonged solely to conservatives, may we do so fairly, in a way that acknowledges that the other side of the debate also has values. In so doing, we'll model other core values of ours: inclusiveness and respect for differing viewpoints."

WSJournal Notes World Bank Study Says Simple Tax Systems Promote Growth. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A16, 2.04M) says in an editorial that the World Bank's "toiling economists have discovered that simplified tax systems promote economic growth. In a report titled 'Paying Taxes -- The Global Picture,' the World Bank and its co-authors at PricewaterhouseCoopers make the case for simplifying business taxes. Burdensome rules and multiple levies, they argue, promote tax evasion even when individual corporate tax rates are low. Make the system transparent and simple, and the private sector will pony up. It's an argument that could be made for personal income taxes, too." The survey "examines the tax regimes of 175 countries between April and July this year. It looks at the administrative tax burden that a hypothetical, limited liability company with 60 employees would face. The Bank's findings echo that of the flat-tax camp; namely, simple tax regimes promote compliance and efficiency."

Bush To Visit Vietnam This Week. USA Today (11/13, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush travels this week to the site of an old military conflict casting a shadow over the United States and Iraq: Vietnam. Bush's trip, including stops in Singapore and Indonesia, is mainly to promote trade at a conference in Hanoi and discuss ways to combat terrorism in the region." But "the eight-day journey also includes reminders of how the Vietnam War roiled US politics and society and raises questions about whether the same thing is happening with Iraq." Bush "stressed what he said were the differences with reporters last week. He said Iraqis overthrew Saddam Hussein with US help, approved a new constitution and formed a government that is trying to move forward despite sectarian violence. Vietnam endured a civil war in which the communist North, backed by China and the Soviet Union, defeated a U.S.-supported government in the South." The Iraq war "is also being fought with a volunteer army, Bush said, without the compulsory draft that inspired protests in the 1960s and early '70s. The president also said US troops in Iraq are receiving more support from the American people than those in Vietnam did."

US, Vietnamese Officials Assessing Effects Of Agent Orange Spraying. The Washington Post (11/13, A1, Faiola, 690K) reports, "For decades, the United States and Vietnam have wrangled over the question of responsibility for the US military's deployment of Agent Orange." But "officials say they are now moving to jointly address at least one important aspect of the spraying's aftermath -- environmental damage at Vietnamese 'hot spots' such as Nguyen's city, Da Nang -- that are still contaminated with dioxin 31 years after the fall of Saigon. … Vietnamese and US officials last year conducted their first joint scientific research project related to Agent Orange. Testing of the soil near Da Nang's airport, where farmers say they have been unable to grow rice or fruit trees for decades, showed dioxin levels there as much as 100 times above acceptable international standards. Now the United States is planning to co-fund a project to remove massive amounts of the chemical from the soil." The Post adds, "A senior US official involved in Vietnam policy said the plan is evidence that the two countries, having embarked on a new era of economic cooperation, are finally collaborating to address the problem."

DOJ_NMG_0092871

Vietnam Frees US Citizen Convicted Of Terrorism. The Washington Post (11/13, A17, Kessler, 690K) reports that a US citizen "convicted of terrorism in a Vietnamese court has been released and will arrive today in the United States, her daughter said yesterday. The case of Orlando resident Thuong Nguyen 'Cuc' Foshee had complicated efforts by the Bush administration to pass a major trade bill with Vietnam." The Post notes that President Bush will arrive in Hanoi on Friday for an Asian economic summit "and has pressed for the trade bill's passage before he leaves Washington." The House is expected to take up the measure today.

Bush To Discuss Trade With Putin. AFP (11/13, Collinson) reports, "President George W. Bush Wednesday holds the first of two meetings with Russian leader Vladimir Putin within five days, bearing the prize of a long sought-after pact on Moscow's entry into the WTO. While the deal announced Friday is a landmark between two former Cold War foes, it will also throw a harsh spotlight on growing strains in US-Russian relations, as it is expected to face harsh scrutiny in Congress." The two meetings, "one in Moscow on Wednesday and one in Vietnam next Sunday, come as expectations mount of an increasingly testy relationship between Congress, captured by Democrats in Tuesday's elections, and the Kremlin." AFP adds, "Concern is mounting among US legislators on a list of US-Russia disagreements, spanning Moscow's reluctance to impose sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program, geopolitical concerns like Georgia and post-Soviet states, human rights, and trade spats." There is also "disquiet over how the emerging energy superpower hands out oil and gas contracts, its arms sales to US foe Venezuela and the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya."

Seoul Rejects US-Led Measures To Sanction North. The AP (11/13, Chang) reports South Korea "balked Monday at participating in a US-led plan that foresees intercepting North Korean ships suspected of carrying supplies for the regime's nuclear and missile weapons programs." Worried that stopping and searching ships "could lead to armed clashes" with the North, Seoul "also insisted it is already doing enough to prevent weapons proliferation by Pyongyang." Speaking about a report on how it would carry out UN sanctions, deputy foreign minister Park In-kook said Seoul "already participated in various regimes to control weapons of mass destruction, and wouldn't formally join the US-led Proliferation Security Initiative."

Russia Says Early December Proposed For Talks. AFP (11/13) reports that six-nation talks on ending North Korea's nuclear weapons drive "may be held at the beginning of December," Russia's ambassador to Japan, Alexander Losyukov, said. The ambassador said dates "early next month have been proposed among diplomats."

Czech Intelligence Says It Thwarted Nuclear Deals. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, 850K) reports briefly that the Czech secret service "disrupted three attempts last year by North Korea to purchase equipment needed for nuclear weapons production," Czech media reported. "Last year our service halted three export deals headed for North Korea, in particular special machine tools, their components and spare parts," a secret service spokesman, Jan Subrt, told the nation's CTK news agency.

Olmert Arrives In Washington For Talks On Palestinian Conflict, Iran. The Washington Times/AP (11/13, Teibel) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert began a five-day trip to the United States Sunday, "armed with an agenda focusing on the Iranian nuclear threat and Israel's relations with the Palestinians." On the flight over, Olmert "repeated his view that Iran will not scale back its nuclear ambitions unless it fears the consequences of its intransigence," a spokeswoman said. At the same time, Olmert appeared "to play down a senior Israeli official's suggestion that Israel is preparing for a military strike against Iran's nuclear program." The AP notes that Olmert "has said Iran's nuclear ambitions would be the main item on his agenda when he meets with US officials in Washington," where he "had dinner with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Sunday, but neither US nor Israeli officials would describe the subjects of their conversation." Olmert was scheduled to meet with President Bush on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0092872

AFP (11/13, Bousso) says Olmert's meeting Monday with Bush "has been described in Israel as 'a down-to-business meeting' on Iran. With Tehran continuing to reject international calls to halt its nuclear enrichment efforts, Israel has in recent months moved the Iranian threat to the top of its agenda. But Israel could have reason for concern about the resignation of US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a ferocious opponent of dialogue. His expected successor, Robert Gates, has signed onto a report calling for dialogue with Iran."

In a 3,000-word analysis piece titled "In New Middle East, Tests For An Old Friendship," the New York Times (11/13, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports, "Even before the American elections, a certain wariness had crept into the intimate friendship between Israel and the United States. … In theory, the two countries share a vision for a modern Middle East in which a thriving Israel would be accepted by its neighbors. But the Israelis balk at President Bush's embrace of regional change through promotion of Arab democracy. They view his effort as naïve and counterproductive, because it brings Islamists and Iranian clients to power. Although Israel was grateful to see Saddam Hussein overthrown, officials here have long focused on what they consider a much bigger concern: preventing Iran from gaining nuclear weapons. They say the American policies that have empowered Iranian-backed militias in Iraq have been counterproductive to Israel's interests."

In a column for the Washington Post (11/13, 690K), Jackson Diehl writes, "Today two bruised, weakened and defensive politicians, George W. Bush and Ehud Olmert, will sit down together at the White House for the first time in six months. Whether the tide of extremism now roaring across the Middle East -- from the Gaza Strip to Baghdad -- can be turned back could depend on whether they find a way to buck each other up." Bush and Olmert "will have to face the reality that Iran is winning -- not just in preserving its nuclear program but in a broader contest over the direction of the Middle East. Olmert's 'disengagement' plan is dead, at least for now; so is Bush's hope that an Iraqi coalition government could stabilize the country. … Imagine Ehud Olmert emerging from the White House to announce that Israel is prepared to explore peace with Syria. It might not turn the ugly tide in the Middle East. But it would, at least, get Israel and the United States back in the fight."

Olmert Discusses Lessons Learned From War In Lebanon. Newsweek's Lally Weymouth (11/20) interviews Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Olmert, discussing the aftermath of Israel's attack on Lebanon this summer, says, "After the war, and the failure of the Palestinians to cope with continued terrorist actions, I had second thoughts about my ability to accomplish the two-state solution through realignment. One thing I can promise: under no circumstances am I going to withdraw from the need to engage in a serious dialogue with the Palestinians. The Palestinian issue is on the agenda. There is no way we can ignore it. We have to find the best partner—a lot depends on the Palestinian leadership." Asked if is planning to speak with president Bush about Iran, Olmert said, "I think that Bush is the last person on earth who needs to be reminded of what should be done in order to stop Iran. If there is one person I can trust, it's him."

Rice Says US "Concerned" By Syria's Aid To Hezbollah. AFP (11/13) reports Secretary Rice said Sunday in an interview with Israel's Maariv daily that Washington "believes Syria is a dangerous state whose territory is being used for the accelerated arming of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia." The newspaper quoted the Secretary saying Syria is "a dangerous state that is behaving in a dangerous manner. The United States is concerned and is following closely the use of Syrian territory as a way-station for the accelerated arming of Hezbollah." As Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arrives in Washington for talks with President Bush, Rice called Syria "a way-station for Iranian arms that cross the Middle East," and stressed that the US is "watching this situation closely," while "working with additional international agencies in order to tell Syria that it must change this behavior pattern."

Echoing Secretary Rice's comments, White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten said on ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), "Our problem with Iran and Syria in the past, I don't believe, has been a lack of communication. In fact, during the first term of this President, we spent a lot of time trying to talk to the Syrians to no effect. So I don't think there's been a communications problem. There's been a cooperation problem. Iran and Syria have been meddling in Iraq in a very unhelpful way. Iranian weapons and technology have found their way into the Iraqi conflict and are being used to kill Iraqis and American soldiers. That needs to stop."

DOJ_NMG_0092873

Arab League Calls For New Round Of Mideast Peace Talks. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 4, 1:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight the Arab League is calling for a peace conference with Israel. And while the Hamas led Palestinian government has endorsed the idea, so far, Israeli officials say unless Hamas recognizes Israel there will be no meeting. Mark Phillips reports from Tel Aviv tonight on another week of violence in the Middle East and another try for peace from the White House." CBS (Phillips) added, "Call it two damaged leaders in search of the Mideast policy. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is in Washington to see President Bush. The agenda, to explore where, if anywhere, the stalled peace process can go from here. It seems to be going backwards, especially last week. The funeral in Gaza of 18 people, seven of them young children killed by Israeli shells, has stoked the fury of Palestinian militants who have vowed revenge. And the hail, however ineffective of Hamas rocket fire into southern Israel, has continued despite the Israeli attempts to stop it. In this context Israel's occasional offers to hold talks with Palestinian President Abbas have gone nowhere. … But Abbas is in no position to sit down and talk. He's still trying to resolve a bitter internal power struggle between his own Fatah movement and the more militant Hamas, which is stubbornly refusing to recognize Israel's right to exist. … No matter what happens in meetings in Washington this week further violence, not peace, seems the more likely outcome."

The Washington Times/AP (11/13, Nasrawi) reports the Arab League statement said ministers sought a conference to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict "according to international resolutions and the principle of 'land for peace.'" Meanwhile, Arab ministers "also decided Sunday to end a financial blockade on the Palestinians to show their anger over US veto in the" UNSC Saturday condemning the Israeli attack in Gaza. Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa said the decision to break the Western-lead financial blockade was "a message to the United States."

Cabinet Resignations Shake Beirut. Following this weekend's resignations of five Shitte cabinet ministers, the New York Times (11/13, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "Lebanon is in the middle of a political crisis that is not just a matter of jockeying for power, but a fundamental realignment of authority here -- and perhaps in the region." The Times says the resignations set the stage "for a showdown between Hezbollah and its allies, which are aligned with Syria and Iran, and the Sunni, Druse and Christian leaders who control the largest bloc in Parliament and side with the West. Hezbollah has threatened to stage demonstrations as early as Monday, but Hezbollah officials said Sunday that they were waiting to see how their opposition responded and were considering all options. The governing coalition is expected to make its counterstrike on Monday."

Iran Says It Will Retaliate If Attacked By Israel. The AP (11/13, Karimi) reports, "Iran's military will retaliate swiftly and strongly if Israel attacks any Iranian nuclear sites, the Foreign Ministry said Sunday." The warning "came two days after Israel's deputy defense minister suggested Israel might be forced to launch a military strike against Iran's disputed nuclear program as 'a last resort.'" Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini said, "If the Zionist regime commits such stupidity, the response by the Iranian military will be swift, strong and crushing. … Iran will take no longer than a second to respond."

Ahmadinejad Calls UN Efforts To Impose Sanctions "Disgraceful." The New York Times (11/13, Fathi, 1.16M) reports, "President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Sunday described efforts by the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran as 'disgraceful.'" Iran "contends that its nuclear program is peaceful and that its aim is to produce fuel for its nuclear power plants."

Islamists Capture Somali Town. The AP (11/13, Nor) reports, "Islamic militants said they captured a town in central Somalia on Sunday after they came under attack from pro-government militiamen backed by troops from Ethiopia and a semiautonomous region in northern Somalia. The fighting erupted near the border of the Puntland region, one of the few areas in Somalia still outside the control of the Islamic movement. The group said it captured the town of Bandiradley, about 430 miles north of the capital, Mogadishu, and two of its fighters were killed in the battle." The New York Times (11/13, Gettleman, 1.16M) says "each side blamed the other for the bloodshed, which claimed as many as 10 lives." The Financial Times (11/13, Biedermann) and Wall Street Journal (11/13, A4, Higgins, 2.04M), among other sources, also report the story.

DOJ_NMG_0092874

Chinese Sub Stalked US Aircraft Carrier Last Month. The Washington Times (11/13, Gertz, 88K) reports, "A Chinese submarine stalked a U.S. aircraft carrier battle group in the Pacific last month and surfaced within firing range of its torpedoes and missiles before being detected, The Washington Times has learned." The "surprise encounter highlights China's continuing efforts to prepare for a future conflict with the US, despite Pentagon efforts to try to boost relations with Beijing's communist-ruled military." The Times adds, "The submarine encounter with the USS Kitty Hawk and its accompanying warships also is an embarrassment to the commander of U.S. forces in the Pacific, Adm. William J. Fallon, who is engaged in an ambitious military exchange program with China aimed at improving relations between the two nations' militaries."

US Says Castro's Health Deteriorating. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 5, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "US officials are telling the Associated Press they think that Castro is dying of cancer. They believe the ailing 80-year-old Cuban leader is not likely to live beyond next year." The AP (11/13, Shrader) says Washington's "dire view was reinforced last week when Cuba's foreign minister backed away from his prediction the ailing Castro would return to power by early December."

UN Official Meets With "Brutal" Ugandan Leader. The New York Times (11/13, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports on Joseph Kony, "one of the most vilified rebel leaders on the planet." He "stands accused of brainwashing countless children across northern Uganda, turning the girls into sex slaves and the boys into prepubescent killers. His so-called Christian movement, the Lord's Resistance Army, has terrorized this corner of Africa for nearly 20 years, killing tens of thousands of people, burning down huts and hacking off lips. The fact that Mr. Kony, whose followers believe he is a prophet, rarely appears in public has only added to his brutal mystique." But "on Sunday, he came out of the bush. At a camp deep in the forest on the Congo-Sudan border, Mr. Kony materialized to meet Jan Egeland, the United Nations under secretary general for humanitarian affairs and emergency relief."

The Washington Post/AP (11/13, A16, Pownall) reports Kony and Egeland "shook hands before speaking for 10 minutes in a green tent erected by the United Nations." Egeland "was seeking the release of women and children enslaved by the group during its 20-year conflict with the Ugandan government." But Kony "denied that his forces were holding prisoners."

Al Jazeera Seeks To Extends Its Reach, Influence. The New York Times (11/13, Fattah, 1.16M) reports, "Al Jazeera, the Arab news channel that began a decade ago as an upstart, has became a thorn in the side of every dictator in the region as well as of the Bush administration. Critics call it radical; its admirers lionize it. And the network continues to battle accusations that it is sympathetic to Al Qaeda and other extremists." Meanwhile, "Al Jazeera's journalists are working to transform the channel into a conglomerate with global reach. By the end of the year, Al Jazeera will have news channels in Arabic and English, a pan-Arab newspaper, Web sites and blogs, sports and children's outlets, and even a channel modeled after C-Span. The network (it turned 10 on Nov. 1) is also looking to extend its sphere of influence beyond the Arab world. On Wednesday, it will start the English-language Al Jazeera International, its most ambitious initiative yet, which will go on the air from Asia to the United States."

Ortega's Transformation In 2006 Campaign Examined. Álvaro Vargas Llosa, the director of the Center on Global Prosperity at the Independent Institute in Washington, writes in the New York Times (11/13, 1.16M) that in Nicaragua, Daniel Ortega "tossed the olive green fatigues and the red and black flag; his campaign colors were pink and turquoise, and his theme song a Spanish version of John Lennon's 'Give Peace a Chance.' He apologized for the massacre of the indigenous Miskito people that took place in the north of the country during his first regime and, finally, he instructed his legislators to vote for a bill banning abortion even in cases of a threat to the woman's life." Llosa adds, "What this farcical saga tells us is that Daniel Ortega was much more interested in being president than in being principled and, more important, that anyone who wants to lead today's Nicaragua needs to persuade voters that he will respect the rule of law and private property, will try to lure investment and will be sensitive to the nation's religious heritage. … In a sense, these moderate left-wing leaders, perhaps now including Mr. Ortega, are a lot more in sync with what Ronald Reagan and his men were aiming for in Central America in the 1980s than Oliver North would care to admit. As they fall over themselves pandering to the church, the business community and conservative voters, there's little time left over for creating a New Man."

DOJ_NMG_0092875

Ortega's Professed "Evolution" Convinces Some Former Enemies. Time (11/20, Padgett, 4.03M) reports Nicaraguan President-elect Daniel Ortega "sounds like a changed man. 'We won't eradicate poverty by eradicating capital or alienating investors but by joining forces with them,' he says. Ortega is playing to the audience, but even former rivals believe that his evolution from communist strongman to nascent capitalist may be genuine."

Calderon Describes Immigration In Context Of Free Markets. In an interview with Time (11/20, 4.03M) Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon is quoted as saying, "I cannot imagine the future of North America -- Canada, the U.S., Mexico--without a free market. Free in all senses of the word, in terms of goods and services and in terms of labor too. You cannot have an efficient and prosperous economy, even in the U.S., without developing a single, free market. On the other hand, I realize how important the immigration problem is for Americans. It is the same for Mexico. Every year we lose the best of our people: young, responsible, hardworking people. In Mexico you see a lot of towns made up of only women and the elderly. That is not exactly the country we want to have. I believe that migration is a bilateral problem, and it needs to be solved by creating jobs in Mexico."

US Media Coverage Of Africa Criticized. Novelist Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie writes in the Washington Post (11/13, 690K) about "the view of Africa from the American media, in which we are shown poverty and conflicts without any context. If I were not African, I would, after watching the coverage, think of Africa as a place of magnificent wild animals in which black Africans exist as tour guides, or as a place of desperately poor people who kill or are killed by one another for little or no reason. … Which brings me back to Madonna. I applauded her funding of orphanages in Malawi. I wish, however, that instead of asking television viewers to go to Africa and adopt, she had asked them to send a check to malaria-eradication organizations. … I wish she had pointed out, with suitable celebrity-style rage, that Western countries need to stop appeasing and propping up hopeless African leaders, that Western banks must stop enabling and accepting stolen money from these leaders, that Western donors who insist on the free movement of capital across borders must also insist on the free movement of labor. I wish she had then shown, with graphs on the screen, how these things affect the father and relatives of David Banda."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Democratic Lawmakers Will Seek A Phased Withdrawal From Iraq."
"Afghan Army Could Help Unify A Nation."
"A Friendly Voice, When Pirates Strike."
"Near A Pristine Desert Peak, Housing Looms."
"Reid Pledges Earmark Reform, But May Benefit."
"KB Home CEO Ousted Over Stock Options."

USA Today:

"Cleric Al-Sadr May Hold Iraq's Future In His Hands."
"Hospitals Too Slow On Heart Attacks."
"Democrats: Identify Pork Sponsors."

New York Times:

"Democrats Push For Troop Cuts Within Months."
"Influence Rises But Base Frays For Iraqi Cleric."
"Identity Thief Is Often Found In Family Photo."
"In New Middle East, Tests For An Old Friendship."
"Fresh Off The Farm In Montana, a Senator-To-Be."
"As Sonics Pack To Leave Town, Seattle Shrugs."
"Leaving The City For The Schools, And Regretting It."

Washington Post:

"Blasts Kill Iraqi Police Recruits."
"Pelosi Backs Murtha for Majority Leader."
"Vietnam's Toxic War Legacy."
"Like Clockwork: Hour Of Delay, Hour Of Flight."
"Va. State Police Swap '10-4' For 'Message Understood."
"Hunch Unravels Wedding Scam."

Washington Times:

"China Sub Security Stalked U.S. Fleet."
"Democrats To Propose Iraq Pullout."
"Petty Disputes Spur D.C. Killings."
"Shi'ite Fanatic Rises In Iraq To Fill Void Left By Zarqawi."
"Abused Wives in India Pin Hope On Anti-Violence Law."
"Israel's Lieberman Talk Touch."

DOJ_NMG_0092876

Detroit Free Press:
"The Road Toyota Took To Success."
"Up North Deer Hunters Migrate Down South."
"Holy Heroics Batman!"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Lame Ducks' Agenda Heavy."
"$1.8 Million Bailout."
"Atlantans Capture Hip-Hop Awards."

Houston Chronicle:
"Dyna-Might."
"Time Up For Last major Enron Exec."
"School Promotes high-Tech Tip Line."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Preempted By MLS Cup Championship.
CBS: New Course-Iraq; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Sectarian Violence-Iraq Police Problem; Israel Palestinian Conflict; Castro's Health; Motor Medics; Oldest living Former President; College Admissions; Portraits Of fallen Soldiers; Ed Bradley Remembered.
NBC: Preempted By Football.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush-Iraq Study Group; Iraq's PM-Cabinet Reshuffle; Saudi Arabia's Interior Minister-Iraq; Olmert, Bush Meeting; CA Wildfire; Ford-Longest Living President; Heart Attacks-Quicker Response Ideas; Heart Attacks-Connection To Intense Anger.
CBS: Iraq-Militias; Bush-Iraq Study Group; Northeast US-Rain; Northwest US-Precipitation; CA Wildfire; Heart Disease-Survival Rate Disparity Between Black And Whites; South Korea-Won't Join US-Led Plan To Search Cargo Going To And From North Korea; Weekend Box Office; Canada-Chocolate Recall.
NPR: Bush-Iraq Study Group; Congress-Lame Duck Session; Bush-Bolton Appointment; Finance Minister From Afghanistan-Canadian Troops; South Korea-Won't Join US-Led Plan To Search Cargo Going To And From North Korea; Spain-Maritime Disaster Demonstrators; Explosive Remnants Of War Treaty.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with the Iraq Study Group; meets with Israeli Prime Minister Olmert, White House.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. Meets for morning business.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (10 bills): 1) H.R. 409 - Sierra National Forest Land Exchange Act of 2006; 2) H.R. 3085 - To amend the National Trails System Act to update the feasibility and suitability study originally prepared for the Trail of Tears National Historic Trail and provide for the inclusion of new trail segments, land components, and campgrounds associated with that trail, and for other purposes; 3) S. 1131 - Idaho Land Enhancement Act; 4) S. 4001 - New England Wilderness Act of 2006; 5) H.R. 1129 - Pitkin County Land Exchange Act of 2006; 6) S. 435 - Lower Farmington River and Salmon Brook Wild and Scenic River Study Act of 2005; 7) S. 819 - Pactola Reservoir Reallocation Authorization Act of 2005; 8) H.R. 6121 - To amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act to reauthorize a program relating to the Lake Pontchartrain Basin, and for other purposes; 9) S. 1140 - Senator William V. Roth, Jr. Bridge Designation Act; 10) H.R. __ - To authorize the extension of nondiscriminatory treatment (normal trade relations treatment) to the products of Vietnam, and to establish a procedure for imposing quotas on imports of subsidized textile and apparel products of Vietnam 6:30 p.m. Approximate time for swearing in for Rep.-elect Albio Sires who is filling the seat of Robert Menendez of New Jersey, and for Rep.-elect Shelley Sekula-Gibbs who is filling the seat of Rep. Tom DeLay.

Other: ISRAELI PRIME MINISTER OLMERT _ Highlights: Meets with President Bush. White House. 4 p.m. Olmert's Press Secretary, Miri Eisen, holds a briefing to discuss the meetings with President Bush and Secretary of State Rice. National Press Club. Contact: Michael Doyle, 202-383-0006.

EDUCATION _ The Public Education Network holds its 16th annual conference on the transformation of public education by local education funds. Highlights: 12 p.m. Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW.

GLOBAL SOLUTIONS _ Citizens for Global Solutions holds a conference to develop bipartisan foreign policy for the 21st century. Highlights: 9 a.m. Opening session with Rep. Jim Kolbe and Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer. 10:15 a.m. Rep. Jim McGovern. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon: ``Nuclear Weapons, Power and 21st Century Security'' with Laura S. H. Holgate, Vice President for Russia/New Independent States (NIS) Programs, Nuclear Threat Initiative; Mary Beth Nikitin, Fellow, Center for Strategic & International Studies; Dr. Edward Lyman, Senior Staff Scientist, Global Security Program, Union of Concerned Scientists. Location: Hotel Palomar, 2121 P St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0092877

MIDEAST _ The Middle East Institute holds its 60th annual conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. Keynote speech - Energy Secretary Bodman. 10:15 a.m. Panel on exiting Iraq, with Jay Garner, US Army (retired); Brian Katulis, Center for American Progress; David Satterfield, Senior State Dept. Coordinator, Iraq; Qubad Talabany, Kurdistan Regional Government. 2 p.m. Panel on Afghanistan, Pakistan and regional stability, with Steve Coll, The New Yorker; James Dobbins, RAND Corporation; Richard Giguere, Royal Canadian Forces Attachi; Bruce Riedel, Brookings Institution. Location: National Press Club.

KING MEMORIAL _ 8:40 a.m. - 12 p.m. Ceremonial groundbreaking for the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial. Location: National Mall, Independence Ave. and West Basin Dr.

MILLENNIUM CHALLENGE-MALI _ 9 a.m. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Chair of the Board of the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC), will make remarks at the signing of the Millennium Challenge Compact between the United States and the Republic of Mali. Malian President Amadou Toumani Touri and MCC Chief Executive Officer Ambassador John Danilovich will also make remarks. The $461 million Compact will be signed by Ambassador Danilovich and Mali's Minister of Foreign Affairs Moctar Ouane. Location: Benjamin Franklin Room, Department of State.

TORTURE _ 9:30 a.m. Former military interrogator and prominent psychologists will discuss preliminary findings from their groundbreaking analysis on the efficacy of torture at a press conference. Recent media reports on the use of torture in intelligence gathering operations have raised important questions about the effectiveness of harsh interrogation methods. Does torture generate reliable information? Is torture an effective tool for the war on terrorism? The following participants will discuss their preliminary findings: Jean Maria Arrigo, co-founder, International Intelligence Ethics Association; Fathali Moghaddam, professor of psychology and author of From the Terrorists Point of View: What They Experience and Why They Come to Destroy; a Former Military Interrogator. Location: Georgetown University Alumni House, 3604 O St. NW.

GAS MILEAGE _ 10 a.m. The Consumer Federation of America holds a news conference to release a study of consumer attitudes toward gasoline prices and their auto purchase plans, and another analysis of how manufacturers have responded to the calls for improved fuel economy. Location: New York Room, Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

RUSSIA _ 10:30 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a lecture by Yegor Gaidar, acting prime minister during the first government of President Boris Yeltsin and the architect of the free-market revolution in post-Soviet Russia, discussing the lessons of the Soviet states failure to the new direction of the Kremlin in the last few years. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

CONGRESS-ENVIRONMENT _ 11 a.m. Environmental groups hold a telephone news conference to discuss the outlook for environmental legislation in the new Congress. Contacts: Tony Iallonardo, 202-271-8602. Notes: Callin number: 800-311-9407; passcode: Audubon1.

MARRIAGE _ 11 a.m. Women's Voices. Women Vote and pollster Stanley Greenberg hold a telephone briefing to release the results of a12-state, 4-day tracking poll of unmarried women. Analysis will include results from three polls, including a 12-state survey of unmarried women, election day exit polls and an over sample of a Democracy Corps Election night survey. Contacts: Lisa Sohn, 415-901-0111. Notes: Callin number: 800-362-0653; call title: women's voices; passcode: 7vote.

ELECTION-ANALYSIS _ 12 p.m. The Kettering Foundation holds a roundtable discussion analyzing the election returns, with Bliss Browne of Imagine Chicago, Michael Delli Carpini of the Annenberg School of Communication, Brenda Firton-Mitchell of the National Council of Churches, Richard Harwood of the Harwood Institute, former Mississippi Gov. William Winter, others. Location: National Archives.

ELECTION-WOMEN _ 12 p.m. The National Council of Women's Organizations holds a news conference to discuss the election results, how women were mobilized and voted and how women fared as candidates. Participants include

DOJ_NMG_0092878

Denise Baer, Strategic Research Concepts, President; Martha Burk, National Council of Women's Organizations; Lorraine Cole, YWCA, Chief Executive Officer; Kim Gandy, National Organization for Women, President; Dolores Huerta, United Farm Workers, Co-Founder; Crystal Lander, Feminist Majority, Campus Director; Eleanor Smeal, Ms. Magazine, Publisher; E. Faye Williams, National Congress of Black Women, Chair. Location: National Press Club.

HEALTH INSURANCE _ 12 p.m. America's Health Insurance Plans group releases a new plan to expand access to health insurance coverage to more than 40 million people. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW.

RENEWABLE ENERGY _ 12:30 p.m. The Energy Future Coalition and the 25x25 Alliance will hold a media lunch to discuss a new RAND Corporation study showing that America could dramatically increase its use of renewable energy at little to no cost to the economy. Location: National Press Club.

AIDS-SENATE _ 1 p.m. Dr. Gary Puckrein, executive director of the National Minority Health Month Foundation, and other AIDS activists hold a telephone news briefing calling for the immediate passage of the Ryan White CARE Act reauthorization bill currently stalled in the US Senate. Contacts: Hillary Maxwell, 202-572-6205. Notes: Dialin number: 800-361-0912; confirmation code: 4699501; title: Ryan White CARE Act.

BLOGGING _ 1 p.m. ``Beltway Blogger Boot Camp," a workshop designed to provide up-to-the-minute blogging best practices for communications, public relations and government relations professionals, hosted by Washington public affairs firm Issue Dynamics, Inc., with leading DC-area blog experts. Location: National Press Club.

FAITH SYMBOL _ 1 p.m. Americans United for Separation of Church and State announces litigation to force the Department of Veterans Affairs to recognize the Wiccan faith symbol, the pentacle, for use on memorial markers, plaques and headstones. Location: National Press Club.

MOCNY _ 1 p.m. US-VISIT Acting Director Robert Mocny speaks at the US-VISIT 10-Print Industry Day. Location: 12th floor, 1400 N. 14th St., Arlington. Notes: Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff speaks to the same meeting at 1:30 p.m.

CONGRESS-ACLU _ 1:30 p.m. The American Civil Liberties Union holds a conference call briefing to discuss the lame duck congressional session and its potential impact on civil liberties. Contacts: Mandy Simon, 202-675-2312. Notes: Dial in number: 800-816-4134. Access Code: 69922.

COMPETITIVENESS _ 2 p.m. The Council on Competitiveness holds a news conference to release the Competitiveness Index: Where America Stands. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 3 p.m. The Environmental and Energy Study Institute holds a briefing with officials from the British Embassy discussing the just-released Stern Review on the Economics of Climate Change. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

ELECTION-FOREIGN POLICY _ 6 p.m. Georgetown University sponsors a panel discussion on the impact of the election on foreign policy, with former Rep. Mickey Edwards, former Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman, former Assistant Secretary of State Wendy Sherman, others. Location: Bunn Center Auditorium, on campus.

ENERGY _ 6 p.m. The Defense Department holds a program with Brian Appel, chairman and CEO, Changing World Technologies, Inc., discussing ``Thinking Differently About Energy Sources: A Paradigm Shift - from Waste to Fuel." Location: Doubletree Hotel Crystal City, 300 Army Navy Dr., Arlington.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
DOJ To Argue For Ressam Sentence Before 9th Circuit Panel.... 2

War News:
Democrats Will Seek To Begin Withdrawing Troops From Iraq.... 2
White House Readies For "Busy Week" On Iraq Policy 4
White House Downplays Honors For Bush Iraq Advisers 4
Iraqi Prime Minister Announces Government Shake-Up..... 5
Iraqi Government Scheduling Mass Executions 5
Three US Soldiers Killed As Violence Claims 159 Lives In Iraq.... 5
Bolten Says Partitioning Iraq Not A Good Idea..... 6
Dalai Lama Urges That Saddam's Life Be Spared..... 6
Afghan Insurgents Launching Over 600 Attacks Per Month 6
Pakistani PM Says Military Action Alone Not Enough To Defeat Terrorists 6

Corporate Scandals:
KB Home CEO Resigns Amid Options Probe 7
Convicted Officials Forced To Sell Assets 7

Criminal Law:
Probes Focus On Halliburton's Role In Nigerian Bribery..... 7
Witness Against DC Murder Inc. Gang Gains Freedom..... 7
ID Thieves Often Close To Family 8
Maritime Officials Crack Down On Modern-Day Pirates..... 8
Report: Sighting Of Fugitive Mobster Discredited..... 8
Police Believe Maryland FedEx Shooting Was Random..... 9
Many DC Homicides Sparked By Petty Disputes 9
Virginia State Police Opt For Fewer Coded Messages 9

Civil Law:
WPost Says "Partial Birth" Law Before High Court Identical To Previous Case..... 9

Civil Rights:
Television Show About Sexual Predators Raises Rights Issues. 10
WSJournal Criticizes Wal-Mart, Costco Gender Discrimination Lawsuits 10

Antitrust:
Private Equity Fund Buyouts Come Under Scrutiny..... 10

Environment:
Snowe, Rockefeller Blast New Exxon CEO Over Global Warming..... 11

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Attorneys Challenge Arrest Of Accused Arellano Félix Cartel Leader 11
Man Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Case..... 11
Grand Jury In Rhode Island Indicts 7 In Drug-Trafficking Case .. 11
DEA Agent Says "Pro-Pot" Advocates Relay Misinformation..... 11
Authorities Link Colombian Nationals To Jewelry Theft Ring..... 11
Report Says Drug Trade Fuels Insurgency In Afghanistan 11

Immigration:
Virginia Courthouse Behavior Unravels Vast Immigrant Marriage Scam 12
Democrats Take Cautious Stance On Immigration 12

Congress-Administration:
Bush 41, Baker Thought To Have Engineered White House Shake-Up 12
Democrats Want To Deal With Gates Nomination During Lame-Duck 14
Democrats, Bush Seen As Likely To Cooperate On Few Issues 15
Full Agenda Planned For Lame-Duck, But Progress May Be Limited..... 15
Bolton Not Expected To Win Confirmation 16
Automakers To Press Bush On Health Care, Weak Yen..... 17
Bolten Says Bush Would Conditionally Support Minimum Wage Hike 17
Dean Cautions Democrats To "Be Careful" Regarding Tax Cuts 17
Pelosi Will Push To Require Identification Of Earmark Sponsors 18
Stark Says Democrats Need To Move Quickly To Revamp Medicare Drug Plan 18
Parties May Clash On Science, Technology Issues..... 19
Bolten Sees GOP Losses As An Opportunity For Bush..... 19
Pelosi Backs Murtha In Race For House Majority Leader..... 19
Pence Praised As Candidate For House Minority Leader Post... 19
Lieberman Declines To Rule Out Future Party Switch 20
McConnell Unopposed For Senate Minority Leader..... 20
Most FEHBP Enrollees Will Not See Premiums Increase..... 20
NYTimes Urges Democrats To Focus On Appropriations Oversight..... 20
NYTimes Says Democrats, GOP Must Address Trade Deficit.... 20

Other News:
Rove's Pre-Election Optimism Scrutinized 21

Steele Expresses Interest In RNC Post 22
Democratic Georgia Incumbents Buck Countervailing Trend To Survive 22
Tester Described As "Your Grandfather's Democrat." 22
Debate Underway Over Whether Democratic Wins Amount To "Wave." 22
McCain Forms '08 Exploratory Committee 23
Biden To Announce Plans On Exploratory Committee Next Year24
Senatorial Experience May Not Serve Obama Well If He Seeks Presidency 24
Polls Show Clinton's Still Hampered By Public's "Entrenched" Views 24
Elder Bush, Clinton Address Realtors Convention In New Orleans 25
Ford Becomes Oldest Living President In History 25
Acumen Fund Designed To Be "Philanthropic Venture" Fund 25
Liberals Urged To Co-Opt "Values" Debate 25
WSJournal Notes World Bank Study Says Simple Tax Systems Promote Growth 25
Bush To Visit Vietnam This Week 26
Bush To Discuss Trade With Putin 26
Seoul Rejects US-Led Measures To Sanction North 26
Olmert Arrives In Washington For Talks On Palestinian Conflict, Iran 27
Cabinet Resignations Shake Beirut 28
Iran Says It Will Retaliate If Attacked By Israel 28
Islamists Capture Somali Town 28
Chinese Sub Stalked US Aircraft Carrier Last Month 28
US Says Castro's Health Deteriorating 29
UN Official Meets With "Brutal" Ugandan Leader 29
Al Jazeera Seeks To Extends Its Reach, Influence 29
Ortega's Transformation In 2006 Campaign Examined 29
Calderon Describes Immigration In Context Of Free Markets..... 29
US Media Coverage Of Africa Criticized 30

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 30

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 31

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ To Argue For Ressam Sentence Before 9th Circuit Panel. The AP (11/13, Johnson) reports, "The Justice Department says there is 'precious little' to explain why Ahmed Ressam received a sentence of only 22 years for plotting to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on the eve of the millennium. Ressam's lawyers say the sentence was a decade too long." The AP continues, "A three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals will hear their arguments Monday. … Both sides are challenging aspects of the punishment U.S. District Judge John C. Coughenour imposed last year. Ressam's lawyers, Thomas Hillier and Michael Filipovic, believe that one of the nine counts he was convicted of should be thrown out, which would reduce the sentence by 10 years." The AP adds, "The U.S. Attorney's Office has suggested that Coughenour's decision to sentence Ressam to less than the 35 years it requested may have been colored by a distaste for the Bush administration's treatment of 'enemy combatants.' In their appeal, prosecutors repeatedly cited Coughenour's comments at sentencing, when he said Ressam's case illustrated that U.S. courts are plenty capable of handling terrorism cases. … 'We did not need to use a secret military tribunal,' the judge said at the time, 'or detain the defendant indefinitely as an enemy combatant, or deny him the right to counsel, or invoke any proceedings beyond those guaranteed by or contrary to the United States Constitution.'" The AP notes, "Customs agents in Port Angeles, across the Strait of Juan de Fuca from Canada, caught Ressam with explosives in the trunk of his rental car when he arrived by ferry in December 1999. The arrest prompted the cancellation of millennium celebrations at Seattle's Space Needle. He was convicted of terrorism and explosives charges at trial in 2001, then decided to tell investigators what he knew about al-Qaida in an effort to win a shorter sentence."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats Will Seek To Begin Withdrawing Troops From Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Miller, 850K) reports Democrats appearing on the Sunday political shows said they "would press to begin a phased U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq within four to six months, part of an agenda aimed at overhauling key aspects of U.S. policy in the Middle East." But senior White House officials "countered that setting timetables for U.S. troop withdrawals would weaken the Iraq government and embolden insurgents." Still, they "acknowledged a need for fresh ideas on Iraq and expressed a new willingness to negotiate with Democrats on an array of foreign policy issues. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten indicated that the president would block legislation calling for a scheduled withdrawal." The front-page New York Times (11/13, Stolberg, Mazzetti, 1.16M) story paints the White House as conciliatory, saying the Administration "signaled a willingness to listen to the Democrats' proposals," with Bolten "saying in two television appearances that the president was open to 'fresh ideas' and a 'fresh look.'"

DOJ_NMG_0092881

The Financial Times (11/13, Guha, Eaglesham) says that while "courteous in tone, the renewed sparring shows how difficult it will be to sustain the bipartisan approach to government pledged by leaders of both parties following last week's vote, in which the Democrats won control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years." A Washington Times (11/13, Pfeiffer, 88K) report is more blunt, saying that Joseph Biden of Foreign Relations and Carl Levin of Armed Services, the "two top Senate Democrats on foreign policy yesterday said they will introduce a resolution in January calling for troops to start being withdrawn from Iraq by this summer, a move that Sen. John McCain said would put the U.S. in the worst of both worlds." USA Today (11/13, 4A, 2.27M) also runs a summary of the Sunday morning back-and-forth.

Bolten said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "Everybody's objective here is to succeed in Iraq. I think that's true of Democrats as well as Republicans. What the President has said is that we need to get fresh eyes on the problem. We need a fresh perspective. And that's why he has his Pentagon" and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace "conducting a review of all of our options in Iraq. He's asked his other national security agencies to do the same in parallel. We're looking forward to the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton bipartisan Iraq Study Group. And we're looking forward to a dialogue with bipartisan leaders in Congress." On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Bolten made an almost identical case, noting the reviews by the Pentagon and other agencies and the upcoming Baker-Hamilton report.

As for a timetable, Bolten said on ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), "I don't think we're going to be receptive to the notion there's a fixed timetable at which we automatically pull out, because that could be a true disaster for the Iraqi people. But what we've always been prepared to do and remain prepared to do is…put pressure on the Iraqi government to take over themselves. It's what Prime Minister Maliki wants himself to do."

Senate Democrats Say Change In Course Needed. On CBS's Face the Nation (11/12, Schieffer) Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said, "We need to have a redeployment in Iraq. What does that mean, pull everybody out now? Of course not. But it does mean that we need to change our operation there to counterinsurgency, better training and force protection. Number two, we need to revitalize the reconstruction. … And also what we need to do is have a regional conference led by the President of the United States and participated in by Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Egypt, Syria. It's a regional problem. It's not all our problem."

On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Levin said, "First order of business is to change the direction of Iraq policy. The people spoke dramatically, overwhelmingly, resoundingly to change the course in Iraq, in a message that was heard around the world. I hope it was heard in the White House."

Biden, also on ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), said the only leverage Democrats have "is international and domestic public opinion, and, most importantly, the pressure coming from [the President's] own Republican colleagues. The last thing the senators who are up for reelection in 2008 want is to be saddled with a continued failure in Iraq as a consequence of Republican policy, that is the President's policy."

Sen. Charles Schumer said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "The present strategy in Iraq is not working, and there needs to be a change in course. Many of us took the fact that Secretary Rumsfeld is no longer defense secretary as a first step, a signal that they were open to new ideas. And we'd like very much to work with the President and try to get some kind of change of course in Iraq."

Iraq Debate Expected To Spark Dissension In Democratic Camp. Newsweek (11/20, Darman, 3.12M) reports, "The most difficult debate facing the Democrats will be over Iraq. After six years of decrying their lack of oversight on military policy, party leaders now have co-ownership of the Iraq account. Many Democrats say the party should focus its energy on pressing the White House for a change of course in current policy, rather than dredging up old debates over the manner in which the administration took the country to war. But Carl Levin, the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, says he also intends to demand access to some 58 internal Defense Department memos dealing with prewar Iraq intelligence and military planning. These memos involve the Pentagon's Office of Special Plans and the Counter-Terrorism Policy Evaluation Group, two secretive units that have been accused of cooking the books on Saddam's weapons of mass destruction and alleged ties to Al Qaeda."

U.S. News and World Report (11/20, Brush, 2.03M) reports, "The new crop of Democrats is a pretty varied lot-Iraq veterans, antiwar candidates, social conservatives, gun-control foes, fiscal hawks. … Indeed, the election of majority leader-a contest likely to pit John Murtha, the Pennsylvania Vietnam vet who called for troop redeployments, against current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, who's more cautious on Iraq-is already exposing the deep tensions within the party."

U.S. News and World Report's Gloria Borger (11/20) writes, "This election wasn't really about the Democrats. It was about the other guys-and how they couldn't run Washington or manage the war. There was no Democratic agenda beyond their 'Had Enough?' bumper sticker. Did it work? Yep. But did it produce a mandate? Nope-at least not beyond the marching orders to clean up Washington, fix Iraq, and get something done. It's a huge opportunity for the Democrats. If they're smart, they'll find a way to grab it-and fast. Immigration reform and the minimum wage top the list. Then, of course, there's finding a way out of Iraq. That's what the voters want."

DOJ_NMG_0092882

Pelosi Calls US Troops In Iraq "A Magnet For Terrorists." In an interview with Time (11/20, Bacon, 4.03M) House minority leader Nancy Pelosi was asked if she would like to see "at least 30,000 troops…home from Iraq by this time next year," Pelosi responded, "Yes. I would hope at least that number would be out of harm's way. They are viewed as an occupation force. Our presence there is a magnet for terrorists."

Lieberman A "Wild Card" On Iraq In Senate. The Washington Post (11/13, A4, Murray, 690K) writes that along with the election of "war critics" like Sherrod Brown, Bernard Sanders, and James Webb to the Senate last week, voters "also gave a fourth term to Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, a staunch supporter of the war, and in the narrowly divided Senate that will convene in January, the veteran Connecticut Democrat is positioning himself to become a key figure in discussions" about US Iraq policy. And "both sides are seeking to please this political wild card."

White House Readies For "Busy Week" On Iraq Policy. The CBS Evening News (11/12, lead story, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) led with the White House's preparations for "a busy week, one that could set in motion a change of policy in Iraq. The President meets this week with a group of advisors charged with re-examining US involvement there." And it is "back to the future for the President with friends of his father, front and center." CBS (Chen) added, "He is politically bruised and heading into the lame duck years of his term, but the President's team says don't count him out just yet." White House Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten: "As of today, we have 800 days left in this Administration, which is a long time." Chen: On Monday morning, "Bush meets with the Iraq Study Group, aiming to take on the single issue that cost his party most of the polls. As he tries to salvage his own legacy, Mr. Bush is turning to help from some old hands, wise men from his father's Administration. … The crew is full of familiar faces from the first Bush Administration: James Baker, former Secretary of State; longtime confidante and former Wyoming Sen. Allen Simpson; and Lawrence Eagleberger, also a key player for 'Bush 41.' He steps in for Robert Gates, the former President's CIA Director. Gates was tapped last week to take over the Pentagon in a post-election concession that the current approach to Iraq isn't working." The report also mentioned the Newsweek poll pegging the President's at "just 31%, that is a new low. But if it is any consolation to him, it is still two points higher than his father's lowest point."

McCain Reiterates His Call For Additional US Troops In Iraq. Sen. John McCain, on NBC's Meet the Press (11/12, Russert), said, "I believe that a withdrawal, or a date for withdrawal, will lead to chaos in the region, and most military experts think the same thing. I believe that there are a lot of things that we can do to salvage this, but they all require the presence of additional troops. Now, if you want to give up on Iraq, then fine, and take the consequences. I think there will be chaos in the region. But we need to control this insurgency, we need to embed people with the police and the military, we need to clear and hold -- and hold is the important part -- so we can expand areas of security." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, also on NBC's Meet the Press (11/12, Russert), said, "I wouldn't send more troops just for the sake of sending more troops. But I would if it is tied to a success strategy."

Kristol, Kagan Say Bush Should Send More Troops. In a Financial Times (11/13, Kagan, Kristol) op-ed, William Kristol and Robert Kagan of the Weekly Standard write, "Instead of looking for a face-saving way to lose in Iraq," Bush "could finally demand of his top advisers a strategy to succeed: provide the US force levels necessary to achieve even minimal political objectives. This could begin by increasing US troops in Iraq by at least 50,000 in order to clear and hold Baghdad without shifting troops from other parts of Iraq. These operations could then be expanded into areas of insurgency. This strategy would not stabilise the country right away but could secure Iraq's vital centre and provide real hope for progress."

Harvard Scholar Says "Iraq Is Gone." In a Washington Post (11/13, A21, 690K) op-ed, Monica Duffy Toft of Harvard's Kennedy School of Government writes under the headline "Iraq Is Gone. Now What?" that Iraq "is rapidly disintegrating, and there is no longer anything that can stop the disintegration, save perhaps an invasion by Israel, Iran or Syria." The US "is now faced with an awful choice: leave and allow events to run their course or lend its dwindling support to one or more of the emerging states. … It is high time" the US and its allies "began national discussions about the relative merits of leaving or staying and, if they stay, about the merits of supporting the Sunnis, Shiites or Kurds. Either way, what we now think of as Iraq is almost certainly as gone as what we once thought of as Yugoslavia, and for the same reasons."

White House Downplays Honors For Bush Iraq Advisers. The Washington Post (11/13, A19, Williamson, 690K) reports that on Wednesday, "on the hung-over morning after midterm voters told President Bush what they thought of the Iraq war, a White House news release arrived in our inbox, with the cryptic subject line 'PERSONNEL ANNOUNCEMENT.' Hidden therein was a list of this year's National Medal of Arts and National Humanities Medal winners, to be honored the next day by the president and first lady Laura Bush in the Oval Office. No invite, no number to call for information, just a list." The Post adds, "Why so little fanfare? Could it have been because the humanities honorees included Middle East scholars-turned-Bush advisers Fouad Ajami and Bernard Lewis, whose views helped get us into Iraq in the first place? On the day of the prestigious ceremony, the White House Web site featured -- nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0092883

Iraqi Prime Minister Announces Government Shake-Up. Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki Sunday announced that he was planning a major shake-up of his cabinet. The New York Times (11/13, Semple, 1.16M) says the move is aimed at "redress[ing] his six-month-old government's failure to curb widespread corruption, reduce sectarian violence and improve public services." Speaking to a closed session of Parliament, Maliki "suggested that some of his ministers were incompetent but said he had been forced to accept his cabinet under pressure from the country's major political blocs." During the session, Maliki "did not disclose which ministers he planned to replace. But legislators close to the prime minister said he did not intend to change the political distribution of the cabinet seats," which is mostly Shiite. The Times notes that the Maliki administration "has been facing mounting criticism from American officials and some Iraqi leaders impatient with the prime minister's inability -- or unwillingness -- to disarm militias, particularly those linked to the most powerful Shiite parties that form the basis of his ruling political alliance."

The Financial Times (11/13, Negus) reports that the declaration is "part of an apparent push to revive an initiative to bring the country's quarrelling sectarian blocs into a national pact, after the government was accused by both Sunni and Shia of failing to protect them." According to the Times, "Criticisms have focused on the vital interior and defence ministries, which control the security forces," and warns that "in choosing new ministers, Mr. Maliki will face the challenge of winning approval from parties that have seen little interest in reaching compromises, and instead appear to have sought control over government agencies to give them an edge in the country's sectarian conflict."

In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/13, A1, Raghavan, 690K) calls the shake-up "the latest blow to US and Iraqi efforts to strengthen the country's fledgling security forces." According to Hasan Suneid, a lawmaker and close aide of the prime minister's, Maliki "told lawmakers in the closed session that he had been forced to accept ministers chosen by political blocs and that some were incompetent" and "asked the blocs to nominate new people for his cabinet, based more on their qualifications than on their political loyalties."

The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Zavis, 850K) reports Maliki "scolded lawmakers at a closed Parliament session Sunday for putting sectarian concerns over national interests," and later "told journalist he has authorized the use of 'extreme force' against private militias blamed for surging bloodshed between Iraq's dominant Muslim sects that has claimed more lives lately than the anti-U.S. insurgency." USA Today (11/13, 2.27M), Los Angeles Times (11/13, Zavis, 850K) and Washington Times/AP (11/13, Hurst) also report the story.

Sadr Seen As Losing Hold On His Base. The New York Times (11/13, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports on the "taming" of Moktada al-Sadr, and says "the more settled he becomes in the establishment, the looser his grip is over his fighters on the streets and those increasingly infiltrating the security forces. In the two years since they fought against American tanks at Mr. Sadr's command, many have broken away from the confines of compromise that bind him, and have taken a far more active role in killing, something his supporters say worries him. He says he is trying to weed them out -- 40 were publicly dismissed last month." The Times adds, "The increasing violence of some of his followers mirrors the overall unraveling of Iraq, which has become less centrally controlled and far more criminal since the American invasion in 2003."

USA Today (11/13, Jervis, 2.27M), under the headline "Cleric Al-Sadr May Hold Iraq's Future In His Hands," says Sadr "has emerged as one of the most powerful forces in Iraq, commanding a large militia and a growing political organization. … As President Bush and the Democrats in charge of a new Congress plot a new direction in Iraq, al-Sadr remains a huge obstacle unless the Iraqi government does what it has been unwilling or unable to do so far: neutralize him through political negotiations or a military confrontation."

Iraqi Government Scheduling Mass Executions. Time (11/20, Bennett, 4.03M) reports, "Since September 2005, when three men were hanged in the southwestern city of Kut after being convicted of running a murder-and-kidnapping ring, the Iraqi government has executed 50 prisoners convicted of murder or kidnapping, says spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh. An adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki says the government plans to execute 'two or three more batches of 14 or 15 each' in the coming months."

Three US Soldiers Killed As Violence Claims 159 Lives In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 2, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The US military announced today three American soldiers died yesterday in fighting in Iraq's Anbar Province. Four British troops were killed and three seriously injured today in an attack on a patrol boat in Basra. A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a police recruiting center in Baghdad killing at least 35 people. And the Iraqi police and military reported finding at least 75 dead bodies today in Baghdad and Baqubah.

DOJ_NMG_0092884

Officials say around 1600 bodies were taken to Baghdad's morgues in October." The AP (11/13, Hurst) reports "raging sectarian violence…claimed at least 159 more lives, including 35 men blown apart while waiting to join Iraq's police force." The Washington Post (11/13, A1, Raghavan, 690K) also reports the story.

Fifty-Five Journalists Have Been Killed This Year. The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Peterson, 59K) reports, "The label 'independent' media in Iraq has become a death sentence, in what has become the world's most dangerous environment for local journalists. Already this year 55 Iraqi journalists have been killed -- more than any other year -- and four remain hostages. … A growing number of incidents in recent months have demonstrated the insurgency and militia's power to target and intimidate. There have been a string of media murders against print, radio, and TV journalists."

Stopping "Brutal Fanatic" Abu Deraa A Top US Priority. The Washington Times (11/13, Freeman, 88K) reports, "Less than six months after an American air strike ended Abu Musab Zarqawi's campaign of Sunni terrorism, an equally brutal fanatic has emerged on the Shi'ite side of the religious divide." Abu Deraa's "trademark method of killing is a drill through the skull rather than a sword to the neck, but his work rate is just as prolific as the former al Qaeda in Iraq leader's and shows the same diabolical artistry. In the past year, he and his followers are thought to have killed thousands of Sunnis, their victims' bodies symbolically dumped in road craters left by al Qaeda car bombs." The Times adds, "Stopping monsters such as Abu Deraa -- whose nom de guerre means 'the shield' -- is a top US priority as it tries to halt sectarian violence, which regularly claims 100 lives a day." But "the Shi'ite-dominated government has shown a marked reluctance to sanction the kind of large-scale operation necessary to arrest him in his stronghold of Sadr City, a vast Shi'ite slum in eastern Baghdad."

Bolten Says Partitioning Iraq Not A Good Idea. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "Most of the experts that I have heard from, and certainly almost all of the Iraqis that have been heard from, think that some sort of partition is a bad idea. Now, federalism is a notion that has always been in mind in constructing a modern, democratic and multi-ethnic Iraq. So somewhere on that continuum there is the right solution. Partition does not seem to be the right solution."

Dalai Lama Urges That Saddam's Life Be Spared. AFP (11/12) reports, "Tibet's exiled spiritual leader the Dalai Lama has appealed for Saddam Hussein's life to be spared, saying the deposed Iraqi president was not beyond redemption. 'The death penalty is said to fulfill a preventive function, yet it is clearly a form of revenge,' the Nobel peace laureate told reporters as he ended a two-week visit to Japan."

Afghan Insurgents Launching Over 600 Attacks Per Month. The AP (11/13, Straziuso) reports, "Insurgent activity in Afghanistan has risen fourfold this year, and militants now launch more than 600 attacks a month, a rising wave of violence that has resulted in 3,700 deaths in 2006, a bleak new report released Sunday found. … The new report said insurgents were launching more than 600 attacks a month as of the end of September, up from 300 a month at the end of March this year. The violence has killed more than 3,700 people this year, it said."

Afghan Army Struggling. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Zucchino, 850K) reports in a critical, 2,751-word front page story about frustrating efforts by the US and NATO to train the Afghan army: "Many of [its] soldiers fought for or against the Russians, against the Taliban or for various warlords — except those so young they had never picked up a rifle. From this unwieldy mix, the U.S. military and the Afghan government are attempting to create something Afghanistan has never had: a national army that is made up of all the country's ethnic groups and represents a unified central government. ... Instilling loyalty to the national government will require changing the nature of Afghanistan. The army is a place to start." However, "Afghan privates and generals alike complain that they are sent into battle in ordinary Ford Ranger pickups with no body armor or helmets ... U.S. trainers, while praising Afghans for their courage, complain of lax discipline, petty thefts and poor maintenance of weapons and equipment. The Afghans will often run up hills or charge into caves wearing virtually no armor and without waiting for backup."

Pakistani PM Says Military Action Alone Not Enough To Defeat Terrorists. The Washington Times (11/13, Pisik, 88K) reports, "Pakistan, a key ally in the war on terror, welcomes an expected reappraisal of U.S. policy in Iran and Afghanistan, and thinks military action alone is "not the answer" to the threat posed by extremists in the two countries, its prime minister says." Shaukat Aziz told the Washington Times that "he would like to see a more nuanced approach to battling extremism, which includes massive investment and economic assistance to the two countries in order to build a sense of well-being for the poor and disenfranchised." In New York for meetings at the United Nations, Aziz also "said the world needs to focus more seriously on Afghanistan's narcotics trade, which is becoming an increasingly important source of terrorist financing. By some estimates, the trade accounts for half of Afghanistan's gross domestic product."

DOJ_NMG_0092885

Asked on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer) about the possibility of the US use of "drone Predator aircraft to fire missiles inside Pakistani territory against high-value terrorist targets," Aziz said, "We've always said that we are very capable of tackling such activities ourselves. Our armed forces are well-equipped. We do not allow any country to violate our sovereignty. We are committed to fighting terrorism, but it has to be fought together." Also on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer) Aziz addressed the theories about Osama Bin Laden's whereabouts. He said, "The truth is, nobody knows where he is. Because if anybody knew where he is, they would go after him. … And frankly, because of the situation in Afghanistan, it is not always possible to know who is where. We have no clue where he is. If he were ever in our territory and we found out, we would go after him."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

KB Home CEO Resigns Amid Options Probe. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A3, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "The stock-options fraud scandal claimed one of the nation's most successful and highly paid chief executives, KB Home's Bruce Karatz, who agreed to leave the company after an internal investigation found that he backdated his own option grants to increase his pay." The Journal continues, "KB Home, a home-construction company once known as Kaufman & Broad, said Mr. Karatz would immediately leave his posts as president, CEO and chairman. He will forfeit about $13 million in gains from the backdating as part of an agreement with the company, based in Los Angeles. … Also departing is Richard B. Hirst, executive vice president and chief legal officer, and Gary A. Ray, the head of human resources. Mr. Hirst resigned, and Mr. Ray was terminated, the company said. A person familiar with the investigation said both Mr. Karatz and Mr. Hirst cooperated with the internal investigation." The Journal adds, "Mr. Karatz is one of the highest-profile casualties of the stock-options scandal, which has now claimed the jobs of more than 50 executives and directors, including William McGuire, the chief executive of UnitedHealth Group Inc. More than 130 companies, including KB Home, are under federal investigation in a wide government action. Five former executives at the companies have been charged with criminal wrongdoing. … KB Home didn't detail how the backdated options came to pass, though it said Mr. Karatz and Mr. Ray selected the dates for the options. A person familiar with the matter said that an investigation by KB Home's board determined that the dates were selected retroactively by the two men without permission of the board, though this person said the investigation didn't conclude that there had been intentional wrongdoing. The company said the misdated options were granted between 1998 and 2005."

Convicted Officials Forced To Sell Assets. USA Today (11/13, Farrell) reports, "When CEOs sell their multimillion-dollar homes, it's usually because they're relocating to a different market, or trading up to an even bigger house. .. In the case of Walter Forbes, the former Cendant chairman whose baronial 8-acre estate in New Canaan, Conn., is on the market for $12.5 million, the reasons are a little different." USA continues, "Forbes, 63, was convicted two weeks ago of conspiracy and making false statements in connection with a massive fraud that cost Cendant investors $14 billion when it was exposed in 1998. Unless his conviction is overturned on appeal, he'll be relocating, all right, but most likely to a property surrounded by thick walls and concertina wire. … As such, Forbes is poised to join the pantheon of convicted former executives who've had to sell their trophy properties or luxury toys to pay off legal bills, settle civil lawsuits or meet criminal forfeiture requirements mandated by judges."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Probes Focus On Halliburton's Role In Nigerian Bribery. The Houston Chronicle (11/13) reports, "There are new signs of life in a sprawling four-year investigation of whether a unit of Houston's Halliburton Co. and other oil-services companies paid huge bribes in the 1990s to land a $5.6 billion construction project in the Nigerian delta." The Chronicle continues, "French and Swiss investigators are trying to gain access to specific bank records in Switzerland and other European countries to determine if tens of millions of dollars in suspected bribe money ended up in accounts linked to Nigeria's former military dictator. … In Britain, police and agents from the Serious Fraud Office this summer searched four homes and a business looking for links to the case, which began in 2002 when a French oil-services executive facing corruption charges told a judge about a $175 million "slush fund" he claimed had been used to bribe Nigerian officials." The Chronicle adds, "The U.S. Department of Justice is looking into possible criminal offenses, and the Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating possible financial misdeeds. The Nigerian government is also conducting a formal investigation."

Witness Against DC Murder Inc. Gang Gains Freedom. The Washington Times (11/13, Mcelhatton) reports, "A former high-ranking member of the Murder Inc. crime syndicate in the District, which was charged in 31 killings, has won a 'very unusual' sentence that will keep him out of prison, newly unsealed court records show." The Times continues, "Maurice Andrews, 36, former confidant of D.C. drug kingpin Kevin Gray, faced 30 years to life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines after pleading guilty to racketeering charges related to several murders. … However, in what prosecutors call a 'very unusual' request, the U.S. Attorney's Office recently sought a sentence of time served and probation. Authorities cited Andrews' role as a key government witness in the prosecution of the violent street gang. … 'He testified in dozens, literally dozens of criminal incidents that he was aware of, ranging from individual drug deals to murder,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew G. Olsen said at Andrews' Sept. 29 sentencing." The Times notes, "U.S. District Court Judge Royce C. Lamberth sentenced Andrews, who has been in the federal witness-protection program for five years, to time served and five years' probation, according to a transcript of the hearing. … The proceedings had remained sealed until last week. … Federal authorities have called Murder Inc. the most violent gang in the District's history. It ran much of the city's crack cocaine and heroin trade during the 1990s and killed potential government witnesses, authorities said. … Several leaders of the gang -- including Gray, convicted of 19 murders, and Rodney Moore, convicted of 10 murders -- are serving sentences of life in prison without parole. A jury deadlocked on giving them the death penalty."

DOJ_NMG_0092886

ID Thieves Often Close To Family. The New York Times (11/13, Leland) reports, "In the five years since his divorce, Eric Wagenhauser had moved on with his life. He had remarried and was sharing custody of the three children from his first marriage. Then, last year, Mr. Wagenhauser discovered a new wrinkle on American divorce: his former wife had used the children's Social Security numbers to apply for nine credit cards in their names. She obtained two." The Times continues, "Mr. Wagenhauser's ordeal over the next year, which involved police departments in two Texas counties, banks, credit bureaus and the Social Security Administration, is familiar to many identity theft victims — the crime often begins at home. … Though most victims never learn who stole their identities, half of those who do say the thief was a family member, a friend, a neighbor or an in-home employee, according to surveys by the Federal Trade Commission and Javelin Strategy and Research, a private research firm. The surveys estimate that 9 million to 10 million Americans have their identities stolen each year." The Times adds, "Mr. Wagenhauser's former wife, Ivy Ash, began applying for credit cards in the children's names soon after the divorce. She ran up about $200 in unpaid bills, he said, which grew to about $1,000 with late fees and interest penalties. She pleaded guilty to two counts of fraudulent use of a credit card this year and is now in a Texas prison. … But the effect of the thefts is still being felt in the Wagenhauser household." The Times notes, "Identity theft involving family members takes many forms, said Betsy Broder, assistant director of the Federal Trade Commission's division of privacy and identity protection. A child steals a parent's identity to buy drugs, one sibling steals another's identity to try to avoid arrest or debt. … Identity theft is often difficult to solve and prosecute, and, in the case of families, victims may be reluctant to report relatives to the police."

Maritime Officials Crack Down On Modern-Day Pirates. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Glionna) reports from Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, "Noel Choong was working late the night he got the distress call: Just off the Malaysian coast in the darkness, a Japanese tugboat and barge were being attacked by a dozen pirates armed with AK-47s and rocket launchers." The Times continues, "The 154-man crew aboard the barge Kuroshio was frantic. As the vessel churned slowly northward through choppy waters of the Strait of Malacca, headed for Myanmar, it had suddenly been surrounded by three fishing boats. .. .The armed men stormed the little tug. Shots were fired. The captain and two others were taken hostage. The desperate barge crew plotted a rescue mission to free their shipmates, who were being held with guns to their heads." The Times adds, "Choong is a pirate catcher, a maritime crisis negotiator who handles the high-anxiety drama of modern-day pirate attacks in real time. He's also a detective, a high-seas sleuth with a host of shadowy shipping industry informants he uses to run down hijacked ships. … In the outlaw Strait of Malacca, whose waters are considered the most pirated in the world, his services as director of the International Maritime Bureau's Piracy Reporting Center are in near-constant demand. … The 550-mile-long channel, flanked by Singapore and Malaysia to the east and the Indonesian island of Sumatra to the west, is one of the world's most strategic international waterways and its busiest shipping lane. Each year, 60,000 vessels, the equivalent of nearly half the world's entire merchant fleet, negotiate the funnel-shaped shortcut between the Pacific and Indian oceans. They range from mammoth supertankers as large as city skyscrapers to tugs and barges. … Such seaborne commercial traffic attracts a sophisticated brand of piracy that has moved far beyond the scabbards and cutlasses of the 17th century."

Report: Sighting Of Fugitive Mobster Discredited. The Boston Globe (11/10, Abel) reports authorities in California "have investigated and discredited the latest reported sighting of fugitive Boston mobster James 'Whitey' Bulger. Bulger, 77, one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted fugitives, fled a month before his 1995 federal racketeering indictment and was later revealed to be a longtime FBI informant and charged with the murder of 19 people. … Darrell Foxworth, an FBI agent in San Diego, said he had received reports from police about the alleged sighting, but he also determined they were not legitimate."

DOJ_NMG_0092887

Bulger Reportedly Sighted At Theater. The Boston Herald (11/10) reports sources "said an off-duty police officer spied…Bulger - or at least someone matching his description - leaving a downtown theater after watching the film, which stars Jack Nicholson as a dead ringer for the South Boston crime lord. … The incident is the latest possible sighting of the crime boss who vanished in 1995 as an organized crime strike force made up of state police, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Internal Revenue Service closed in. A longtime snitch, Bulger fled the night before he was indicted for 19 gruesome mob murders, thanks to a tip from his boyhood pal and longtime FBI handler John Connolly."

Police Believe Maryland FedEx Shooting Was Random. The Washington Post (11/13, B01, Bahrampour) reports, "For Marlyn Evans, the American dream was working out well. … She had emigrated from Guyana 19 years ago to give her children, Reina and Colin, a better life. After raising them and a younger daughter, Chantal, in a townhouse in Silver Spring, she moved to a spacious two-story brick house in Bowie. In August, Reina moved in, with her own two children, to save money to pursue her dream of becoming a nurse, like her mother." The Post continues, "That dream ended Saturday when Reina Natasha Lynch, 26, was found dead of a gunshot wound at the FedEx Ground distribution center in Beltsville, where she worked as a security guard. A colleague discovered her body at 7 a.m. in the booth at the entrance to the fenced compound on Trolley Lane. … Prince George's County police said yesterday that they had not found a motive. 'We believe this was a random event,' said Cpl. Stephen Pacheco. Investigators are looking for clues in Lynch's car and in security camera footage, he said."

Many DC Homicides Sparked By Petty Disputes. The Washington Times (11/13, Cella) reports, "The motive for most homicides in the District are arguments and petty disputes over perceived slights, accounting for more killings last year than robberies, domestic disputes, gang activity and drug wars combined, according to the Metropolitan Police Department. … 'It's a pretty big deal among some people,' said Chief Charles H. Ramsey. 'A guy gets upset -- you know, "You're disrespecting me." Or they don't like the way you're looking at them. You'd be surprised at how many silly homicides we see.'" The Times continues, "The police department last year attributed 57 of the city's 196 killings to arguments, compared with 50 such killings among the city's 198 in 2004, according to a recently released department report tracking homicide information from 2001 to 2005. … During those five years, 1,126 persons were killed in the District, 901 of them fatally shot. The report also states that about 1,058 of the homicide victims were black, about 36 were Hispanic and about 32 were white." The Times notes, "Arguments have accounted for a steady increase in the percentage of overall killings in the city since 2001, when they were the primary motive in 19 percent of the 232 homicides. .. Chief Ramsey said that guns are a big part of the problem. … 'The guns make them feel like they're more powerful,' he said. 'They overreact.' … As recently as 2002, drugs were the primary motive in more than one-third of the city's 262 killings. As a percentage of total homicides, that figure has declined each year, accounting for just 10 percent, or 19 killings, last year."

Virginia State Police Opt For Fewer Coded Messages. The Washington Post (11/13, A01, Sheridan) reports, "Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, local governments have spent millions on high-tech radios to improve communication among police forces. Now, Virginia is taking the next step: changing the very way cops talk." The Post continues, "Starting this month, Virginia State Police have banned the '10 codes' used by generations of officers to flag everything from murders to bathroom breaks. Gone is the language of '10-4' and 'What's your 10-20 [location]?' … The codes are as much a part of police culture as badges and coffee. But over time, individual police departments have adapted the codes in their own ways, creating confusion when they have to work together -- such as on Sept. 11." The Post adds, "Eager to avoid such mix-ups, Virginia's government has become one of the first in the nation to try to eliminate traditional cop talk. For months, officials in Richmond have worked with police and firefighters to come up with a substitute for 10 codes, finally deciding on a statewide 'common language protocol. … In other words, English." The Post notes, "The switch reflects why it is so challenging for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security to create a national emergency response system. If someone sets off a dirty bomb at the Pentagon, Arlington County police might be on the radio with officers arriving from Fairfax County, Alexandria, the District or Maryland."

CIVIL LAW:

WPost Says "Partial Birth" Law Before High Court Identical To Previous Case. The Washington Post (11/13, A20, 690K) says in an editorial, "It isn't every day that the Supreme Court confronts a law materially identical to one it has already struck down. But that is what the justices faced last week when they heard oral arguments over the federal ban on partial-birth abortions. Six years ago, the court struck down state partial-birth laws -- ruling that Nebraska's ban was overly broad and lacked an exception for situations in which protecting a woman's health required the use of the disfavored procedure. In response, Congress enacted its own version of the ban, complete with nearly all of the faults from which the Nebraska statute had suffered." The Post adds the "only way to uphold this law would be to overturn the prior decision -- a step that the justices should not take, in the interest of women's health and out of respect for precedent." The "real question this case presents is whether the court, with Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired, will continue to honor its precedent."

DOJ_NMG_0092888

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Television Show About Sexual Predators Raises Rights Issues. The National Law Journal (11/13, Baldas) reports, "The NBC television series 'To Catch a Predator,' which features confrontations with men allegedly seeking sex with minors online, may be popular with viewers, but not with criminal defense attorneys, who claim the show raises a range of civil rights issues." The Journal continues, "Seating an unbiased jury when a client's face has been splashed all over national television is nearly impossible, they argue. Miranda rights and search-and-seizure issues are also compromised by the show, they add." The Journal adds, "In the last two years, 183 alleged online sexual predators have been formally charged as a result of being caught on the show, which has run sting operations in California, Florida, Georgia, New York and Ohio with the help of an online predator-watchdog group. More than 20 of those cases have resulted in guilty pleas or convictions, with the remaining cases still pending. … 'Without question, it tramples on their constitutional rights to due process and a fair trial,' said Blair Berk of Tarlow & Berk in Los Angeles, who is representing a doctor featured on the show that aired on Oct. 6. The man allegedly showed up at a house hoping for a date with who he thought was a 13-year-old girl he met online. People v. Wolin, No. SCR 495892 (Sonoma Co., Calif., Super. Ct.). … Berk likened the show's tactics to 'trying someone in town square without giving them due process. …"

WSJournal Criticizes Wal-Mart, Costco Gender Discrimination Lawsuits. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "We'll soon find out if that humongous gender discrimination class-action lawsuit pending against Wal-Mart is an aberration -- or the legal wave of the future. And rest assured the trial bar is hoping for the latter with dreams of riches. Last week, a U.S. District Court in San Francisco heard arguments on whether a gender discrimination lawsuit against Costco should also proceed as a nationwide class action. A decision is expected in a few weeks, and the proceedings have an air of deja vu." The "same San Francisco District Court (though not the same judge) heard the Wal-Mart case, which was initiated by the same plaintiffs' lawyer, Brad Seligman. Mr. Seligman is seeking punitive damages, back pay and injunctive relief in both cases, and he is also pushing the same legal theory as to why the claims should be pooled into a class rather than handled individually. He even has some of the same 'expert' witnesses." If "mere statistical imbalances can trigger a class action, companies will be forced to make pay decisions based on statistics rather than performance and merit. Ultimately, that leads to racial and gender quotas, all in an effort to avoid frivolous lawsuits."

ANTITRUST:

Private Equity Fund Buyouts Come Under Scrutiny. The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Trumbull) reports, "The new birth of Burger King Corp. this year delivered the beef to the investing public: Under private management, the long-struggling company turned a corner and then made shares available on the New York Stock Exchange. … But the managers kept some major side orders to themselves. They took out a big loan and paid themselves a $367 million dividend and other fees as well. In all, they extracted cash worth about one-sixth of Burger King's market value." The Monitor continues, "That's one whopper of a payout, and it's not unusual these days. … Increasingly, investors with deep pockets are banding together to form 'private equity funds.' Just as the leveraged buyout firms did in the 1980s, they are buying up companies, restructuring them, and then selling them back on public stock exchanges - often for a supersized profit." The Monitor notes, "The practice isn't new, but it remains controversial. And the scale of the trend far exceeds what it was back when Henry Kravis and Michael Milken made their magazine cover debuts. … Hardly a week goes by without more major deals being announced. Meanwhile, the very success of these buyout funds is attracting billions more dollars from investors - raising the prospect of many more buyouts in coming months. In essence, the wealthy are deciding that if you want to make money in stocks, the stock market isn't the place to do it. … With money pouring in from pension funds and other deep pockets, the trend shows no signs of stopping. It could end up engulfing companies as diverse as the Los Angeles Times newspaper and ailing automotive supplier Delphi Corp. Just last week, Bill Gates and a Saudi prince were among the investors backing a private buyout of Four Seasons hotels, while another buyout fund announced its plan to acquire the Outback Steakhouse."

DOJ_NMG_0092889

ENVIRONMENT:

Snowe, Rockefeller Blast New Exxon CEO Over Global Warming. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" column (11/13, McCaslin) reports on "the sharply critical letter that Republican Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Democratic Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia sent recently to Rex W. Tillerson, otherwise welcoming him to his new post as chairman and chief executive officer of Exxon Mobil Corp. The remainder of the three-page letter, shall we say, blasted a so-called 'climate-change denial strategy carried out by and for Exxon Mobil' against global warming -- the senators accusing the oil giant of being 'the primary funder of no fewer than 29 climate-change denial front groups in 2004 alone.' The bipartisan pair went so far as to request that Mr. Tillerson 'publicly acknowledge both the reality of the climate change and the role of humans in causing or exacerbating it,' even absent scientific proof of such a cause."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Attorneys Challenge Arrest Of Accused Arellano Félix Cartel Leader. The San Diego Union-Tribune (11/11, Soto) reports U.S. agents "used satellite equipment to track and arrest the suspected leader of the Arellano Félix drug cartel in a boat off the coast of Baja California Sur this summer. Law enforcement officials hailed the arrest of Francisco Javier Arellano Félix, accused of running the drug cartel in recent years, as a key blow to the organization they say moved tons of drugs between Mexico and California. … Investigators, led by the Drug Enforcement Administration, have been investigating the Tijuana-based cartel for years." The Union-Tribune says lawyers are questioning the use of a GPS device to find Arellano Felix and that a defense lawyer now says the arrest took place in Mexico's waters and is illegal.

Man Pleads Guilty In Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Case. In Dover, Delaware, the AP (11/9) reports an accused drug dealer "suspected of distributing fentanyl-laced heroin that killed a Dover man will spend at least 20 years in prison after agreeing to plead guilty to a federal drug charge. A federal grand jury returned a six-count indictment in September against Joseph Bentley. On Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Wilmington, Bentley agreed to plead guilty to a single count of distribution of heroin and fentanyl resulting in the death of another individual." According to an affidavit by a DEA special agent, Bentley "told his father that a batch of heroin he had obtained had killed two of his customers."

Grand Jury In Rhode Island Indicts 7 In Drug-Trafficking Case. In Pawtucket, the Providence (RI) Journal (11/10, Pina) reports, "After a 10-month investigation, a federal grand jury has charged seven men with drug trafficking for allegedly selling crack cocaine out of the Prospect Heights housing project. … The investigation was conducted by city police and the Drug Enforcement Administration Task Force. Teams of federal agents and city officers arrested three men last week. One man was already in custody for his alleged role in robbing a delivery man at Prospect Heights."

DEA Agent Says "Pro-Pot" Advocates Relay Misinformation. In the Sacramento Bee (11/12), DEA agent Gordon D. Taylor writes, "Pro-pot advocates often spread misinformation on the subject of so-called 'medical marijuana.' It's important to show the other side of the issue. In the past 10 years, California has seen a surge of organized crime groups that have moved into the marijuana industry in a big way. Heavily armed drug cartels have made a multibillion-dollar business of going into our public lands and clear-cutting our pristine forests so they can cultivate enormous marijuana crops." Over the past two years, the DEA "has participated in six enforcement actions against pot clubs operating in the Central Valley and inland Northern California. Shockingly, three of the six pot store owners were convicted felons, each of whom was armed with a handgun during the course of the investigations."

Authorities Link Colombian Nationals To Jewelry Theft Ring. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (11/12) reports FBI agents and police "say they have broken a ring of crooks believed to have taken more than $1 million worth of goods from traveling jewelry salesmen in Missouri, Illinois and elsewhere since 2003. In a sworn statement made public in federal court in St. Louis this week, FBI Special Agent Mark Wood wrote that investigators had known for years that a group of Colombian nationals was responsible. … A motel employee tipped off investigators last month that some guests might be drug dealers. Drug Enforcement Administration agents followed the men, determined they were watching jewelry stores, and turned the matter over to the FBI and St. Louis County police." Five suspects "were arrested, and two have been charged so far."

Report Says Drug Trade Fuels Insurgency In Afghanistan. The AP (11/13, Straziuso) reports insurgent activity in Afghanistan "has risen fourfold this year, and militants now launch more than 600 attacks a month, a rising wave of violence that has resulted in 3,700 deaths in 2006, a bleak new report released Sunday found. … Afghanistan saw about 130 insurgent attacks a month last year, said the report by the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, a body of Afghan and international officials charged with overseeing the implementation of the Afghanistan Compact, a five-year reconstruction and development blueprint signed in February. … The report said that the rising drug trade in Afghanistan is fueling the insurgency in four volatile southern provinces. The slow pace of development is contributing to popular disaffection and ineffective implementation of the drug fight, it said."

DOJ_NMG_0092890

UN Official Says Sharing Intelligence Would Hit Drug Traffickers Hard. The AP (11/10) reports Iran and neighboring Pakistan and Afghanistan "must share intelligence on drug smuggling," according to the head of the United Nations agency against drugs. Antonio Maria Costa, the director of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, "finished a three-day visit to Iran by praising the government's efforts against drug trafficking, according to a statement issued by the agency. … But Costa warned the world's production of opium was far greater than what was being intercepted. … 'I urge these three countries, and their international partners, to establish an intelligence-sharing platform,' he added. 'If counter-narcotics police in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iran share intelligence, they could really hit the traffickers hard.'"

Lack Of Protection Said To Anger Afghans. The Washington Post (11/10) reports many Afghans "have expressed anger over the lack of government protection and services in rural provinces, a void that has helped fortify the Taliban and allowed for an upsurge in opium cultivation. There is also growing resentment against the presence of foreign military forces, and Taliban leaders have attracted support by calling for resistance."

IMMIGRATION:

Virginia Courthouse Behavior Unravels Vast Immigrant Marriage Scam. The Washington Post (11/13, A01, Markon) reports, "They didn't hug. They didn't kiss. They didn't even sit together. … Many couples going to the Arlington County Courthouse seemed more like strangers than people applying for marriage licenses. A man named Sam often escorted them to the sixth-floor clerk's office. Sometimes, there would be a furtive exchange of money in the elevator." The Post continues, "Before long, some of the same people would be back, filing for divorce, their court papers littered with mistakes -- always the same mistakes. … 'They misspelled "circuit,"' said David A. Bell, the longtime Circuit Court clerk. 'It was obvious something was going on.'" The Post notes, "Bell tipped off police, triggering a nearly four-year investigation that recently broke up one of the Washington region's biggest and most brazen immigration scams: an estimated 1,000 fake marriages. The scheme was centered in the area's little-noticed but rapidly growing community of immigrants from Ghana….. For immigrants, marrying a U.S. citizen is a quick ticket to citizenship. Along the East Coast and all the way to West Africa, at car dealerships, malls, parties and even a Home Depot, the word had spread: If you are in the United States illegally, go to Arlington. It's easy to get married in Virginia, because marriage laws are relatively lax. Arlington, with its proximity to the Metro system and the District, is especially convenient. … In recent weeks, 19 of 22 people charged so far in the undercover investigation have pleaded guilty in federal court in Alexandria, including bank tellers, car salesmen and health-care workers. Court testimony and interviews document how Ghanaian immigrants married U.S. citizens they had met the same day, then were coached on how to fool immigration inspectors, usually months later, into believing that the marriage was real. All they wanted, they said, was to stay in the United States. … Now, they will have to leave."

Democrats Take Cautious Stance On Immigration. The Washington Post (11/13, A3, Fears, Hsu, 690K) reports that in the "days after the election, Democratic leaders surprised pro-immigration groups by not including the issue on their list of immediate priorities. Experts said the issue is so complicated, so sensitive and so explosive that it could easily blow up in the Democrats' faces and give control of Congress back to Republicans in the next election two years from now. And a number of Democrats who took a hard line on illegal immigration were also elected to Congress."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush 41, Baker Thought To Have Engineered White House Shake-Up. Newsweek's Managing Editor Jon Meacham (11/20), in a cover story titled, "Can Bush Sr. and His Team Save Son's Presidency?," writes that "last Wednesday," former President Bush "listened as George W. Bush said the loss of Congress was a 'thumping,' promised to 'work with' a commission on Iraq chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, and announced that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was resigning. Within two hours the president was in the Oval Office with Rumsfeld and his replacement: Robert M. Gates, Bush Senior's CIA director and the president of Texas A&M University, the home of Bush 41's presidential library. … Dad's team was back -- a remarkable course correction in the political life of the son and, quite possibly, in the life of the nation." Meacham adds, "These are 41's men, and the removal of Rumsfeld -- an ancient rival of Bush Senior's from the Ford days -- is a move toward the broad middle. … Did 41 help bring Gates to the Pentagon? The White House denies it, but, as a Bush friend told NEWSWEEK, 'his fingerprints are all over this.'"

DOJ_NMG_0092891

Newsweek's Evan Thomas (11/20) says "it would be widely speculated that" Baker "helped arrange the firing of Rumsfeld and the appointment of Gates as part of a fundamental power shift, a last-ditch rescue operation -- by the old guard of Bush 41 to save Bush 43 from sinking ever deeper into the Iraq morass." Baker "has reason to want to downplay his role and the prospects for success. Over the next month or so, the Iraq Study Group must find a middle way, a plan of action that can be characterized neither as 'cut and run' nor 'stay the course.'"

U.S. News and World Report's Brian Duffy (11/20) writes, "One of Washington's more tedious parlor games has been the whispered wonderings about strains in the relationship between the younger Bush and his father. The return to center stage of one of the elder Bush's most trusted aides as Rumsfeld's replacement prompted a frenzied new round of psychobabble. Not only was Bob Gates the elder Bush's CIA director, but he also served as deputy to Brent Scowcroft, the older man's national security adviser and close friend. Scowcroft's break with the current White House over Iraq was offered as Exhibit A in the case for a rupture in the relationship between Bush père et fils. Hmm. If armchair psychology doesn't happen to be your thing, however, and you're one of the many millions of Americans whose vote seemed to express the belief that the Bush team has slipped its intellectual and political moorings, the casting of James Baker seemed to suggest a more simple if less charitable plotline: adult-supervision time!"

Time (11/20, Duffy, 4.03M) reports Gates' "task…is to preach change to a leader who has stuck to his line -- despite all kinds of evidence to the contrary -- for years now. … Dad's former aides will present the son with a plan for saving his presidency and, with it, some remnant of the family's brand name. None of those involved will call it an intervention, but it's fair to say the nation's future is at stake. Although Gates and Baker will be out front, others who worked for the patriarch are helping behind the scenes." Time adds, "It is tantalizing to imagine that Baker, who plans to issue his report next month, pushed Bush to dump Rumsfeld for Gates. A former Baker aide last week called the coincidence of timing 'painfully obvious.' … 'Baker wasn't going to let his report come out,' says a Gates aide, 'so that Rummy could stomp all over it.' As for Bush 41, he is staying above the nitty-gritty of the takeover, says one of 41's former aides, but 'he's definitely in the loop.'"

Gates Reportedly Criticized Administration's "Incompetence." Newsweek (11/20, Ephron, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports, "At sessions of the Iraq Study Group over the past months, Robert Gates was careful not to show his cards. But on the commission's long flight home from a fact-finding mission to Baghdad in September, after several drinks had been poured, the Republican panelist let loose on the Bush team. 'He said they really screwed up Iraq and, to a large extent, he couldn't figure out why it happened,' a source close to Gates who was on the plane told NEWSWEEK. Particularly foolish, Gates thought, were the decisions to occupy Iraq with a relatively small force and to purge the Iraqi civil service of Baath Party members. 'He couldn't believe there was such a degree of incompetence,' said the source, who did not want to be named because panelists were trying to keep their discussions out of the media."

U.S. News and World Report (11/20, Mulrine, Whitelaw, 2.03M) reports, "The nomination of" Gates "is a clear signal that the White House is trying to shake off its history of 'stay the course' rhetoric. But while Bush's motivation might have more to do with politics than with military strategy, Gates could make a real difference. A member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group…Gates could be a critical bridge between the White House and the clutch of foreign-policy graybeards many Republicans and Democrats are looking to as a lifeline -- a last-gasp chance to reverse the downward trend in Iraq."

U.S. News and World Report's Kenneth T. Walsh (11/20) writes, "The choice of Gates allows the commander in chief to at least create the perception that he is looking for a fresh start in Iraq. … As a private citizen, Gates has criticized the administration for failing to use diplomacy aggressively enough to extract the United States from Iraq. And Gates has a track record of success."

Rumsfeld Allegedly "Humiliated" Rice. Newsweek (11/20, Barry, Hirsh, 3.12M) reports Rumsfeld "will likely go down as an erratic and arrogant manager who sullied America's reputation by allowing interrogation abuses at Abu Ghraib and other U.S.-run detention centers abroad; who haughtily dismissed advice from U.S. generals and senators alike to put in enough troops (in part because he didn't want another Vietnam), and who preferred to deny the reality of the Iraqi insurgency rather than confront it. … He offended allies, played down the State Department's role in planning for postwar Iraq and actively stymied Condoleezza Rice's efforts to do her first-term job as national-security adviser, which was to coordinate between agencies, according to numerous accounts. Sometimes he didn't even return her calls. 'Rumsfeld treated Condi like the hired help,' says a White House staffer who would discuss the relationship only if he was not identified. 'He did everything he could to humiliate her. And the president never intervened.'"

Adelman And Perle Accused Of Lacking "Contrition." In an essay for Time (11/20, 4.03M) Michael Kinsley writes, "Kenneth Adelman and Richard Perle said 'oops' earlier this month. … Both played a role in pushing the U.S. into war in Iraq--Adelman in an influential Washington Post Op-Ed promising that the war would be 'a cakewalk' and Perle warning of catastrophe if we left Saddam Hussein and his weapons unmolested. Now, interviewed in Vanity Fair, they say it all may have been a mistake. Oops! Yet in Vanity Fair's quotes, there is no note of contrition. … What is the proper way to act when you have made a boo-boo on the scale of what Perle and Adelman now admit to? A brief period of silence might be in order, followed by a bit of ideological spring cleaning."

DOJ_NMG_0092892

Iraq Study Group Encouraged To Pursue Regional Stability. Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria (11/20) writes, "Press accounts of its deliberations suggest that the much-anticipated Baker-Hamilton report will make some intelligent recommendations. The committee will point out that America's strategy in Iraq must be placed in a broader regional context. For three years, America's Iraq policy has largely ignored the rest of the Middle East. That was no accident. The neoconservative vision was always that Iraq would be made anew, shorn of the flaws and ailments of the Arab world. … This absence of a regional strategy left Iraq open to its neighbors' most irresponsible instincts. Iran and Syria have helped keep the violence there on the boil. Saudi groups and individuals have funded Sunni militants. None of the surrounding nations would benefit if Iraq actually did collapse, setting off territorial disputes, sending refugees into neighboring lands and exporting Iraq's instability. Such an outcome can still be avoided, but only with active support from these countries. The Baker-Hamilton commission can be expected to recommend a major regional effort."

Democrats Want To Deal With Gates Nomination During Lame-Duck. The Financial Times (11/13, Guha) reports "senior Democrats" are indicating that they hope to complete the confirmation process for Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates during the lame-duck session that opens today. Sen. Carl Levin, who voted against Gates' 1991 nomination to lead the CIA, "told ABC's This Week: 'I hope that his confirmation hearings can be held and that he will get a vote prior to the end of this Congress.' He reiterated his long-held reservations about the nominee but said: 'I'm going to have a fresh look at him.'" Sen. Joseph Biden, "who also voted against Mr Gates in 1991, said: 'I am inclined to vote for him now." The Wall Street Journal (11/13, C8, Spence, 2.04M) reports Gates would step down as a trustee at Fidelity Investments if confirmed.

Media reports this morning also suggest Gates will follow Rumsfeld's lead on terrorism and the military's transformation. The Washington Times (11/13, Scarborough, 88K) says current and former Pentagon officials say Gates "is not expected to rein in the aggressive global war on al Qaeda" started by Donald Rumsfeld or "reverse the transformation of the Army" Rumsfeld launched, but "instead focus on how to win in Iraq and get American troops home." One Pentagon adviser said, "He definitely is not seen as someone wimping out on the global war. How he does it, and what tools, and who he entrusts with them, that's a whole different issue." The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Collins, 59K) says "not all experts believe the transformation has been helpful in the war on terror, and the sustainability of many of his reforms may ultimately depend on the ability of people to rise above intense negative feelings about him and see beyond his failings in the Iraq war."

Former Defense Secretary William Cohen said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "Any time you bring someone new, that that individual is going have a different relationship with the President, with Capitol Hill…not to mention with the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the commanders on the field. So, a different person brings a different viewpoint and a different dynamic with all of those groups. It's not enough to change the person. If the policy's going to remain the same, then in the final analysis, that won't make much difference. But I think in the beginning, a lot will change in terms of the relationships."

Bush 41 Said To Have Had "No Foreknowledge" Of Gates' Appointment. Brit Hume, on Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace), said, "The conventional wisdom in Washington, the buzz in Washington, is that 'Bush 41' and his gang are back in town. A couple of facts: Neither Baker nor 'Bush 41' were consulted ahead of time about the Gates appointment. President Bush the first got a phone call the morning of the Gates appointment giving him a heads up that it was about to happen. … The striking thing about the relationship between the first President Bush and the second is that for all the devotion between them, they don't discuss politics and political issues very much."

Bolten Said Bush Had Not Decided About Rumsfeld At Time Of Comment. Bolten also had to deal with questions about the President's pre-election comment that he expected Rumsfeld to stay on through the end of the Administration. On CNN's Late Edition (11/12), Wolf Blitzer asked Bolten, "When is it okay for the President to mislead the American public?" Bolten: "Yes -- he wasn't. He had not made a decision at that point. At the time that that interview was held, the President hadn't even met Bob Gates. Now he started his conversations with Secretary Rumsfeld about possibly getting fresh eyes on the problem. But the President…wasn't going to be comfortable making a change at the critical role of secretary of defense until he was sure he had somebody very strong to put in place." On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Bolten said much the same thing, saying that before the election, Bush "was talking about it and he was preparing to meet with Bob Gates, but he had never met Bob Gates." If Gates "had turned out to be the wrong guy, based on the conversation that the President was going to have with him, I do not expect that the President would have replaced Secretary Rumsfeld."

DOJ_NMG_0092893

White House Facing GOP Ire Over Timing Of Rumsfeld Exit. The AP (11/12, Heilprin) reports the White House "is trying to soothe Republicans who say the party might have fared better on Election Day if President Bush had not waited" to dismiss Rumsfeld. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten said, "You could argue that either way, of what political effect an earlier decision on Secretary Rumsfeld would have had. But it doesn't matter. The president correctly decided that this decision does not belong in the political realm." And Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett, during an appearance on Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace), said Bush "was not going to inject the leadership of our military during a time of war into the final weeks or throes of a presidential or a midterm congressional campaign. It would send the wrong signal."

But on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), Sen. Arlen Specter was not satisfied, saying Bush "should have done it as soon as he had made up his mind. And that's a hard thing to calculate. But it's highly doubtful that he made up his mind between the time the election returns came in on Tuesday and Wednesday when Rumsfeld was out. And if Rumsfeld had been out, you bet it would have made a difference. I'd still be chairman of the Judiciary Committee."

AEI's Rubin Sees Inconsistency In Progressives' Views Of "Realists." In a Wall Street Journal (11/13, A16, 2.04M) Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute writes, "What a difference a war makes. Today, progressives and liberals celebrate not only Mr. Rumsfeld's departure, but the resurrection of realists" like Gates and ex-Secretary of State James Baker. Today, "progressivism places personal vendetta above principle. Mr. Rumsfeld is bad, Mr. Baker is good, and consistency irrelevant."

Democrats, Bush Seen As Likely To Cooperate On Few Issues. Time (11/20, Thornburgh, 4.03M) reports, "Despite all the cordial luncheons and admissions that both sides love America, the President and the newly elected Democratic Congress aren't likely to find common ground on hot-button issues like stem-cell research and no-warrant wiretaps. Here's our pick of policies on which the two might actually do business." Time lists, the minimum wage, education, alternative energy and immigration as potential subjects for compromise. Time (11/20, Tumulty, 4.03M) reports, "now that the high fives and jubilant photo ops are behind them, Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid have to run the place. Whether anything is actually accomplished on Capitol Hill over the next two years will depend largely on the skills these two leaders develop in maneuvering through the tricky challenges ahead."

U.S. News and World Report's Michael Barone (11/20) writes, "One can foresee areas of agreement. Bush will concede a fig-leaved minimum wage. On immigration, House Democrats and a solid Senate majority favor the Bush approach blocked by House Republicans. Advancing alternative fuels is another possibility. Some Democrats want tax-free savings vehicles for lower-paid workers; that sounds a lot like the individual investment accounts Bush proposed for Social Security. On some issues there will be no agreement-tax reform, probably. But big issues have been addressed in the past by divided governments. In the process, Bush is decoupling himself from the Republican Party. House Republicans, with little chance to affect outcomes, will be mostly ignored as House Democrats were under Clinton."

Democrats Regarded As Unlikely To Enact Major Healthcare Reform. U.S. News and World Report's Josh Fischman (11/20) writes, "Crisis is a word being used more and more often to describe the U.S. healthcare system. … Lawmakers are unlikely to wake up and enact major overhauls during the next two years. Big fixes will remain stuck in ideological gridlock, though small changes-such as allowing Americans to buy drugs from abroad or expanding state insurance coverage for low-income children-are possible, say a broad spectrum of policy analysts and congressional strategists. But larger reforms, such as incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's proposal to let Medicare negotiate prices directly with drug companies, are likely to hit a wall in the Senate, where Republicans are still strong enough to hold up legislation and have genuine antipathy to expanding government programs."

Pelosi's Daughter Describes Bush's Cordial Treatment Of Her Mother. In an essay for Time (11/20, 4.03M) Alexandra Pelosi, Pelosi's daughter and creator of the documentary, "Journeys with George" about President Bush's 2000 campaign, writes, "When my parents came to have lunch with me at an Oakland airport hotel where Bush was giving a speech in March 2000, he did what he did when any member of the traveling press corps was in his or her hometown: he summoned us to his room so he could meet the parents. … The next time I saw them together, George was in the White House, and he told me, 'You ought to be proud of your mom.' At the time she was fighting her heart out on the House floor against the Iraq war. On any occasion that I have seen them together in private, they have appeared to be the best of 'frenemies' -- campaign-trail speak for politicians who keep their friends close and their enemies closer."

Full Agenda Planned For Lame-Duck, But Progress May Be Limited. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, Simon, Havemann, 850K) reports, "The ousted Republican-led Congress returns to the Capitol this week to try one last time to shorten a long legislative to-do list, while the just-elected members will vote for new leaders in races that could signal the direction the parties will take next year. The lame-duck session mixes a dispirited Republican Party and a Democratic Party that knows it will soon have the upper hand in both houses -- a potentially combustible cocktail." At a minimum, Congress "must pass a temporary spending bill to keep the government running until the next Congress takes office. Getting much else accomplished could be difficult." Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution said, "Democrats won't allow anything to pass they don't like, and Republicans have little interest in starting the Democratic reign early. It could be a very short lame-duck session."

DOJ_NMG_0092894

But while progress may be hard, the New York Times (11/13, A21, Hulse, 1.16M) says in a headline that an "extensive to-do list is awaiting action." Republicans "have compiled an ambitious to-do list, hoping to dispose of energy legislation, a trade deal or two, a civilian nuclear treaty with India and other favored bills," while Democrats "have some measures they want completed as well, most notably the spending bills, to save them the added work next year." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/13, Shepard, 379K) says Bush "has urged Republicans to complete work on the spending bills to prevent the Democrats from changing his spending priorities for various agencies before the next budget cycle in 2007." The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A4, Lueck, Rogers, 2.04M) says Republican leaders "faced a mountain of work unfinished when members left town to campaign."

House GOP May Be Pressed To Accept Senate Drilling Bill. The AP (11/12, Hebert) reports, "The Democrats' return to power is increasing pressure on House Republican leaders to accept" the Senate's "limited expansion of offshore oil and gas drilling. Supporters of such exploration say the next Congress, with Democrats in control come January, probably will not tamper with the long-standing drilling bans that have protected most coastal waters for a quarter-century."

In an editorial, the New York Times (11/13, 1.16M) opposes President Bush's call for the outgoing Congress to pass legislation to authorize increased offshore drilling for oil and natural gas, calling the House bill "a broad, mischievous and badly conceived piece of work," and warning that a conference committee could "produce a bad bill much along the lines of the House measure."

WPost Offers Its Own To-Do List For Lame-Duck Session. The Washington Post (11/13, A20, 690K) editorializes that Congress should focus on "passing the 11 remaining spending bills for the 2007 fiscal year. … Another pressing task should be to give the District of Columbia full voting rights in the House." The Post also says "confirmation hearings and, if possible, a vote" on Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates "would avoid delaying Mr. Gates's start in that important job. Congress should also approve normalization of trade relations with Vietnam in advance of the president's trip there this week and extend an expiring trade deal that provides benefits to key South American countries." The Post also lists the India nuclear deal and the restoration of the Iraq reconstruction IG on its list.

Bolton Not Expected To Win Confirmation. Newsweek (11/20, 3.12M) reports that the White House has asked the Senate to confirm US Ambassador to the UN Bolton "permanently during a forthcoming lame-duck session. But Joe Biden, the Senate Democrats' incoming Foreign Relations chair, signaled that the Dems will continue to block Bolton -- unless the administration turns over a set of ultrasecret National Security Agency intercepts that Bolton requested. Bolton said he needed to find out the names of Americans mentioned in them; Bolton's critics want to be sure he wasn't spying on subordinates." Sen. Lincoln Chafee "also signaled his continuing opposition to Bolton, virtually guaranteeing the nomination will die in this Congress. To date, the administration has refused to give Dems the documents they want. … Speculation is already circulating that he could be replaced by Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador in Baghdad, or Paula Dobriansky, an under secretary of State."

The Washington Post (11/13, A13, Heilprin, 690K) reports President Bush "will not relent in his defense" of UN Ambassador John Bolton despite "unwavering opposition from Democrats who view Bolton as too combative for international diplomacy, aides said yesterday." White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten defended Bolton on both ABC and CNN yesterday, saying on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "He's done a terrific job there. He's been the opposite of what many of his critics expected him to be. And that is, he has been a good consensus builder. He has helped lead the UN Security Council to good resolutions on Lebanon, on North Korea, a variety of other issues. So he's actually been a very effective UN ambassador, and I think the country's well-served to have him where he is." On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Bolten made a similar case, saying, "We're putting him up for confirmation. I think if he actually was able to get a vote in the full Senate, he would succeed."

But Democratic senators were no less assertive in arguing against the nomination. On ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), Sen. Joseph Biden said, "There's a lot of competent people. Send someone new up, Mr. President. Look, I'm not stopping Bolton. He doesn't even have the votes in the committee. He doesn't even have the votes of a Republican-controlled committee today. We're going to have a hearing on him. There is going to be a vote on him. He's going to lose."

Sen. Charles Schumer said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer) that Bolton is "for me…something of a mixed bag. On the one hand, I fully support his full support of Israel. … On the other hand, Bolton's philosophy has been very unilateral – 'The US can do it all, to heck with the rest of the world, to heck the rest of the nations.' And in this new world, where we have to fight a war on terrorism, a global war on terrorism, we can't fight it alone."

DOJ_NMG_0092895

WSJournal Sees A Way Around Senate To Keep Bolton. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "So let's see. Democrats retake the Senate, and their first act of 'bipartisanship' is to declare that they'll deny a confirmation vote" for Bolton. And now, "say the arbiters of Washington manners, President Bush is supposed to show his willingness to compromise by withdrawing Mr. Bolton's nomination. If Mr. Bush obliges, he'll be taking a big step toward turning last week's GOP defeat into a rout. … Having had one recess appointment, Mr. Bolton can't get another one and be paid. But he could retain his position and be paid if Mr. Bush names him to a non-confirmable post at State and then assigns him to the U.N. Ambassador's duties. Now, that's a compromise."

Automakers To Press Bush On Health Care, Weak Yen. USA Today (11/13, 2B, Hyde, 2.27M) runs Sunday's Detroit Free Press story that says that "when the heads of Detroit's automakers finally meet with President Bush at the White House Tuesday, they will press for more recognition of their issues, from the rising cost of retiree health care to the advantages a weak yen gives the Japanese." They "also will attempt to draw distinctions between themselves and foreign automakers whose U.S. branches generate record profits." The article says, "All sides expect no firm commitments from the scheduled 45-minute session, which will include Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council."

Study Says Renewable Fuels Could Provide 25% Of US Energy By 2025. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A10, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "A new Rand Corp. study showing the falling costs of ethanol, wind power and other forms of renewable energy predicts such sources could furnish as much as 25% of the U.S.'s conventional energy by 2025 at little or no additional expense." Another study "soon to be released by the National Academy of Sciences suggests wood chips may become a plentiful source of ethanol and electricity for industrial nations... ." The Journal says, "Because use of renewable fuels to replace oil and cut emissions of carbon dioxide is an area on which Congress's coming Democratic leadership and the Bush administration agree, the studies are likely to hasten efforts to increase production incentives next year, either in a new energy bill or a farm bill."

Bolten Says Bush Would Conditionally Support Minimum Wage Hike. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten said on CNN's Late Edition (11/12, Blitzer), "The President's always said that he would support a minimum wage that didn't end up pricing a lot of people at the lower end of the income scale out of the market, that is, costing them jobs. So, we've always been ready to do that. And we're ready work with Democrats on that issue."

Dean Cautions Democrats To "Be Careful" Regarding Tax Cuts. DNC Chairman Howard Dean, on Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace), said, "both Speaker- to-be Pelosi and Majority Leader Harry Reid have said is that we won't raise taxes on the middle class. … In fact, many Democrats would like to give the middle class a tax cut. I think we have to be careful of that because I think, frankly, the budget deficit has been understated by about $100 billion."

Krugman Says Democrats Won On Economic Populism. In his New York Times column (11/13), Paul Krugman says Sen. George Allen "was only one of many faux populists defeated by real populists last Tuesday. Ever since movement conservatives took over, the Republican Party has pushed for policies that benefit a small minority of wealthy Americans at the expense of the great majority of voters. To hide this reality, conservatives have relied on wagging the dog and wedge issues, but they've also relied on a brilliant marketing campaign that portrays Democrats as elitists and Republicans as representatives of the average American." As "Robin Toner and Kate Zernike of The New York Times pointed out yesterday, what actually characterizes the new wave of Democrats is a 'strong streak of economic populism.'" Krugman says Sen. Joseph Lieberman "won only through denial and deception," and last week's "populist wave, among other things, vindicates the populist direction that Al Gore took in the closing months of the 2000 campaign. But will this wave be reflected in the actual direction of the Democratic Party? Not necessarily. Quite a few sitting Democrats have shown themselves nearly as willing as Republicans to bow to corporate interests." The "first big test of the new Democratic populism will come over reform of the 2003 prescription drug law. Democrats have pledged to repeal the clause in that law preventing Medicare from negotiating lower drug prices. But the fine print of how they do that is crucial."

Rubin Think Tank Seen As Source Of Democratic Economic Proposals. In his Washington Post column (11/13, A21), Sebastian Mallaby says, "During their long years in the wilderness, Democrats lashed out against trade and globalization, even though denying the economic case for trade is like pretending that tax cuts pay for themselves. Now that they have won Congress, the Democrats must prove that they are more than the mirror image of their opponents. This means reviving the pro-market centrism of the Clinton era -- a spirit that lives on in the form of the Hamilton Project," the "brainchild of Robert Rubin, Treasury secretary under Bill Clinton." Rubin's "great virtue was to be as free of ideology as is possible in politics and to recruit a team of clever pragmatists to work for him." With Peter Orszag, "a laser-brained economist at the Brookings Institution," Rubin "persuaded a number of fellow Democratic grandees to finance a center for Rubinomics in exile; and Orszag served as policy director, commissioning a series of creative pragmatists to grapple with the nation's economic challenges." Nearly "all the Hamilton proposals have three things in common. They would reduce the inequality that Democrats emphasized on the campaign trail. They would not bust the budget. And they would promote economic growth. If the political system can't make use of ideas that tick all these boxes, there is something desperately wrong with it."

DOJ_NMG_0092896

Pelosi Will Push To Require Identification Of Earmark Sponsors. USA Today (11/13, Eisler, Kiely, 2.27M) reports on its front page that Democrats "aim to open the next Congress in January with a new rule that identifies lawmakers who use legislative 'earmarks' to help special interests -- a change Republicans promised but didn't implement." Likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi said her "first agenda item after being elected House speaker will be a vote to require sponsors of earmarks to be identified." However, the Los Angeles Times (11/13, Levey, Simon, 850K) says that "for years," Pelosi "has celebrated bringing home the bacon to her district." She "has not been linked to any impropriety. And not all the federal funding Pelosi boasts about came from earmarks. But the presumed new House speaker has proved a champion practitioner of the earmarking process over the years."

Reid May Have Benefited From Earmarks. Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (11/13, Neubauer, Hamburger, 850K) also reports that while Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid also "vows to make reform of congressional earmarks a priority of his tenure," 2005's "huge $286-billion federal transportation bill included a little-noticed slice of pork pushed by Reid that provided benefits not only for the casino town of Laughlin, Nev., but also, possibly, for the senator himself." Reid "called funding for construction of a bridge over the Colorado River, among other projects, 'incredibly good news for Nevada,'" but did not mention that "just across the river in Arizona, he owns 160 acres of land several miles from proposed bridge sites and that the bridge could add value to his real estate investment. Reid denies any personal financial interest in his efforts."

Stark Says Democrats Need To Move Quickly To Revamp Medicare Drug Plan. In a USA Today op-ed (11/13), Rep. Pete Stark says, "Democrats won both houses of Congress last Tuesday because Americans supported our pledge to change direction on several major issues, including the Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit. There is no reason to wait." Stark adds, "I believe we must start work immediately to improve this incomprehensibly complicated plan, which overpays and deregulates private plans to the detriment of the beneficiaries and taxpayers. The same Republicans who certified its cost as $400 billion over 10 years, knowing the true figure was north of $550 billion, generated some of the polls showing satisfaction with Part D. Yes, premiums are lower than expected, not from market competition, but from massive Medicare subsidies to the insurance industry. With less than 3% overhead, universal coverage and lower prices, a Medicare-run plan could offer true competition."

Bartlett Says Bush Remains Opposed To Medicare Drug Purchase Negotiations. On Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace) Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, was asked if the president is "willing to allow Medicare to negotiate lower drug prices," Bartlett responded, "We had this debate during the prescription drug debate when the Medicare reforms went in place two years ago. And the interesting thing about it is we now have some experience. And what happened was all the estimates saying that prices wouldn't come down were proven wrong. … The marketplace is working. … It's been benefiting America's seniors."

Democratic Plan For Medicare To Bargain With Drug Companies Criticized. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/13, A16), Alain Enthoven, professor emeritus at the Graduate School of Business at Stanford, and Kyna Fong, a doctoral student in economics, say, "Nancy Pelosi has promised that when the Democrats come into control of the House, they will repeal the ban preventing Medicare from negotiating directly with pharmaceutical companies, within the first 100 hours. She must expect that this legislation will bring down drug prices dramatically. In fact, it is not obvious that allowing the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies will lead to lower prices than those achieved by private drug plans. There are several good reasons that government negotiations may not decrease drug costs." First, "negotiations are a bargaining process. The relative balance of bargaining power determines at which price the deal is struck." When the government "negotiates, its hands are tied because there are few drugs it can exclude without facing political backlash from doctors and the Medicare population, a very influential group of voters." Secondly, "by acting as one large buyer, the government will cause price discounts to become more expensive for pharmaceutical companies. In other words, the minimum price that the pharmaceutical company is able to accept increases. All else equal, this will lead to higher, not lower, prices." Finally, "there is the familiar economic argument that the market-determined price is the only fair price. How can the government determine what price is 'fair,' what price appropriately reimburses pharmaceutical companies for all their research and development efforts?"

DOJ_NMG_0092897

Parties May Clash On Science, Technology Issues. The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Spotts, 59K) reports, "For clues to whether bipartisan cooperation in Washington will take root or disappear from the table as quickly as the china after last week's get-acquainted lunches at the White House, watch how some key science and technology issues play out. Ordinarily, broad science goals- - such as better science education or the American Competitiveness Initiative -- draw bipartisan support." But "there are some divisive science topics on the Democrats' early agenda -- namely embryonic stem-cell research -- and these highly charged science and environmental issues will be one barometer of the durability of cross-aisle cooperation." The "potential for fractiousness exists in a number of policy areas where the ideas of the new Democratic majority differ from those of Republican lawmakers or the Bush administration." Among them are "funding for research into alternative-energy sources, what to do about global warming, the future of the space program, and charges that the Bush team has muzzled federal scientists and ignored scientific results in crafting environmental and public-health regulations."

Bolten Sees GOP Losses As An Opportunity For Bush. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, on CBS's Face the Nation (11/12, Schieffer), said, "It's a big disappointment for us in the White House to have lost control of both Houses of Congress. But sometimes in adversity, there's opportunity, and hopefully we can take advantage of this opportunity and the bipartisan spirit that seems to prevail at least for the moment and get some good things done."

Bartlett Claims US Public Wants More Bipartisanship. Counselor to the President Dan Bartlett, during an appearance on Fox News Sunday (11/12, Wallace), dismissed the contention that President Bush is now a "lame duck." According to Bartlett, "There's a lot of time for this president and this Congress to work together to address the big issues our country face. And I think that's the real lesson from this election this past Tuesday, is that the American people want to see their political parties in Washington work together to achieve the great goals our country faces right now, whether it be in the war on terror, whether it be keeping the strong economy growing, whether it be addressing issues such as energy independence, issues such as education."

Pelosi Backs Murtha In Race For House Majority Leader. The AP (11/13, Espo) reports incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "stepped into a postelection power struggle among fellow Democrats on Sunday with a letter of support for Rep. Jack Murtha in the race to pick a majority leader." In the letter to Murtha, Pelosi wrote, "Your presence in the leadership of our party would add a knowledgeable and respected voice to our Democratic team." The AP adds Murtha is "widely viewed as an underdog in a two-man race with Maryland Rep. Steny Hoyer in this week's leadership elections."

The Washington Post (11/13, A1, Weisman, 690K) reports the "unexpected move signaled the sizable value Pelosi gives to personal loyalty and personality preferences. Hoyer competed with her in 2001 for the post of House minority whip, while Murtha managed her winning campaign. Pelosi has also all but decided she will not name the ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) to chair that panel next year, a decision pregnant with personal animus." Pelosi said "she was swayed by Murtha's early stance for a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq. Her letter of endorsement yesterday made clear that she sees Iraq as the central issue of the next Congress and that she believes a decorated Marine combat veteran at the helm of the House caucus would provide Democrats ammunition in their fight against congressional Republicans and President Bush on the issue." Another "potentially fractious vote in the House Democratic Caucus was settled late last week when Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the outgoing chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, decided against running for House majority whip. Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), the only African American in the House Democratic leadership, had already announced his candidacy."

Pence Praised As Candidate For House Minority Leader Post. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/13, A17), Stephen Moore of the Journal's editorial board says if Republican Rep. Mike Pence "wins his bid this Friday for House minority leader, he will become the second most influential conservative in Washington, behind President Bush." Congressional Republicans are "engaged in a desperate search for a new revolutionary, a Newt Gingrich figure to help them rediscover who they are and what they believe in." Pence "captained a conservative revolt that fell one vote short of killing the hugely expensive" Medicare prescription drug bill, and his "first spending vote in the House was against the No Child Left Behind education bill that the Bush White House still considers one of its crowning achievements. His reasoning: 'Why are we federalizing schools and education?'" Neither of "these incidents endeared Mr. Pence to Karl Rove or the Bush White House. But perhaps his principled stance is in need more than ever." Pence "believes that his party got trounced last week because of its embrace of what he derisively calls 'big government Republicanism.'"

DOJ_NMG_0092898

Novak Blasts GOP's Expected Reelection Of House Leaders. In a syndicated column appearing in today's Washington Post (11/13, 690K), Robert Novak writes, "The depleted House Republican caucus, a minority in the next Congress, convenes in the Capitol at 8 a.m. Friday on the brink of committing an act of supreme irrationality. The House members blame their leadership for their tasting the bitter dregs of defeat. Yet the consensus so far is that, in secret ballot, they will reelect some or all of those leaders. In private conversation, Republican members of Congress blame Majority Leader John Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt in no small part for their midterm election debacle." Yet "either Boehner, Blunt or both are expected to be returned to their leadership posts Friday. For good reason, the GOP often is called 'the stupid party.'"

Lieberman Declines To Rule Out Future Party Switch. Sen. Joseph Lieberman, on NBC's Meet the Press (11/12, Russert), said he will "caucus with the Democrats… because it's good for my constituents in Connecticut, because I retain my seniority." However, Lieberman added he has not "ruled out" switching parties, but "I hope I don't get to that point. And I must say, and with all respect to the Republicans who supported me in Connecticut, nobody ever said, 'We're doing this because we want you to switch over…and I appreciate that."

Senate Democrats Said To Have No Choice But To Govern From Center. The Christian Science Monitor (11/13, Chaddock, 59K) says that for Democrats, "the pledge to govern in a bipartisan way may not be postvictory rhetoric. At least in the Senate, it's a mandate of the math." The party will be "nine votes short of the 60 votes now needed to advance controversial bills," and "the terms of the Democrats' narrow victory make a politics of the center even more imperative. Most of the new Democrats in the Senate won by running as moderates or fiscal conservatives." Political analyst Rhodes Cook said, "They were carefully chosen not to reflect the liberal mainstream of the Democratic Party, but to reflect the more conservative mainstream of their states. It might be a return to the days when Democrats were technically a majority party, but when you put Republicans together with southern Democrats, they were the majority."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (11/13, Fagan, 88K) runs brief profiles of the 10 new incoming senators, who "include a novelist and former Navy secretary, three soon-to-be former House members, a state treasurer and an organic farmer."

McConnell Unopposed For Senate Minority Leader. The AP (11/13, Zuckerbrod) reports while Sen. Mitch McConnell "regrets Democrats' control of Congress denies him the chance to become the next Senate majority leader, he sees the GOP carving out a significant, albeit slightly different role." McConnell, who is "running unopposed to be Senate Republican leader," said, "We'll be able block or shape legislation. My preference of course is to accomplish things." The AP adds that when the new Senate "convenes in January, Democrats will control 51 seats to Republicans' 49. The close split means Republicans still will have significant power, because it often takes 60 votes to pass legislation." McConnell said, "Forty-nine is a pretty robust minority. I've been there when we were at 42." The AP adds Republican senators "are to pick their leaders on Nov. 15. Utah Republican Sen. Robert Bennett said McConnell has been methodically planning for the top job, fending off potential challenges along the way."

Most FEHBP Enrollees Will Not See Premiums Increase. The Washington Post (11/13, D4, Barr, 690K) "Federal Diary" column reports, "For the next four weeks, federal employees and retirees will select their health insurance coverage for 2007. Many will escape the sticker shock of past years," with officials saying 63% of enrollees in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program "will see no increase in their premiums next year."

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Focus On Appropriations Oversight. The New York Times (11/13, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "There have been many examples of the shambles that the Republican-controlled Congress made of its responsibility for oversight of the Bush administration. But none was so peremptory as the mass firing of 60 House appropriations investigators last month — virtually the entire hired staff responsible for tracking spending abuses in such money pits as the Iraq war, intelligence operations and the $62 billion Hurricane Katrina relief effort." The "result is that, until the Democrats assume committee control in January, there's an investigatory vacuum on such matters as soldiers' body armor in Iraq and levee and dam spending along the Gulf Coast." Democratic Rep. David Obey "takes the committee gavel in January, and among his tasks will be restocking the investigation staff and setting the committee back on a productive, bipartisan course. This should not be a matter of party vengeance, as some Republicans fear. Rather, it's a necessity of the course set by the voters to end one-party rule and find out what the government is actually up to."

NYTimes Says Democrats, GOP Must Address Trade Deficit. The New York Times (11/13, 1.16M) reports, "With the deficit reaching new highs and Democrats now able to wield real power, it is crucial that each side back off its constituent-pleasing myths" about the trade deficit. The Bush Administration "needs to tell the truth about the vulnerability that comes with large deficits. Thus far, the United States has had no problem attracting money from abroad to plug the gaps. But there is no guarantee that will continue indefinitely. If foreigners chose to invest elsewhere — like the strengthening economies of Europe or Japan — the result would be higher interest rates and higher prices in America, perhaps sharply higher." The Democrats "need to take a more pragmatic view of the lopsided trade situation. The surest way to make American businesses more competitive — and workers more secure — is to resolve the nation's health care mess."

DOJ_NMG_0092899

OTHER NEWS:

Rove's Pre-Election Optimism Scrutinized. Newsweek (11/20, Wolffe, 3.12M) reports Karl Rove's "miscalculations began well before election night. The polls and pundits pointed to a Democratic sweep, but Rove dismissed them all. … He believed his 'metrics' were far superior to plain old polls. Two weeks before the elections, Rove showed NEWSWEEK his magic numbers: a series of graphs and bar charts that tallied early voting and voter outreach. Both were running far higher than in 2004. In fact, Rove thought the polls were obsolete because they relied on home telephones in an age of do-not-call lists and cell phones. Based on his models, he forecast a loss of 12 to 14 seats in the House -- enough to hang on to the majority." Newsweek goes on to report, "Ten days before the elections, House Majority Leader John Boehner visited Bush in the Oval Office with bad news. He told Bush that the party would lose Tom DeLay's old seat in Texas, where Bush was set to campaign. Bush brushed him off, Boehner recalls. 'Get me Karl,' the president told an aide. 'Karl has the numbers.' … Rove blames complacent candidates for much of the GOP's defeat. He says even some scandal-tainted members won when they followed what he calls 'the program' of voter contacts and early voting."

Time (11/20, Allen, 4.03M) reports Rove "now downplays his forecast. 'My job is not to be a prognosticator,' he told TIME in an interview in his West Wing office. 'I told the President, "I don't know where this is going to end up. But I see our way clear to Republican control." My job is not to go out there and wring my hands and say, "We're going to lose."' Rove chalks up the loss to corruption, incumbent overconfidence and conservative dissatisfaction with spending. He does not read the outcome as exclusively a judgment on either Iraq or Bush. 'Iraq mattered,' Rove says. 'But it was more frustration than it was an explicit call for withdrawal.'"

Bush Gave RNC $12 Million From Campaign Funds. Time (11/20, Allen, 4.03M) reports, "To keep the Republican National Committee from having to take out a loan, according to Republican officials, Bush chipped in $12 million of his campaign funds that otherwise would have gone to his presidential library."

GOP's Loss Of Congress Attributed To Bush's Iraq Policy. In his column for Newsweek (11/20, 3.12M) George Will writes, "More than any congressional elections in history, last week's turned on a single burning national issue. Control of Congress has changed because of deep discontent about Iraq. But Congress can, realistically, have little control over what we make of the mess we have made."

Time's Joe Klein (11/20) writes, "Not only did the Democrats lay a robust whupping on the Republicans in the midterm elections, but--far worse--the President was forced into a tacit acknowledgment that the defining policy of his Administration, the war in Iraq, was failing."

U.S. News and World Report's Mortimer Zuckerman (11/20) writes, "nothing hurt the Republicans more than the mess in Iraq. The possibility of success there was allowed to slip away through a fatal combination of arrogance and incompetence. Iraq, with its tortured history, was never going to be easy, but after 3 ½ years, with dozens of our troops dying each month and the nightly images of utter chaos on the evening news, is it any wonder voters are fed up?"

Democrats Expected To Capitalize On Gains In The West. Newsweek's Howard Fineman (11/20) writes, "The land west of the Mississippi, especially west of the 100th meridian, is the new swing region—and the place where Democrats hope to win the White House. 'It's our 21st-century-majority strategy,' said Simon Rosenberg of the New Democratic Network. … The Northeast turned a deeper blue. GOP moderates there are all but extinct; Democratic governors were elected by vast margins. The Republicans' Fortress South…cracked at the perimeter but largely held. The 'intermountain' West, meanwhile, was up for grabs. Democrats won the governorship in Colorado (and now have won five of the region's eight statehouses since 2002). The GOP hung onto the governorship in Nevada and a key Senate seat in Arizona."

Dean Claims Radio Ads Swung Evangelical Vote. U.S. News and World Report's "Washington Whispers" column (11/20, Bedard) reports, "One of the big surprises for the Democrats in the elections was winning up to 33 percent of the white Christian evangelical vote. And here's how they did it: Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean says he simply bought every advertising minute available on Christian radio, effectively blocking out the GOP. Ads touted Democratic values. The real secret: 'We had the weatherman doing the ads. Why? Because he's a local person who could be trusted.'"

DOJ_NMG_0092900

Gingrich Blames DeLay For GOP's Defeat. Newsweek's Evan Thomas (11/20) writes, "Did the GOP revolutionaries, like so many revolutionaries before them, have to become the very thing they had once vowed to change?" Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "blames his successors for taking the low road to disaster. … He specifically blames former majority leader Tom DeLay, who effectively replaced Gingrich as the GOP leader in the House from 1999 through 2005. In Gingrich's judgment, DeLay, as well as other Republican leaders, threw away the power of ideas in their narrow focus on self-preservation."

GOP Coalition Described As "Shattered." Newsweek's Jonathan Alter (11/20) writes, "The election marked the exhaustion of the movement that Barry Goldwater launched with his 1964 campaign. The intellectual vitality and coherence that once characterized modern conservatism have been shattered. Karl Rove is still arguing that the hot issues of this election—Iraq, corruption, sexual hypocrisy -- are only 'transitory.' He's ignoring deep fissures in his party. Neocons have been discredited and theocons dispirited."

President Seen As Unaware Of Public's Perception Of The Economy. Newsweek's Jane Bryant Quinn (11/20) writes, "Talk about being in denial. President Bush thought that voters should credit him for a great economy, even if they opposed the war. Just look at the numbers: low unemployment, low inflation, record profits, taxes down, stocks up. But in exit polls, half the voters called the economy 'not good' or 'poor.' Only 31 percent said they were 'getting ahead' financially. Someone's not in the loop. Is it the public or the prez?"

Steele Expresses Interest In RNC Post. The AP (11/13, Witte) reports Maryland Republican Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, "who lost his race for a Senate seat, expressed interest Sunday in becoming chairman of the Republican National Committee." On C-SPAN, Steele said, "I have not had any conversations directly with the White House yet on this." The AP adds current RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman is "stepping down when his two-year term ends in January. Mehlman made a point of emphasizing outreach to black voters and helped recruit Steele for the Maryland race." Steele, who "lost to Democratic Rep. Benjamin Cardin by a margin of 55 percent to 44 percent of the vote, said he believed it was time for the GOP to rethink its views in wake of losing both chambers of Congress in last week's midterm elections, which he described as a 'tsunami.' Steele said the electorate 'was very clear.'" Steele said, "They expected the administration and the party to step up and speak to particular issues and, failing that, there would be heck to pay — and we paid."

Democratic Georgia Incumbents Buck Countervailing Trend To Survive. The New York Times (11/13, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "Politically speaking, Georgia proved to be a mirror image of the rest of the country in the midterm elections. Republicans swept nearly every statewide office, and turnout among Democrats was low, thanks to a lackluster candidate for governor." But "two Democratic congressmen in highly competitive races in the state seem to have successfully fought those odds, though they are hanging on by the slenderest of margins and are still waiting for their opponents to concede." Democrats "Jim Marshall of Macon, in the Eighth Congressional District, and John Barrow of Savannah, in the 12th District, were on the Republican Party's short list of beatable incumbents. Their adjoining districts, which encompass large rural areas, were redrawn by a Republican legislature, their opponents were former congressmen, and the National Republican Congressional Committee poured hundreds of thousands of dollars into the races. President Bush campaigned in each district twice."

Tester Described As "Your Grandfather's Democrat." In a largely favorable profile, the New York Times (11/13, Egan, 1.16M) reports, "When he joins the United States Senate in January, big Jon Tester -- who is just under 300 pounds in his boots -- will most likely be the only person in the world's most exclusive club who knows how to butcher a cow or grease a combine. All his life, Mr. Tester, 50, has lived no more than two hours from his farm, an infinity of flat on the windswept expanse of north-central Montana, hard by the Rocky Boy's Indian Reservation." Tester "truly is your grandfather's Democrat -- a pro-gun, anti-big-business prairie pragmatist whose life is defined by the treeless patch of hard Montana dirt that has been in the family since 1916. … Friends say not to worry about Mr. Tester going native in Washington. He said he planned to return home to the farm several times a month. He promised his barber, Bill Graves, that he would continue to come back to get his hair cut in the same wheat-field bristle."

Debate Underway Over Whether Democratic Wins Amount To "Wave." The Washington Post (11/13, A19, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "There is no doubt that Democrats did well on Tuesday, capturing almost 30 seats in the House, six seats in the Senate and control of both chambers. But was it the Democratic 'wave' that so many had believed was about to sweep the country? Republican leaders said it was not. … By some measures, the Republicans are right. Since World War II, the party in the White House has tended to lose seats in Congress in the sixth year of an administration, and the average losses matched this year's -- 29 seats in the House and six in the Senate. When there was an unpopular war, the losses were greater." But "political scientists say that assessment of Tuesday's results ignores an important change in recent years. They say Republicans have re-engineered the political map, stuffing congressional districts with supporters to make the districts reliably pro-GOP. The financial and electoral advantages of incumbency, moreover, have reached new heights."

DOJ_NMG_0092901

The Washington Post (11/13, A8, Balz, 690K) reports, "Rarely has an election result been delivered with such force and clarity, and still left so many unanswered questions in its wake, as that of the 2006 midterm campaign. What happened is unmistakable. What it may portend is far less obvious, making the 2008 election, which already has begun, potentially the most important in a generation or more in shaping the nation's politics." Democrats "have been quick to claim that 2006 will be remembered as the end of a conservative era. … What the election was not, in the view of strategists in both parties, was a powerful affirmation of the Democratic Party, despite its takeover of the House and Senate. One post-election survey, conducted for the liberal groups Democracy Corps and the Campaign for America's Future, found that both Republicans and Democrats emerged from the contest with negative images." The Post adds, "Tuesday's election left American politics in a remarkably fluid state. In just six years, the political discussion has moved from analyzing the reasons for the nation's 50-50 divide, to predictions that the Republicans were close to establishing a durable majority, to questions about whether Tuesday marked a pendulum swing back toward the Democrats."

Media Role In Democratic Wins Critiqued. In a Washington Times op-ed (11/13), Douglas MacKinnon, a former press secretary to Sen. Bob Dole, says in addition to GOP "missteps" and "incredibly well-run Democratic campaigns," a third cause of the Democratic takeover of Congress is "that the remnants of objectivity in the mainstream media were all but exterminated by some on the left. A chilling and ominous development that played some role in the Democratic wave that is still splashing around the red states." There "can be no doubt that the left-of-center mainstream media helped to manufacture this election victory for the Democratic Party. For parts of the last two years, many in the media have worked in concert with the Democratic spin doctors to indoctrinate the American voter into believing this election had to be a referendum on President Bush and the 'failed' war in Iraq."

Democrats' Gains Said To Present Test Of Media's Objectivity. The Washington Post's Howard Kurtz, in his "Media Notes" column (11/13) writes, "Now the question is whether a press corps that has been openly at odds with the president will hold the newly empowered Democrats to the same tough standards. As with any new regime, Sen. Harry Reid and Rep. Nancy Pelosi are enjoying a media honeymoon for the moment -- especially Pelosi, because of her status as the first woman in line to become House speaker and her grandmother-of-five persona. That may not last long. But where will journalists set the performance bar? … The biggest change may be in store for liberal commentators, radio hosts and bloggers." Kurtz asks, "If Reid and Pelosi compromise with their more moderate colleagues, will hard-driving liberal bloggers turn on them?"

McCain Forms '08 Exploratory Committee. The AP (11/13, Yen) reports Sen. John McCain "said Sunday he is taking the initial steps for a White House bid in 2008, setting up a committee that allows a potential candidate to raise money and travel the country to gauge support." McCain "said he is moving toward a 2008 bid by 'doing things organizationally and legally' but will not make a final decision until early next year." During the 2006 election cycle, McCain "attended 346 events and raising more than $10.5 million on behalf of Republican candidates. He also donated nearly $1.5 million to federal, state and county parties."

The Washington Post (11/13, A8, Milbank, 690K) reports McCain, "appearing on NBC's 'Meet the Press' yesterday, said that while he won't make a decision until talking with his family over the holidays, 'Are we doing the things organizationally and legally that need to be done to prepare for it? Yes.' McCain indicated that the formation of an exploratory committee is imminent."

The Washington Times (11/13, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports McCain "sought to secure his conservative credentials during the appearance, saying he considers himself a conservative in the mold of President Reagan. He also said he thinks Republican losses last week will prove a temporary setback for his party." McCain said, "I believe America is still a conservative right-of-center nation, and our message, our Republican message, is best." The Times adds although McCain "is not the favorite prospective candidate of some grass-roots conservatives, some observers think his prospects for securing the Republican presidential nomination have improved since last Tuesday's elections."

McCain Blames Scandals And Spending For GOP's Defeats. Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (11/12, Russert) to describe what lessons he took away from Tuesday's elections Sen. John McCain said, "We Republicans have lost our way, that we came to Washington to change government, and government changed us. The spending, the ethics, the massive programs such as Medicare prescription drug program, our failure to address their priorities as opposed to our own, and there was obviously a reaction to it. The Iraq war obviously is very frustrating. … But I would submit, if they were all against the Iraq war that you probably would not have seen my friend Joe Lieberman…re-elected. So they're frustrated by the war, but I also believe that many of our spending, the scandals, the ongoing scandals, the large government programs. In other words, one of the pillars of the Republican Party is fiscal conservatives. They were alienated by the fact that we let spending lurch out of control."

DOJ_NMG_0092902

McCain's '08 Frontrunner Status Attributed To His "Frankness." U.S. News and World Report's Kenneth T. Walsh (11/20) writes Sen. John McCain "has made his reputation as a man who is outside the system, a guy who does things differently, who reaches across the aisle to the opposition, and people like that,' says a senior Republican strategist. 'People like his frankness. They know where he stands. And they think he would be a good guy to have a beer with.' And that, in a nutshell, is why McCain is the early leader for the Republican nomination in 2008."

Giuliani, Romney Rated As Top-Tier Candidates. U.S. News and World Report's Walsh (11/20) adds, "Two other men are generating buzz as they jockey for position as the main alternative to the front-runner. First on the list is former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who leads some public-opinion polls. … Perhaps the most aggressive behind-the-scenes campaign is being waged by outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a strong conservative with movie-star looks and big-time charisma. Romney is modeling his approach on George W. Bush's pattern from 1999, when Bush, then governor of Texas, invited party leaders to Austin for persuasive get-acquainted sessions. Romney is doing the same thing in Boston and is apparently making a good impression as a fresh-faced Washington outsider who radiates competence and optimism while advocating smaller government."

Biden To Announce Plans On Exploratory Committee Next Year. The AP (11/13, Yen) reports Democratic Sen. Joe Biden "reaffirmed his intention to seek his party's nomination, though an announcement about establishing an exploratory committee probably will not come until early next year." But the "anticipated wide-open campaign — for the first time since the 1928 race, the field will not include a sitting president or vice president — lost one possible participant when Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., decided against a long-shot run." Biden, who "is line to take over as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, also ran for president before, dropping from the 1988 race after it became known he had lifted a portion of a speech from a British politician without attribution."

Biden, asked on ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos) about his planned presidential candidacy and if he is going to set up an exploratory committee, said, "I'm going to address that after the first of the year. I still plan on running. I haven't, quite frankly, thought through all of the mechanics of it at this point in terms of when to announce setting up an exploratory committee, but I plan on doing that."

The Washington Times (11/13, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Biden "last made a run for the White House in 1988 and is considered by many to be one of his party's leading authorities on foreign-policy matters. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, is considered the front-runner for her party's nomination. However, a number of Democrats say they are open to an alternative to Mrs. Clinton because while many polls show her winning the Democrat's nomination, most of those same polls show her trailing against her potential Republican rivals in a general election." The Washington Post (11/13, A8, Milbank, 690K) says Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack "last week became the first to announce his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination."

Senatorial Experience May Not Serve Obama Well If He Seeks Presidency. The Washington Post (11/13, A19, Babington, 690K) reports Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) "might be well advised to stay in the Senate several more years before running for president, as many strategists have suggested. But there are at least 40 reasons to challenge that advice." That is "the number of senators who have tried, and failed, to reach the White House since Sen. John F. Kennedy (D-Mass.) accomplished the feat in 1960. Nearly all of them had more Senate experience than Obama, underscoring the light regard that American voters show for senatorial longevity and expertise in presidential elections." If Obama's "aim is to become a more respected and knowledgeable senator -- in the mold of, say, Robert J. Dole (18 years in the Senate before his 1996 presidential race), Henry 'Scoop' Jackson (20 Senate years before his 1972 bid) or Richard G. Lugar (20 Senate years before his 1996 try) -- it may be a laudable goal. But it's a highly questionable presidential strategy." Obama, who "is 45 and just two years removed from the Illinois legislature, has a third option that is less viable for McCain and Clinton. He could angle for the vice presidency, a route to the Oval Office for former senators Harry S. Truman, Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon -- but not for Hubert H. Humphrey, Walter F. Mondale, Dan Quayle and Al Gore."

Polls Show Clinton's Still Hampered By Public's "Entrenched" Views. U.S. News and World Report (11/20, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "faces a familiar dilemma: Can she overcome the nation's entrenched views of her—and her husband—in a presidential campaign? For the presumed Democratic front-runner, the answer is unclear. A Gallup Poll this year found that 17 percent of Americans would definitely back her and that 49 percent would definitely not, but that less than 1 percent had no opinion."

Several Democrats Competing For Liberal Base Voters. U.S. News and World Report (11/20, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports that "at this stage" former Sen. John Edwards "has some advantages among the liberals. He placed second to John Kerry in the all-important Iowa caucuses in 2004 and still has a loyal network of volunteers there. Edwards may also benefit from the addition of two states to the early primary lineup-his native South Carolina and Nevada, where he has strong ties to unionized hotel and restaurant workers." Sen. Russ Feingold, "who voted against the Iraq war and the Patriot Act, is reminding audiences in Iowa and New Hampshire that both measures passed Congress with Democratic support. … Of course, Democratic stars like Al Gore and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama could become the anti-Clinton darlings of the netroots, making them the two biggest x factors."

DOJ_NMG_0092903

Elder Bush, Clinton Address Realtors Convention In New Orleans. The AP (11/13, Foster) reports they are "separated by more than 20 years, they come from opposing political parties, and one evicted the other from the White House. But Bill Clinton and George Bush act like a team, a pair of touring comedians with a well-honed act." The two former presidents "even have their entrance down pat, striding in with arms aloft, music pounding, lights flashing, the crowd standing and going wild." The pair "addressed more than 25,000 people attending the National Association of Realtors convention on Saturday, drawing at least six standing ovations and almost continuous applause." Bush and Clinton "thanked the real estate agents for holding their convention in New Orleans. It's the biggest convention to come to the city since Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, 2005, and the pair has raised $130 million to aid New Orleans and the Gulf Coast in recovering from the storm." Regarding the "recent election, both said they had to deal with congresses controlled for most or all of their presidencies by the other party. They said some of the best legislation during that time were made through compromises." Clinton said "he did not think his wife, Sen. Hillary Clinton, had decided yet whether she would run for the presidency. 'If she were to be elected I think she would do a good job,' Clinton said." Bush added, "Yeah, but I'm having a little difficulty picturing this fellow walking behind her like Prince Philip behind the queen."

Ford Becomes Oldest Living President In History. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 7, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Gerald Ford entered the history books again today by becoming our oldest living former President. At 93 years and 121 days Mr. Ford is one day older than Ronald Reagan was when he died in 2004." The Washington Post (11/13, 690K) also notes Ford's record.

Acumen Fund Designed To Be "Philanthropic Venture" Fund. The New York Times (11/13, Lee, 1.16M) reports the idea "befuddled donors and Internal Revenue Service lawyers alike when Jacqueline Novogratz approached them six years ago. A philanthropic venture capital fund?" Novogratz planned to make the Acumen Fund "a nonprofit charity" that "would invest in companies and groups that tackled global poverty." Novogratz said it was "an unusual idea to pitch to philanthropists," adding, "They had never seen an organization like us: raising charitable money but wanting the flexibility of grants, loans and equity investments in for-profit and nonprofit organizations." The Times adds Novogratz, "who has an M.B.A., has backgrounds in both in finance and philanthropy and worked as a banker at Chase Manhattan and as a manager of special projects at the Rockefeller Foundation before starting Acumen." Two "key people intuitively grasped the Acumen Fund's mission: Larry Page and Sergey Brin, the co-founders of Google, whom Ms. Novogratz first met at a Technology Entertainment and Design conference two years ago. During the period when Google's new charitable foundation, Google.org, was defining itself, the company's founders knew they shared a vision with Ms. Novogratz — a desire to reinvent philanthropy and push the boundaries of how people who had done well could also do good."

Liberals Urged To Co-Opt "Values" Debate. In a USA Today op-ed (11/13), Tom Krattenmaker of the USA board of contributors says, "I am a values voter. Given my progressive political and religious beliefs, some might find this a dubious claim — especially members of the Christian right, who with their rhetoric about 'values voters' suggest that only those who share their positions on abortion and same-sex couples possess something deserving of the term 'values.'" Apparently, "those of us who hold different positions on the hot-button issues as framed by social conservatives — those of us who turn our attention and hearts to other imperatives such as peace-making, poverty relief, environmental preservation and tolerance — have no values. According to the rhetoric of social conservatives, progressives are the 'anything goes' lot. Secularists, liberal Christians and followers of other faiths — we're the ones tearing America down with our moral weakness and hostility to the conservative Christian worldview." As progressives "wield language that once belonged solely to conservatives, may we do so fairly, in a way that acknowledges that the other side of the debate also has values. In so doing, we'll model other core values of ours: inclusiveness and respect for differing viewpoints."

WSJournal Notes World Bank Study Says Simple Tax Systems Promote Growth. The Wall Street Journal (11/13, A16, 2.04M) says in an editorial that the World Bank's "toiling economists have discovered that simplified tax systems promote economic growth. In a report titled 'Paying Taxes -- The Global Picture,' the World Bank and its co-authors at PricewaterhouseCoopers make the case for simplifying business taxes. Burdensome rules and multiple levies, they argue, promote tax evasion even when individual corporate tax rates are low. Make the system transparent and simple, and the private sector will pony up. It's an argument that could be made for personal income taxes, too." The survey "examines the tax regimes of 175 countries between April and July this year. It looks at the administrative tax burden that a hypothetical, limited liability company with 60 employees would face. The Bank's findings echo that of the flat-tax camp; namely, simple tax regimes promote compliance and efficiency."

DOJ_NMG_0092904

Bush To Visit Vietnam This Week. USA Today (11/13, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "President Bush travels this week to the site of an old military conflict casting a shadow over the United States and Iraq: Vietnam. Bush's trip, including stops in Singapore and Indonesia, is mainly to promote trade at a conference in Hanoi and discuss ways to combat terrorism in the region." But "the eight-day journey also includes reminders of how the Vietnam War roiled US politics and society and raises questions about whether the same thing is happening with Iraq." Bush "stressed what he said were the differences with reporters last week. He said Iraqis overthrew Saddam Hussein with US help, approved a new constitution and formed a government that is trying to move forward despite sectarian violence. Vietnam endured a civil war in which the communist North, backed by China and the Soviet Union, defeated a U.S.-supported government in the South." The Iraq war "is also being fought with a volunteer army, Bush said, without the compulsory draft that inspired protests in the 1960s and early '70s. The president also said US troops in Iraq are receiving more support from the American people than those in Vietnam did."

US, Vietnamese Officials Assessing Effects Of Agent Orange Spraying. The Washington Post (11/13, A1, Faiola, 690K) reports, "For decades, the United States and Vietnam have wrangled over the question of responsibility for the US military's deployment of Agent Orange." But "officials say they are now moving to jointly address at least one important aspect of the spraying's aftermath -- environmental damage at Vietnamese 'hot spots' such as Nguyen's city, Da Nang -- that are still contaminated with dioxin 31 years after the fall of Saigon. … Vietnamese and US officials last year conducted their first joint scientific research project related to Agent Orange. Testing of the soil near Da Nang's airport, where farmers say they have been unable to grow rice or fruit trees for decades, showed dioxin levels there as much as 100 times above acceptable international standards. Now the United States is planning to co-fund a project to remove massive amounts of the chemical from the soil." The Post adds, "A senior US official involved in Vietnam policy said the plan is evidence that the two countries, having embarked on a new era of economic cooperation, are finally collaborating to address the problem."

Vietnam Frees US Citizen Convicted Of Terrorism. The Washington Post (11/13, A17, Kessler, 690K) reports that a US citizen "convicted of terrorism in a Vietnamese court has been released and will arrive today in the United States, her daughter said yesterday. The case of Orlando resident Thuong Nguyen 'Cuc' Foshee had complicated efforts by the Bush administration to pass a major trade bill with Vietnam." The Post notes that President Bush will arrive in Hanoi on Friday for an Asian economic summit "and has pressed for the trade bill's passage before he leaves Washington." The House is expected to take up the measure today.

Bush To Discuss Trade With Putin. AFP (11/13, Collinson) reports, "President George W. Bush Wednesday holds the first of two meetings with Russian leader Vladimir Putin within five days, bearing the prize of a long sought-after pact on Moscow's entry into the WTO. While the deal announced Friday is a landmark between two former Cold War foes, it will also throw a harsh spotlight on growing strains in US-Russian relations, as it is expected to face harsh scrutiny in Congress." The two meetings, "one in Moscow on Wednesday and one in Vietnam next Sunday, come as expectations mount of an increasingly testy relationship between Congress, captured by Democrats in Tuesday's elections, and the Kremlin." AFP adds, "Concern is mounting among US legislators on a list of US-Russia disagreements, spanning Moscow's reluctance to impose sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program, geopolitical concerns like Georgia and post-Soviet states, human rights, and trade spats." There is also "disquiet over how the emerging energy superpower hands out oil and gas contracts, its arms sales to US foe Venezuela and the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya."

Seoul Rejects US-Led Measures To Sanction North. The AP (11/13, Chang) reports South Korea "balked Monday at participating in a US-led plan that foresees intercepting North Korean ships suspected of carrying supplies for the regime's nuclear and missile weapons programs." Worried that stopping and searching ships "could lead to armed clashes" with the North, Seoul "also insisted it is already doing enough to prevent weapons proliferation by Pyongyang." Speaking about a report on how it would carry out UN sanctions, deputy foreign minister Park In-kook said Seoul "already participated in various regimes to control weapons of mass destruction, and wouldn't formally join the US-led Proliferation Security Initiative."

Russia Says Early December Proposed For Talks. AFP (11/13) reports that six-nation talks on ending North Korea's nuclear weapons drive "may be held at the beginning of December," Russia's ambassador to Japan, Alexander Losyukov, said. The ambassador said dates "early next month have been proposed among diplomats."

DOJ_NMG_0092905

Czech Intelligence Says It Thwarted Nuclear Deals. The Los Angeles Times (11/13, 850K) reports briefly that the Czech secret service "disrupted three attempts last year by North Korea to purchase equipment needed for nuclear weapons production," Czech media reported. "Last year our service halted three export deals headed for North Korea, in particular special machine tools, their components and spare parts," a secret service spokesman, Jan Subrt, told the nation's CTK news agency.

Olmert Arrives In Washington For Talks On Palestinian Conflict, Iran. The Washington Times/AP (11/13, Teibel) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert began a five-day trip to the United States Sunday, "armed with an agenda focusing on the Iranian nuclear threat and Israel's relations with the Palestinians." On the flight over, Olmert "repeated his view that Iran will not scale back its nuclear ambitions unless it fears the consequences of its intransigence," a spokeswoman said. At the same time, Olmert appeared "to play down a senior Israeli official's suggestion that Israel is preparing for a military strike against Iran's nuclear program." The AP notes that Olmert "has said Iran's nuclear ambitions would be the main item on his agenda when he meets with US officials in Washington," where he "had dinner with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Sunday, but neither US nor Israeli officials would describe the subjects of their conversation." Olmert was scheduled to meet with President Bush on Monday.

AFP (11/13, Bousso) says Olmert's meeting Monday with Bush "has been described in Israel as 'a down-to-business meeting' on Iran. With Tehran continuing to reject international calls to halt its nuclear enrichment efforts, Israel has in recent months moved the Iranian threat to the top of its agenda. But Israel could have reason for concern about the resignation of US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a ferocious opponent of dialogue. His expected successor, Robert Gates, has signed onto a report calling for dialogue with Iran."

In a 3,000-word analysis piece titled "In New Middle East, Tests For An Old Friendship," the New York Times (11/13, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports, "Even before the American elections, a certain wariness had crept into the intimate friendship between Israel and the United States. … In theory, the two countries share a vision for a modern Middle East in which a thriving Israel would be accepted by its neighbors. But the Israelis balk at President Bush's embrace of regional change through promotion of Arab democracy. They view his effort as naïve and counterproductive, because it brings Islamists and Iranian clients to power. Although Israel was grateful to see Saddam Hussein overthrown, officials here have long focused on what they consider a much bigger concern: preventing Iran from gaining nuclear weapons. They say the American policies that have empowered Iranian-backed militias in Iraq have been counterproductive to Israel's interests."

In a column for the Washington Post (11/13, 690K), Jackson Diehl writes, "Today two bruised, weakened and defensive politicians, George W. Bush and Ehud Olmert, will sit down together at the White House for the first time in six months. Whether the tide of extremism now roaring across the Middle East -- from the Gaza Strip to Baghdad -- can be turned back could depend on whether they find a way to buck each other up." Bush and Olmert "will have to face the reality that Iran is winning -- not just in preserving its nuclear program but in a broader contest over the direction of the Middle East. Olmert's 'disengagement' plan is dead, at least for now; so is Bush's hope that an Iraqi coalition government could stabilize the country. … Imagine Ehud Olmert emerging from the White House to announce that Israel is prepared to explore peace with Syria. It might not turn the ugly tide in the Middle East. But it would, at least, get Israel and the United States back in the fight."

Olmert Discusses Lessons Learned From War In Lebanon. Newsweek's Lally Weymouth (11/20) interviews Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Olmert, discussing the aftermath of Israel's attack on Lebanon this summer, says, "After the war, and the failure of the Palestinians to cope with continued terrorist actions, I had second thoughts about my ability to accomplish the two-state solution through realignment. One thing I can promise: under no circumstances am I going to withdraw from the need to engage in a serious dialogue with the Palestinians. The Palestinian issue is on the agenda. There is no way we can ignore it. We have to find the best partner—a lot depends on the Palestinian leadership." Asked if is planning to speak with president Bush about Iran, Olmert said, "I think that Bush is the last person on earth who needs to be reminded of what should be done in order to stop Iran. If there is one person I can trust, it's him."

Rice Says US "Concerned" By Syria's Aid To Hezbollah. AFP (11/13) reports Secretary Rice said Sunday in an interview with Israel's Maariv daily that Washington "believes Syria is a dangerous state whose territory is being used for the accelerated arming of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia." The newspaper quoted the Secretary saying Syria is "a dangerous state that is behaving in a dangerous manner. The United States is concerned and is following closely the use of Syrian territory as a way-station for the accelerated arming of Hezbollah." As Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert arrives in Washington for talks with President Bush, Rice called Syria "a way-station for Iranian arms that cross the Middle East," and stressed that the US is "watching this situation closely," while "working with additional international agencies in order to tell Syria that it must change this behavior pattern."

DOJ_NMG_0092906

Echoing Secretary Rice's comments, White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten said on ABC's This Week (11/12, Stephanopoulos), "Our problem with Iran and Syria in the past, I don't believe, has been a lack of communication. In fact, during the first term of this President, we spent a lot of time trying to talk to the Syrians to no effect. So I don't think there's been a communications problem. There's been a cooperation problem. Iran and Syria have been meddling in Iraq in a very unhelpful way. Iranian weapons and technology have found their way into the Iraqi conflict and are being used to kill Iraqis and American soldiers. That needs to stop."

Arab League Calls For New Round Of Mideast Peace Talks. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 4, 1:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight the Arab League is calling for a peace conference with Israel. And while the Hamas led Palestinian government has endorsed the idea, so far, Israeli officials say unless Hamas recognizes Israel there will be no meeting. Mark Phillips reports from Tel Aviv tonight on another week of violence in the Middle East and another try for peace from the White House." CBS (Phillips) added, "Call it two damaged leaders in search of the Mideast policy. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is in Washington to see President Bush. The agenda, to explore where, if anywhere, the stalled peace process can go from here. It seems to be going backwards, especially last week. The funeral in Gaza of 18 people, seven of them young children killed by Israeli shells, has stoked the fury of Palestinian militants who have vowed revenge. And the hail, however ineffective of Hamas rocket fire into southern Israel, has continued despite the Israeli attempts to stop it. In this context Israel's occasional offers to hold talks with Palestinian President Abbas have gone nowhere. … But Abbas is in no position to sit down and talk. He's still trying to resolve a bitter internal power struggle between his own Fatah movement and the more militant Hamas, which is stubbornly refusing to recognize Israel's right to exist. … No matter what happens in meetings in Washington this week further violence, not peace, seems the more likely outcome."

The Washington Times/AP (11/13, Nasrawi) reports the Arab League statement said ministers sought a conference to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict "according to international resolutions and the principle of 'land for peace.'" Meanwhile, Arab ministers "also decided Sunday to end a financial blockade on the Palestinians to show their anger over US veto in the" UNSC Saturday condemning the Israeli attack in Gaza. Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa said the decision to break the Western-lead financial blockade was "a message to the United States."

Cabinet Resignations Shake Beirut. Following this weekend's resignations of five Shitte cabinet ministers, the New York Times (11/13, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "Lebanon is in the middle of a political crisis that is not just a matter of jockeying for power, but a fundamental realignment of authority here -- and perhaps in the region." The Times says the resignations set the stage "for a showdown between Hezbollah and its allies, which are aligned with Syria and Iran, and the Sunni, Druse and Christian leaders who control the largest bloc in Parliament and side with the West. Hezbollah has threatened to stage demonstrations as early as Monday, but Hezbollah officials said Sunday that they were waiting to see how their opposition responded and were considering all options. The governing coalition is expected to make its counterstrike on Monday."

Iran Says It Will Retaliate If Attacked By Israel. The AP (11/13, Karimi) reports, "Iran's military will retaliate swiftly and strongly if Israel attacks any Iranian nuclear sites, the Foreign Ministry said Sunday." The warning "came two days after Israel's deputy defense minister suggested Israel might be forced to launch a military strike against Iran's disputed nuclear program as 'a last resort.'" Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini said, "If the Zionist regime commits such stupidity, the response by the Iranian military will be swift, strong and crushing. … Iran will take no longer than a second to respond."

Ahmadinejad Calls UN Efforts To Impose Sanctions "Disgraceful." The New York Times (11/13, Fathi, 1.16M) reports, "President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Sunday described efforts by the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran as 'disgraceful.'" Iran "contends that its nuclear program is peaceful and that its aim is to produce fuel for its nuclear power plants."

Islamists Capture Somali Town. The AP (11/13, Nor) reports, "Islamic militants said they captured a town in central Somalia on Sunday after they came under attack from pro-government militiamen backed by troops from Ethiopia and a semiautonomous region in northern Somalia. The fighting erupted near the border of the Puntland region, one of the few areas in Somalia still outside the control of the Islamic movement. The group said it captured the town of Bandiradley, about 430 miles north of the capital, Mogadishu, and two of its fighters were killed in the battle." The New York Times (11/13, Gettleman, 1.16M) says "each side blamed the other for the bloodshed, which claimed as many as 10 lives." The Financial Times (11/13, Biedermann) and Wall Street Journal (11/13, A4, Higgins, 2.04M), among other sources, also report the story.

Chinese Sub Stalked US Aircraft Carrier Last Month. The Washington Times (11/13, Gertz, 88K)

DOJ_NMG_0092907

reports, "A Chinese submarine stalked a U.S. aircraft carrier battle group in the Pacific last month and surfaced within firing range of its torpedoes and missiles before being detected, The Washington Times has learned." The "surprise encounter highlights China's continuing efforts to prepare for a future conflict with the US, despite Pentagon efforts to try to boost relations with Beijing's communist-ruled military." The Times adds, "The submarine encounter with the USS Kitty Hawk and its accompanying warships also is an embarrassment to the commander of U.S. forces in the Pacific, Adm. William J. Fallon, who is engaged in an ambitious military exchange program with China aimed at improving relations between the two nations' militaries."

US Says Castro's Health Deteriorating. The CBS Evening News (11/12, story 5, 0:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "US officials are telling the Associated Press they think that Castro is dying of cancer. They believe the ailing 80-year-old Cuban leader is not likely to live beyond next year." The AP (11/13, Shrader) says Washington's "dire view was reinforced last week when Cuba's foreign minister backed away from his prediction the ailing Castro would return to power by early December."

UN Official Meets With "Brutal" Ugandan Leader. The New York Times (11/13, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports on Joseph Kony, "one of the most vilified rebel leaders on the planet." He "stands accused of brainwashing countless children across northern Uganda, turning the girls into sex slaves and the boys into prepubescent killers. His so-called Christian movement, the Lord's Resistance Army, has terrorized this corner of Africa for nearly 20 years, killing tens of thousands of people, burning down huts and hacking off lips. The fact that Mr. Kony, whose followers believe he is a prophet, rarely appears in public has only added to his brutal mystique." But "on Sunday, he came out of the bush. At a camp deep in the forest on the Congo-Sudan border, Mr. Kony materialized to meet Jan Egeland, the United Nations under secretary general for humanitarian affairs and emergency relief."

The Washington Post/AP (11/13, A16, Pownall) reports Kony and Egeland "shook hands before speaking for 10 minutes in a green tent erected by the United Nations." Egeland "was seeking the release of women and children enslaved by the group during its 20-year conflict with the Ugandan government." But Kony "denied that his forces were holding prisoners."

Al Jazeera Seeks To Extends Its Reach, Influence. The New York Times (11/13, Fattah, 1.16M) reports, "Al Jazeera, the Arab news channel that began a decade ago as an upstart, has became a thorn in the side of every dictator in the region as well as of the Bush administration. Critics call it radical; its admirers lionize it. And the network continues to battle accusations that it is sympathetic to Al Qaeda and other extremists." Meanwhile, "Al Jazeera's journalists are working to transform the channel into a conglomerate with global reach. By the end of the year, Al Jazeera will have news channels in Arabic and English, a pan-Arab newspaper, Web sites and blogs, sports and children's outlets, and even a channel modeled after C-Span. The network (it turned 10 on Nov. 1) is also looking to extend its sphere of influence beyond the Arab world. On Wednesday, it will start the English-language Al Jazeera International, its most ambitious initiative yet, which will go on the air from Asia to the United States."

Ortega's Transformation In 2006 Campaign Examined. Álvaro Vargas Llosa, the director of the Center on Global Prosperity at the Independent Institute in Washington, writes in the New York Times (11/13, 1.16M) that in Nicaragua, Daniel Ortega "tossed the olive green fatigues and the red and black flag; his campaign colors were pink and turquoise, and his theme song a Spanish version of John Lennon's 'Give Peace a Chance.' He apologized for the massacre of the indigenous Miskito people that took place in the north of the country during his first regime and, finally, he instructed his legislators to vote for a bill banning abortion even in cases of a threat to the woman's life." Llosa adds, "What this farcical saga tells us is that Daniel Ortega was much more interested in being president than in being principled and, more important, that anyone who wants to lead today's Nicaragua needs to persuade voters that he will respect the rule of law and private property, will try to lure investment and will be sensitive to the nation's religious heritage. … In a sense, these moderate left-wing leaders, perhaps now including Mr. Ortega, are a lot more in sync with what Ronald Reagan and his men were aiming for in Central America in the 1980s than Oliver North would care to admit. As they fall over themselves pandering to the church, the business community and conservative voters, there's little time left over for creating a New Man."

Ortega's Professed "Evolution" Convinces Some Former Enemies. Time (11/20, Padgett, 4.03M) reports Nicaraguan President-elect Daniel Ortega "sounds like a changed man. 'We won't eradicate poverty by eradicating capital or alienating investors but by joining forces with them,' he says. Ortega is playing to the audience, but even former rivals believe that his evolution from communist strongman to nascent capitalist may be genuine."

Calderon Describes Immigration In Context Of Free Markets. In an interview with Time (11/20, 4.03M) Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon is quoted as saying, "I cannot imagine the future of North America -- Canada, the U.S., Mexico--without a free market. Free in all senses of the word, in terms of goods and services and in terms of labor too. You cannot have an efficient and prosperous economy, even in the U.S., without developing a single, free market. On the other hand, I realize how important the immigration problem is for Americans. It is the same for Mexico. Every year we lose the best of our people: young, responsible, hardworking people. In Mexico you see a lot of towns made up of only women and the elderly. That is not exactly the country we want to have. I believe that migration is a bilateral problem, and it needs to be solved by creating jobs in Mexico."

DOJ_NMG_0092908

US Media Coverage Of Africa Criticized. Novelist Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie writes in the Washington Post (11/13, 690K) about "the view of Africa from the American media, in which we are shown poverty and conflicts without any context. If I were not African, I would, after watching the coverage, think of Africa as a place of magnificent wild animals in which black Africans exist as tour guides, or as a place of desperately poor people who kill or are killed by one another for little or no reason. … Which brings me back to Madonna. I applauded her funding of orphanages in Malawi. I wish, however, that instead of asking television viewers to go to Africa and adopt, she had asked them to send a check to malaria-eradication organizations. … I wish she had pointed out, with suitable celebrity-style rage, that Western countries need to stop appeasing and propping up hopeless African leaders, that Western banks must stop enabling and accepting stolen money from these leaders, that Western donors who insist on the free movement of capital across borders must also insist on the free movement of labor. I wish she had then shown, with graphs on the screen, how these things affect the father and relatives of David Banda."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Democratic Lawmakers Will Seek A Phased Withdrawal From Iraq."
"Afghan Army Could Help Unify A Nation."
"A Friendly Voice, When Pirates Strike."
"Near A Pristine Desert Peak, Housing Looms."
"Reid Pledges Earmark Reform, But May Benefit."
"KB Home CEO Ousted Over Stock Options."

USA Today:
"Cleric Al-Sadr May Hold Iraq's Future In His Hands."
"Hospitals Too Slow On Heart Attacks."
"Democrats: Identify Pork Sponsors."

New York Times:
"Democrats Push For Troop Cuts Within Months."
"Influence Rises But Base Frays For Iraqi Cleric."
"Identity Thief Is Often Found In Family Photo."
"In New Middle East, Tests For An Old Friendship."
"Fresh Off The Farm In Montana, a Senator-To-Be."
"As Sonics Pack To Leave Town, Seattle Shrugs."
"Leaving The City For The Schools, And Regretting It."

Washington Post:
"Blasts Kill Iraqi Police Recruits."
"Pelosi Backs Murtha for Majority Leader."
"Vietnam's Toxic War Legacy."
"Like Clockwork: Hour Of Delay, Hour Of Flight."
"Va. State Police Swap '10-4' For 'Message Understood."
"Hunch Unravels Wedding Scam."

Washington Times:
"China Sub Security Stalked U.S. Fleet."
"Democrats To Propose Iraq Pullout."
"Petty Disputes Spur D.C. Killings."
"Shi'ite Fanatic Rises In Iraq To Fill Void Left By Zarqawi."
"Abused Wives in India Pin Hope On Anti-Violence Law."
"Israel's Lieberman Talk Touch."

Detroit Free Press:
"The Road Toyota Took To Success."
"Up North Deer Hunters Migrate Down South."
"Holy Heroics Batman!"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Lame Ducks' Agenda Heavy."
"$1.8 Million Bailout."
"Atlantans Capture Hip-Hop Awards."

Houston Chronicle:
"Dyna-Might."
"Time Up For Last major Enron Exec."
"School Promotes high-Tech Tip Line."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Preempted By MLS Cup Championship.
CBS: New Course-Iraq; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Sectarian Violence-Iraq Police Problem; Israel Palestinian Conflict; Castro's Health; Motor Medics; Oldest living Former President; College Admissions; Portraits Of fallen Soldiers; Ed Bradley Remembered.
NBC: Preempted By Football.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Bush-Iraq Study Group; Iraq's PM-Cabinet Reshuffle; Saudi Arabia's Interior Minister-Iraq; Olmert, Bush Meeting; CA Wildfire; Ford-Longest Living President; Heart Attacks-Quicker Response Ideas; Heart Attacks-Connection To Intense Anger.

DOJ_NMG_0092909

CBS: Iraq-Militias; Bush-Iraq Study Group; Northeast US-Rain; Northwest US-Precipitation; CA Wildfire; Heart Disease-Survival Rate Disparity Between Black And Whites; South Korea-Won't Join US-Led Plan To Search Cargo Going To And From North Korea; Weekend Box Office; Canada-Chocolate Recall.
NPR: Bush-Iraq Study Group; Congress-Lame Duck Session; Bush-Bolton Appointment; Finance Minister From Afghanistan-Canadian Troops; South Korea-Won't Join US-Led Plan To Search Cargo Going To And From North Korea; Spain-Maritime Disaster Demonstrators; Explosive Remnants Of War Treaty.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with the Iraq Study Group; meets with Israeli Prime Minister Olmert, White House.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. Meets for morning business.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (10 bills): 1) H.R. 409 - Sierra National Forest Land Exchange Act of 2006; 2) H.R. 3085 - To amend the National Trails System Act to update the feasibility and suitability study originally prepared for the Trail of Tears National Historic Trail and provide for the inclusion of new trail segments, land components, and campgrounds associated with that trail, and for other purposes; 3) S. 1131 - Idaho Land Enhancement Act; 4) S. 4001 - New England Wilderness Act of 2006; 5) H.R. 1129 - Pitkin County Land Exchange Act of 2006; 6) S. 435 - Lower Farmington River and Salmon Brook Wild and Scenic River Study Act of 2005; 7) S. 819 - Pactola Reservoir Reallocation Authorization Act of 2005; 8) H.R. 6121 - To amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act to reauthorize a program relating to the Lake Pontchartrain Basin, and for other purposes; 9) S. 1140 - Senator William V. Roth, Jr. Bridge Designation Act; 10) H.R. __ - To authorize the extension of nondiscriminatory treatment (normal trade relations treatment) to the products of Vietnam, and to establish a procedure for imposing quotas on imports of subsidized textile and apparel products of Vietnam 6:30 p.m. Approximate time for swearing in for Rep.-elect Albio Sires who is filling the seat of Robert Menendez of New Jersey, and for Rep.-elect Shelley Sekula-Gibbs who is filling the seat of Rep. Tom DeLay.

Other: ISRAELI PRIME MINISTER OLMERT _ Highlights: Meets with President Bush. White House. 4 p.m. Olmert's Press Secretary, Miri Eisen, holds a briefing to discuss the meetings with President Bush and Secretary of State Rice. National Press Club. Contact: Michael Doyle, 202-383-0006.

EDUCATION _ The Public Education Network holds its 16th annual conference on the transformation of public education by local education funds. Highlights: 12 p.m. Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. Location: Fairmont Hotel, 2401 M St. NW.

GLOBAL SOLUTIONS _ Citizens for Global Solutions holds a conference to develop bipartisan foreign policy for the 21st century. Highlights: 9 a.m. Opening session with Rep. Jim Kolbe and Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer. 10:15 a.m. Rep. Jim McGovern. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon: ``Nuclear Weapons, Power and 21st Century Security'' with Laura S. H. Holgate, Vice President for Russia/New Independent States (NIS) Programs, Nuclear Threat Initiative; Mary Beth Nikitin, Fellow, Center for Strategic & International Studies; Dr. Edward Lyman, Senior Staff Scientist, Global Security Program, Union of Concerned Scientists. Location: Hotel Palomar, 2121 P St. NW.

MIDEAST _ The Middle East Institute holds its 60th annual conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. Keynote speech - Energy Secretary Bodman. 10:15 a.m. Panel on exiting Iraq, with Jay Garner, US Army (retired); Brian Katulis, Center for American Progress; David Satterfield, Senior State Dept. Coordinator, Iraq; Qubad Talabany, Kurdistan Regional Government. 2 p.m. Panel on Afghanistan, Pakistan and regional stability, with Steve Coll, The New Yorker; James Dobbins, RAND Corporation; Richard Giguere, Royal Canadian Forces Attachi; Bruce Riedel, Brookings Institution. Location: National Press Club.

KING MEMORIAL _ 8:40 a.m. - 12 p.m. Ceremonial groundbreaking for the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial. Location: National Mall, Independence Ave. and West Basin Dr.

MILLENNIUM CHALLENGE-MALI _ 9 a.m. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Chair of the Board of the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC), will make remarks at the signing of the Millennium Challenge Compact between the United States and the Republic of Mali. Malian President Amadou Toumani Touri and MCC Chief Executive Officer Ambassador John Danilovich will also make remarks. The $461 million Compact will be signed by Ambassador Danilovich and Mali's Minister of Foreign Affairs Moctar Ouane. Location: Benjamin Franklin Room, Department of State.

TORTURE _ 9:30 a.m. Former military interrogator and prominent psychologists will discuss preliminary findings from their groundbreaking analysis on the efficacy of torture at a press conference. Recent media reports on the use of torture in intelligence gathering operations have raised important questions about the effectiveness of harsh interrogation methods. Does torture generate reliable information? Is torture an effective tool for the war on terrorism? The following participants will discuss their preliminary findings: Jean Maria Arrigo, co-founder, International Intelligence Ethics Association; Fathali Moghaddam, professor of psychology and author of From the Terrorists Point of View: What They Experience and Why They Come to Destroy; a Former Military Interrogator. Location: Georgetown University Alumni House, 3604 O St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0092910

GAS MILEAGE _ 10 a.m. The Consumer Federation of America holds a news conference to release a study of consumer attitudes toward gasoline prices and their auto purchase plans, and another analysis of how manufacturers have responded to the calls for improved fuel economy. Location: New York Room, Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

RUSSIA _ 10:30 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a lecture by Yegor Gaidar, acting prime minister during the first government of President Boris Yeltsin and the architect of the free-market revolution in post-Soviet Russia, discussing the lessons of the Soviet states failure to the new direction of the Kremlin in the last few years. Location: 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

CONGRESS-ENVIRONMENT _ 11 a.m. Environmental groups hold a telephone news conference to discuss the outlook for environmental legislation in the new Congress. Contacts: Tony Iallonardo, 202-271-8602. Notes: Callin number: 800-311-9407; passcode: Audubon1.

MARRIAGE _ 11 a.m. Women's Voices. Women Vote and pollster Stanley Greenberg hold a telephone briefing to release the results of a12-state, 4-day tracking poll of unmarried women. Analysis will include results from three polls, including a 12-state survey of unmarried women, election day exit polls and an over sample of a Democracy Corps Election night survey. Contacts: Lisa Sohn, 415-901-0111. Notes: Callin number: 800-362-0653; call title: women's voices; passcode: 7vote.

ELECTION-ANALYSIS _ 12 p.m. The Kettering Foundation holds a roundtable discussion analyzing the election returns, with Bliss Browne of Imagine Chicago, Michael Delli Carpini of the Annenberg School of Communication, Brenda Firton-Mitchell of the National Council of Churches, Richard Harwood of the Harwood Institute, former Mississippi Gov. William Winter, others. Location: National Archives.

ELECTION-WOMEN _ 12 p.m. The National Council of Women's Organizations holds a news conference to discuss the election results, how women were mobilized and voted and how women fared as candidates. Participants include Denise Baer, Strategic Research Concepts, President; Martha Burk, National Council of Women's Organizations; Lorraine Cole, YWCA, Chief Executive Officer; Kim Gandy, National Organization for Women, President; Dolores Huerta, United Farm Workers, Co-Founder; Crystal Lander, Feminist Majority, Campus Director; Eleanor Smeal, Ms. Magazine, Publisher; E. Faye Williams, National Congress of Black Women, Chair. Location: National Press Club.

HEALTH INSURANCE _ 12 p.m. America's Health Insurance Plans group releases a new plan to expand access to health insurance coverage to more than 40 million people. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW.

RENEWABLE ENERGY _ 12:30 p.m. The Energy Future Coalition and the 25x25 Alliance will hold a media lunch to discuss a new RAND Corporation study showing that America could dramatically increase its use of renewable energy at little to no cost to the economy. Location: National Press Club.

AIDS-SENATE _ 1 p.m. Dr. Gary Puckrein, executive director of the National Minority Health Month Foundation, and other AIDS activists hold a telephone news briefing calling for the immediate passage of the Ryan White CARE Act reauthorization bill currently stalled in the US Senate. Contacts: Hillary Maxwell, 202-572-6205. Notes: Dialin number: 800-361-0912; confirmation code: 4699501; title: Ryan White CARE Act.

BLOGGING _ 1 p.m. ``Beltway Blogger Boot Camp," a workshop designed to provide up-to-the-minute blogging best practices for communications, public relations and government relations professionals, hosted by Washington public affairs firm Issue Dynamics, Inc., with leading DC-area blog experts. Location: National Press Club.

FAITH SYMBOL _ 1 p.m. Americans United for Separation of Church and State announces litigation to force the Department of Veterans Affairs to recognize the Wiccan faith symbol, the pentacle, for use on memorial markers, plaques and headstones. Location: National Press Club.

MOCNY _ 1 p.m. US-VISIT Acting Director Robert Mocny speaks at the US-VISIT 10-Print Industry Day. Location: 12th floor, 1400 N. 14th St., Arlington. Notes: Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff speaks to the same meeting at 1:30 p.m.

CONGRESS-ACLU _ 1:30 p.m. The American Civil Liberties Union holds a conference call briefing to discuss the lame duck congressional session and its potential impact on civil liberties. Contacts: Mandy Simon, 202-675-2312. Notes: Dial in number: 800-816-4134. Access Code: 69922.

COMPETITIVENESS _ 2 p.m. The Council on Competitiveness holds a news conference to release the Competitiveness Index: Where America Stands. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW.

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 3 p.m. The Environmental and Energy Study Institute holds a briefing with officials from the

DOJ_NMG_0092911

British Embassy discussing the just-released Stern Review on the Economics of Climate Change. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

ELECTION-FOREIGN POLICY _ 6 p.m. Georgetown University sponsors a panel discussion on the impact of the election on foreign policy, with former Rep. Mickey Edwards, former Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman, former Assistant Secretary of State Wendy Sherman, others. Location: Bunn Center Auditorium, on campus.

ENERGY _ 6 p.m. The Defense Department holds a program with Brian Appel, chairman and CEO, Changing World Technologies, Inc., discussing ``Thinking Differently About Energy Sources: A Paradigm Shift - from Waste to Fuel." Location: Doubletree Hotel Crystal City, 300 Army Navy Dr., Arlington.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0092912

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, November 13, 2006 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, November 12, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061112.pdf; dojclips061112.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Posada A Target Of New Federal Probes (MH) 3
FBI Destroyed Evidence As 'Routine' Matter (MH) 5
Why The FBI Is Coming After Me (WP) 6
Suspects' Treatment Secret (FREEP/MCT) 8

Homeland Response:

Frustration Grows At Carousel As More Baggage Goes Astray (NYT) 9

War News:

Panel May Have Few Good Options To Offer (WP) 11
Blair To Address Iraq Study Group (WP) 13
A Consensus On Iraq (WP) 14
Talking About Iraq (NYT) 14
Right Vision, Wrong Policy -- And A Mideast Price To Pay (WP) 15
Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 33 In Baghdad, As Police Search For 50 Kidnap Victims (AP) 16
Iraqi Sunnis Kill 10 Shiites, Kidnap 50 Others (AP) 17
Sectarian Rifts Foretell Pitfalls Of Iraqi Troops' Taking Control (NYT) 18
In Gates Selection, White House Hopes To Close Rift Between State And Defense (NYT) 22
Bush Swaps Idealists For Realists (BBC) 24
Gates Struggled Through The Iran-Contra Scandal (AP) 25
How (Not) To Run The Pentagon (WP) 26
The Donald Rumsfeld I Know (WP) 27
Rumsfeld's Self-inflicted Wounds (LAT) 29
Now What? (NYT) 30
Rumsfeld Was My Squash Partner (LAT) 32
Top Commander In Iraq Says U.S. Won't Abandon Its Mission (LAT) 32
U.S. Offers Reward For Help In Finding Missing Soldier (NYT) 33
Dissenting Officer Faces Court-martial (LAT) 34
Democrats Aim To Save Inquiry On Work In Iraq (NYT) 35
Despite Billions Spent, Rebuilding Incomplete (WP) 38
Democrats And Iraq (NYT) 39
Anti-corruption Official In Iraq Accused Of Fraud (LAT) 40
Could A New Strongman Help? (NYT) 41
Romania Vows Not To 'Abandon' Iraq (AP) 43
Steering His Nation Without A Rudder (LAT) 44

Corporate Scandals:

Shower Curtain Sold Separately (NYT) 49

Criminal Law:

More Subpoenas In Menendez Probe (NSL) 50
FBI Probes May Target Congress (MCT) 51
Death Penalty Sought In Hawai'i Case (HONADV) 52

Civil Rights:

Decision Could End Fight To Balance Hispanic Vote (ORS) 55
100 Bilingual Poll Workers Achieve Goal (RMA) 56
To Settle Suit In Boy's Death, New Jersey To Pay $7.5 Million (AP) 57

Antitrust:

Gannett Emerges As Possible Bidder For Tribune Properties (CHIT) 58
Microsoft Jury Pool Faces Long Survey (DMR) 59
Sports Artist Sued For Mix Of Crimson And Tide (NYT) 60
Mayberry Sheriff Calls The Law On Candidate (AP) 61

Environment:

Asarco Leaves Costly Environmental Mess In The City (CCCT) 62

Immigration:

Boot Nazi Guard, Pol Says (NYDN) 63
Immigrant Protection Rules Draw Fire (NYT) 64

Congress-Administration:

Poll: Bush Hits New Low (NSWK) 66

At Home And Abroad, Things Are Not Going Bush's Way (AP) 67
Bush Uses Veterans Day Speech To Thank U.S. Troops For Dedication And Bravery (AP) ... 69
Bush Hails Bravery, Dedication Of Troops (WP) ... 70
For Vets And President, A Day Of Remembrance (WT) ... 71
Vote Won't Lessen Resolve, Bush Tells Terrorists (LAT) ... 72
Spinning Out Of An Electoral Beating (LAT) ... 73
Incoming Democrats Put Populism Before Ideology (NYT) ... 74
Democrats Find Lessons In GOP Reign (WP) ... 76
Reid, An Ex-boxer, Hasn't Forgotten Bush's Punches (LAT) ... 78
Ascending To A National Platform (LAT) ... 80
Speaker Clout Benefits District (AP) ... 81
Bush's Bipartisan Experience In Texas May Not Translate (HC) ... 82
Govern, Don't Gloat (NYT) ... 83
Let The Investigations Begin (NYT) ... 84
Democrats Now Look To Sustain Majority (AP) ... 84
How Rahm Emanuel Helped End An Era Of Republican Rule (CHIT) ... 86
Maybe You Did Vote Your Pocketbook (NYT) ... 94
How The Hammer Fell On His Own Party (HC) ... 95
G.O.P. Collapse In Indiana Emblematic Of Larger Loss (NYT) ... 97
Rove Remains Steadfast In The Face Of Criticism (WP) ... 98
Holding To The Center, Losing My Seat (NYT) ... 100
Webb May Be Senate Maverick (WP) ... 101
I Am Macaca (WP) ... 103
A Survivor Reflects On Political Casualties, And Real Ones (NYT) ... 104
New Democratic Majority Throws Bush's Judicial Nominations Into Uncertainty (NYT) ... 105
Carmakers' Agenda For Bush: Hear Our Pain (FREEP) ... 106
With Dems In Power, Part D Could Get A Makeover (PPG) ... 108
White House Eyes Dollars From Nevada Land Sale (WT) ... 110

Other News:

Liberal Groups Expect Postelection Results (LAT) ... 110
An Uneasy Alliance (NYT) ... 112
Core Values Still Valid, GOP Says (WT) ... 114
Reactionary Moderates (NYT) ... 116
2006: The Year Of The "Macaca" (NYT) ... 117
A True Blue Libertarian (WP) ... 119
Revolving Doors Spin Once Again (NYT) ... 120
Spitzer Buries His Cares For Weekend On The Sand (NYT) 121
Ehrlich Run Again "Unlikely" (AP) ... 121
Feingold Rules Out 2008 Run For President (MJS) ... 122
Sen. Feingold Rules Out Run For President In 2008 (AP) ... 123
Now, The Tape Measure For Those Other Drapes (NYT) ... 124
The Democrats: Is Winning Winning? (WP) ... 126
Is America Too Racist For Barack? Too Sexist For Hillary? (WP) ... 128
Life Expectancy Increases For H.I.V. Patients (AP) ... 130
Memorial Planners Have A Dream, Too (WP) ... 131
The System Worked (WP) ... 132
Let Naturalized Americans Run For President (LAT) ... 133
The Corporate End Run (NYT) ... 134
U.S. Vetoes Security Council Resolution Assailing Israel For Attacks (NYT) ... 134
U.S. Vetoes Condemnation Of Gaza Strikes (AP) ... 135
Hamas Official: Unity Gov't Deal Near (AP) ... 136
Talks Collapse In Lebanon As Shiites Vacate The Cabinet (NYT) ... 137
Hezbollah Quits Lebanese Cabinet (AP) ... 139
Russian Foreign Minister Hopeful About Nuclear Talks With Iran (AP) ... 139
U.S., Pyongyang Officials May Meet Soon, Report Says (AP) 139
Nicaragua's Ortega Vows Close U.S. Ties (AP) ... 140
Former Contras Bemoan Ortega's Return To Power In Nicaragua (WP) ... 141
Two U.N. Peacekeepers Killed In Haiti (AP) ... 143
Facing Reality On Europe's Immigrants (NYT) ... 144
Voters Were Not The Only People To Notice Scandals (NYT) ... 145

DOJ_NMG_0092915

TERRORISM NEWS:

Posada A Target Of New Federal Probes (MH)

By Alfonso Chardy And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, November 12, 2006

One of the first things the businessman noticed about Luis Posada Carriles was that he spoke funny. Posada, who mumbled because of an old bullet wound in his jaw, frequently visited the businessman's Guatemala utility company in 1997 to meet with two co-workers.

The businessman grew suspicious after one of the workers told him about Cuban exile plans to assassinate Fidel Castro and after a Venezuelan politician confided that Posada, a CIA-trained explosives expert, was a ``very dangerous individual."

Concerned that Posada was using his utility business to plot illicit activities, the businessman hid a transmitter in an office and overheard the two co-workers talk with Posada about placing a "putty-like explosive" in the shoes of Central Americans paid to pose as tourists on trips to Cuba.

Soon afterward, the businessman became a "confidential source" for the FBI's investigation into bombs that exploded at Cuban tourist sites in 1997, killing an Italian and wounding seven others.

The businessman, a Cuban-American engineer who set up the utility company in Guatemala City in 1996, could turn out to be the central figure in the Justice Department's rekindled criminal investigation of Posada. The probe is back on track -- despite the fact that the FBI field office in Miami destroyed evidence in 2003 about the initial Cuba bombing case.

Federal grand juries in New Jersey and Texas are investigating the secret activities of Posada, 78, who is detained at an immigration facility in El Paso, Texas. The Texas probe focuses on whether he lied about how he sneaked into the country. The New Jersey investigation, aided by the FBI in Miami, is zeroing in on his role as the alleged mastermind of the dozen tourist-site bombings in Cuba that investigators think were financed by Cuban exiles in Union City, N.J.

Either of the probes could lead to the first indictment of Posada in the United States.

10-PAGE AFFIDAVIT

An insight into the Justice Department's case can be found in a 10-page affidavit obtained by The Miami Herald. In the June 10, 2005, sworn statement, FBI special agent Thomas H. Rice portrayed Posada as a dangerous man bent on killing Castro and spreading terror on the communist-run island to destroy its tourism economy.

"The FBI is unable to rule out the possibility that Posada poses a threat to the national security of the United States," Rice wrote.

Among the evidence cited in the sworn statement:

• In late August 1997, the businessman at the Guatemala utility company said he and a co-worker discovered "what appeared to be explosive materials" in the firm's office, where Posada regularly met with two other workers.

The businessman later told the FBI that the materials consisted of 22 transparent plastic tubes filled with a tan substance. They were labeled with the name of the manufacturer and ``explosivos de alto poder, extremadamente peligrosos" -- high-power explosives, extremely dangerous.

• The businessman said he found funnels in the office that he thought were used to mix explosive materials with liquid inside shampoo bottles. He also found a diaper that may have been used to absorb the liquid in the bottles and yield the explosives.

The businessman then found a carrying case containing a note in Spanish, which said, "The tyrant has to be eliminated, regardless of how many others are killed." Also found in the case: a note pad with Posada's name written on the first page.

• During the FBI's investigation of the 1997 Cuba bombings, agents collected records showing about $19,000 in wire transfers from the United States to "Ramon Medina," one of Posada's aliases, in El Salvador and Guatemala between Oct. 30, 1996, and Jan. 14, 1998.

DOJ_NMG_0092916

WIRE TRANSFERS

The FBI agent specifically refers to an Aug. 25, 1997, fax intercepted by the businessman's co-worker at the Guatemala utility company.

The cryptic fax is signed Solo. Investigators think Posada sent the fax from El Salvador to the utility company, addressed to two alleged co-conspirators who worked there.

Handwritten in Spanish, it refers to wire money transfers totaling $3,200 from four men in Union City to pay a ``hotel bill.''

It also alludes to some discussion Solo had about the need for publicity for certain actions. But there is no mention of Posada or bombings.

"As I explained to you, if there is no publicity, the work is useless," Solo wrote. ``The American newspapers don't publish anything that hasn't been confirmed. I need all the information regarding the discotheque in order to try to confirm it. If there is no publicity, there will be no payment. I'll be awaiting news today, tomorrow I'll be leaving for two days."

CRUCIAL DOCUMENT

Since the fax became public in 1998, after it was reported first in The Miami Herald and then in The New York Times, it has come to be seen as a crucial document in the current investigation. It was included in the hundreds of pages turned over May 19 to the El Paso court considering Posada's custody.

In New Jersey, three of the people mentioned in the fax -- Abel Hernández, Rubén Gonzalo and his son, José -- have been approached by FBI agents and subpoenaed by the federal grand jury in Newark. Authorities wanted to know whether they helped finance the Cuba bombings.

Attorney Gilberto Garcia, who represents the three men and two other Cuban exiles also subpoenaed by the grand jury, said none had any role in the bombings.

"My clients had no knowledge about the financing of the bombings," Garcia said. ``They had no participation."

Nevertheless, Garcia said two of the five refused to testify and invoked their right against self-incrimination -- then prosecutors excused them. Two others agreed to provide information to prosecutors, and one testified before the grand jury. Those three said they had not been involved in the bombings.

Garcia said his clients' names on the Solo fax were "misappropriated." "Someone was sending these money transfers to Guatemala using their names," he said.

Although Posada was suspected as the mastermind of the bombings, he was never charged in the initial probe, largely because federal investigators insist that the Cuban government failed to help them build a case against him. But the federal case was reactivated after Posada, a Cuban-born Venezuelan citizen, sneaked into the United States last year.

The U.S. attorney's offices in Newark and El Paso declined to comment.

Eduardo Soto, Posada's attorney, said his client has not received a so-called target letter from federal authorities alleging he is a suspect in a crime. Soto said his client did not lie about his entry into the country and was not involved in the Cuba bombings.

In El Paso, three Cuban exiles from Miami -- José Pujol, Rubén López Castro and Ernesto Abreu -- have refused to testify. At least two of them, Pujol and López Castro, are facing prosecution.

The current Newark investigation has gained momentum as the FBI pieces together evidence -- including the fax allegedly sent by Posada listing suspected U.S. co-conspirators involved in the financing of the bombing campaign.

The government has stepped up its effort to keep Posada in detention because the federal judge in El Paso has set a Feb. 1 deadline for the Justice Department to demonstrate why he shouldn't be released in the United States, since he cannot be deported.

The reason: No country has offered to take him. Also, an immigration judge has ordered that he not be sent back to Cuba or Venezuela.

PROPAGANDA WEAPON

Castro and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez accuse Posada of masterminding the 1976 bombing attack that brought down a Cuban airliner, killing 73 people.

DOJ_NMG_0092917

Both leaders have used Posada as a propaganda weapon against the United States, which was embarrassed by his illegal entry into the country in the post-9/11 climate when antiterrorism defenses were supposed to be tighter. Castro and Chávez have accused federal officials of coddling a ``terrorist."

For his part, Posada has blamed Cuban agents for a 1990 assassination attempt in which he was shot in the jaw and chest in Guatemala.

The Justice Department's renewed Cuba bombing probe was challenging at first because the FBI had destroyed some documents, such as Western Union cables and other case records, in the fall of 2003 -- after obtaining approval from the U.S. attorney's office in Miami.

In the initial case, the Cuban government was cooperative with federal authorities. A team of FBI agents visited Cuban counterintelli- gence officials in June 1998. The Castro government said it shared information on the tourist bombing attacks and other alleged Cuban exile terrorism activities during the 1990s.

1998 IMPASSE

Ultimately, Cuban officials refused to allow FBI agents to talk with witnesses or suspects or to conduct forensic examinations of explosive materials recovered from the tourist-site bombings, according to federal authorities.

The final breakdown came in September 1998, when a federal grand jury in Miami indicted 10 Cuban agents on charges of infiltrating South Florida to spy on the U.S. government and the Cuban-American community.

One of the key pieces of evidence in the current Cuba bombing investigation is the mysterious fax signed Solo.

The link between Posada and the fax was reported first in The Miami Herald on June 7, 1998. A New York Times article the following month said a Cuban-American businessman in Central America, Jorge "Tony" Alvarez, had discovered the fax in his office. Alvarez claimed it had been sent by Posada from El Salvador.

`A BIG SCANDAL'

The article also asserted that Posada acknowledged being the author of the fax, and an accompanying story quoted Posada as saying he was responsible for the bomb attacks at Cuban tourist sites, including the one that killed the Italian.

"We didn't want to hurt anybody," the story quoted Posada as saying. ``We just wanted to make a big scandal so that the tourists don't come anymore. We don't want any more foreign investment."

For investigators, Posada's statements amounted to a confession.

Last year, prosecutors from the U.S. attorney's office in Miami sent subpoenas to The New York Times and freelance writer Ann Louise Bardach, demanding the recordings and any other documents she might have that were connected to the interview. Lawyers sought to quash the subpoenas, and the government withdrew them.

In October, the grand jury in Newark issued a new subpoena to Bardach. She said her Miami lawyer is preparing a response to quash it.

Taken together, the fax, FBI witnesses and the tapes could be crucial pieces of evidence in indicting Posada.

In testimony to an immigration court in El Paso last year, Posada acknowledged that he had made those statements to Bardach -- but noted that he did not understand her questions and did not provide proper answers because his English was poor.

In the end, the Cuban government arrested several of the bombers.

And over the next decade, the tourism industry was far from disrupted. Travel to Cuba became all the more popular, with experts estimating the total number of visitors doubling to more than two million last year.

FBI Destroyed Evidence As 'Routine' Matter (MH)

By Jay Weaver And Alfonso Chardy

The Miami Herald, November 12, 2006

A renewed federal investigation launched after Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles sneaked into the country last year posed a serious challenge at first because the FBI's Miami office had destroyed crucial evidence in the fall of 2003.

The evidence was part of a previous investigation of bomb attacks against Cuban tourist sites in 1997. Destroyed documents included Western Union cables and money wire transfers.

DOJ_NMG_0092918

The Atlantic Monthly, in an article in its November issue, suggested the FBI destroyed the evidence to shield Posada from criminal prosecution and avoid angering the Cuban exile community where some view him as a patriot.

The FBI confirmed to The Miami Herald that some case records were destroyed but denied there were any irregularities.

Officials portrayed the destruction as a routine administrative procedure after the U.S. attorney's office closed the case in August 2003 because of lack of progress in the investigation.

"We routinely destroy evidence in cases that have been closed," said FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela, noting the agency needed to make room for other records in its evidence room at the time.

She added that the FBI has been able to rebuild the body of evidence in the Cuba bombing probe, which targets Posada.

Hector Pesquera, who was special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami field office in 2003, said that any suggestion he sought to protect Posada from prosecution was ``preposterous."

Said Pesquera: ``That's not the way this office works or any other law enforcement office works for that matter."

Guy Lewis, who served as the U.S. attorney in Miami during part of the Cuba bombing case, said such a claim was ``B.S."

Why The FBI Is Coming After Me (WP)

By Ann Louise Bardach

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

As a rule, I don't believe in conspiracy theories. They tend to be tidy and selective, whereas life seems so random and messy. But the case of Cuban militant and would-be Fidel Castro assassin Luis Posada Carriles has sorely tested my convictions.

I've been writing about Posada for nearly a decade. I interviewed him in Aruba for a series of articles in the New York Times in 1998. He was a fugitive who had escaped from Venezuela in 1985 while awaiting trial in the 1976 bombing of a Cuban passenger plane that killed all 73 people aboard-- the first deadly act of airline terrorism in the Americas. Posada has maintained his innocence, but in a rare instance of unanimity, the CIA and the FBI, as well as Venezuelan, Trinidadian and Cuban intelligence, concluded that he and fellow militant Orlando Bosch had masterminded the bombing.

Last year, I wrote an Outlook article about Posada's surprise arrival in Miami, where he filed a claim for political asylum. Not only did this move strike many as brazen, but it also seemed incomprehensible that the Bush administration, so committed to what it calls the War on Terror, could have allowed someone of Posada's notoriety to slip into the country.

Soon after, Homeland Security Department officials got around to arresting Posada and charging him with illegal entry. I assumed that the Justice Department would act on his self-admitted history of paramilitary attacks and extradite him somewhere, and that I'd just continue to cover his case. Instead, the government has dithered for a year and a half while Posada languishes in an immigration jail in Texas.

And I, meanwhile, have found myself an unwitting player in the tangled drama of the United States and Luis Posada.

Not long after Posada's arrest, FBI and Homeland Security agents began to phone me, seeking information about the New York Times series. One agent came right out and asked if I'd share my research materials -- as well as my copies of FBI and CIA files on Posada. "Do us a favor," he said. "We can't find ours." I laughed politely, assuming it was a strained attempt at humor. But he wasn't kidding.

In August 2003, the Miami bureau of the FBI made the startling decision to close its case on Posada. Subsequently, according to FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela, several boxes of evidence were removed from the bureau's evidence room, or the "bulky," as it is known. Among the documents that disappeared was the original signed fax that Posada had sent to collaborators in Guatemala in 1997, complaining of the U.S. media's reluctance to believe reports about a series of bombings in Cuba, which he hoped would scare tourists and investors away from Castro's island.

I had shown Posada a copy of this fax during my interviews with him. The fax had been intercepted by Antonio Alvarez, a Cuban exile and businessman who had shared office space with Posada in Guatemala in 1997. Alarmed, Alvarez had notified agents from the FBI's Miami bureau, but when they took no action, he had turned to the Times.

DOJ_NMG_0092919

"If there is no publicity, the job is useless," Posada wrote in the fax. "The American newspapers publish nothing that has not been confirmed. I need all the data from the [bombing of the] discotheque in order to try to confirm it." It was signed "Solo," his nom de guerre.

Posada fretted to me that the fax could cause him problems with the FBI. But he had no need to worry.

H?ctor Pesquera, the special agent in charge of the Miami FBI bureau at the time, showed little interest in Posada's case. To his agents' distress, he enjoyed socializing with Miami's hard-line exile politicians, and denied agents' requests for wiretaps on Bosch, known as the godfather of the paramilitary groups, as well as other militants suspected of ongoing criminal activity. Pesquera shuttered investigations into exile militants, agents say, before retiring in December 2003.

Without the materials that were removed from the evidence room, which also included cables and money transfers between Posada and his collaborators in the Cuban bombings, a criminal prosecution of Posada is severely hobbled. Orihuela, the FBI spokeswoman, explained that "the supervisory agent in charge and someone from the U.S. attorney's office would have had to sign off" before evidence is removed and destroyed. She confirmed that the approval to dispose of the evidence was given by the case agent on Posada, who happened to be Ed Pesquera -- H?ctor's son.

Though Posada's case was reopened in May 2005 and is now pending, the decision to close it in the first place baffled many longtime FBI and Miami Dade police investigators. Rarely had Posada been more active. In addition to the Cuban bombing campaign, he and three comrades had been arrested in Panama in 2000 in connection with an attempt to assassinate Castro.

In late April last year, while I was out at the hair salon, my husband phoned to tell me that two Department of Homeland Security agents had arrived at my home in Santa Barbara, Calif., to serve me with a subpoena. I told him to ask the agents to leave and refer their inquiries to the Times. Eventually, they served the Times' lawyers. Over the next few months, a dance played out in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida. After the Times filed its motion to quash the subpoena, the Justice Department withdrew it in August 2005.

Later, while I was working on an article about Posada for the current issue of the Atlantic Monthly, one of his attorneys told me that Posada's case "is being handled at the highest levels" of the Justice Department. All they have to do to detain Posada indefinitely, he explained, is to have Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales certify him as a national security threat. "But they're not going to do that," he added. "That would create problems for the Bush people with their Cuban-exile base in Miami." In other words, the government does not want to mount its own case -- and risk alienating Cuban American allies. Better it should get reporters to build its case.

On Sept. 11, the Justice Department whirled into action, perhaps emboldened by the symbolism of the date. It struck a plea deal for about two years in prison for Posada's comrades Santiago Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, who had been facing up to 50 years in prison for the illegal possession of hundreds of firearms. On the same day, a magistrate judge in El Paso recommended that Posada be released, as Justice had yet to file charges. (On Nov. 3, the presiding judge gave the government 90 days to make its case.) And later that afternoon, a Justice lawyer called the Times and said that another subpoena would be issued for materials relating to Posada.

On Oct. 6, the 30th anniversary of the bombing of the Cuban plane (you have to give them credit for timing), I received a new subpoena. This one, issued by a federal grand jury in Newark, was requested by Gonzales. They may be ambivalent about the war on terrorism over at the Justice Department, but you can't question their dedication to their war against the Fourth Estate. For my part, it raised a peculiar pickle: contemplating how far one should go to protect the civil liberties of an accused terrorist.

My case, thankfully, does not involve confidential sources. And both the law according to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, where the case is pending, and the Justice Department's own guidelines are clear: Prosecutors cannot compel reporters to turn over information that they can obtain through other means. Only after other avenues have been pursued should the government turn to the media to build a prosecution.

Call me a strict constructionist, but somehow I do not believe that our founding fathers meant to allow the government to raid the news media for their work files after it bungles a case and destroys crucial evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0092920

The Justice Department's new subpoena says that it wants only the tape recordings from my interview with Posada. Aside from the huge intrusion and inconvenience of searching through about 15 years' worth of research materials, the entire ordeal strikes me as a waste of time.

Posada agreed to meet with me because he wanted to publicize his efforts to topple Castro. I recorded as much as possible in the event that Posada may later have regrets. Which he did. But over the two days I spent with him, he revealed a good deal about his various bombing campaigns and his general philosophy.

My coauthor Larry Rohter, Times editors and I picked out the strongest and most interesting parts of the transcripts and notes for our stories. Contrary to what the great minds at Justice may think, we don't hold back the best bits -- we publish them. And just last month, the Atlantic published on its Web site Posada's notes to me, in which he offered editorial guidance -- "He does not admit the bombs in the hotels, but he does not deny either," he wrote.

The FBI and the Justice Department are filled with dedicated public servants, but it is the political appointees who make the final decisions. And for them, Posada may be a man who knows too much. His attorneys say that he was a paid CIA agent from 1959 until the mid-1980s. Indeed, upon his "escape" from prison in 1985, Posada promptly found employment running the Iran-contra field operation in El Salvador. Bosch, his co-defendant in the Cuban plane bombing, was championed by none other than Jeb Bush in his bid for U.S. residency, which was granted in 1991 by President George H.W. Bush over the objections of the FBI, the CIA and the Justice Department.

And there are other thorny details in this case. The Miami-Dade Police Department's liaison to the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force has been a well-regarded detective named Luis Crespo Jr. -- who is the son of Luis Crespo, one of the most famous anti-Castro militants, known as El Gancho, or The Hook, because of the hand he lost to an ill-timed bomb.

Working alongside Crespo Jr. is detective H?ctor Alfonso, whose father is also a legendary anti-Castro militant, known as H?ctor Fabian. Assigned to the MDPD intelligence unit, Alfonso's son has access to the most sensitive information on homeland defense, including on Cuban exile militants. "Say you had a tip for the FBI about a bombing," muses D.C. Diaz, a 27-year department veteran. "Would you want to give it to a guy whose father is Luis Crespo?"

Before the government starts tampering with the Constitution's protections of the press, it needs to do some housecleaning. A good start would be a special prosecutor to look into who ordered the removal of the Posada evidence, and why. If it then decides that it wants to go further, it might peruse the 45 years' worth of CIA and FBI files on Posada that detail his paramilitary career. And there are a dozen or so comrades of Posada's in Miami and New Jersey who know a great deal more than I do.

But that's assuming that the government wants to prosecute Posada. It has declined to do so for decades. And nothing so far suggests that it is inclined to start now.

bardachreports@aol.com

Ann Louise Bardach is the author of "Cuba Confidential" (Vintage) and the editor of "Prison Letters of Fidel Castro," forthcoming from Avalon in February.

Suspects' Treatment Secret (FREEP/MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg, Mcclatchy Newspapers

Detroit Free Press, November 12, 2006

It's a national security issue, CIA says

The CIA is still trying to impose secrecy around 14 top Al Qaeda suspects now held at the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detention center, including an alleged 9/11 mastermind, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed.

The arena for the effort is the U.S. District Court of Judge Reggie Walton in Washington, D.C., where the government is seeking a still-undefined restriction on the attorney-client relationship in the case of Majid Khan, one of the 14.

The CIA argues that details of the man's three years of detention and interrogation at so-called black sites -- out of reach of the International Red Cross -- are national security secrets.

Khan's attorney, Gita Gutierrez, argues that the Bush administration's intent is not to safeguard national security but to cover up three years of extrajudicial detention of her client -- to "conceal illegal or embarrassing executive conduct."

DOJ_NMG_0092921

Khan, 26, was captured in his native Pakistan in 2003. The White House says he's linked to unsuccessful plots to blow up gas stations in the United States, poison U.S. water supplies and assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

It's not known where he was held or how he was interrogated to establish these links. He hasn't been charged with a crime.

At least some of the 14 men whom President George W. Bush ordered handed over to the military this summer were reportedly submitted to harsh, classified interrogation techniques, including simulated drownings -- known as water-boarding -- to break their will.

Court documents filed by the government suggest that the 14 newest arrivals at Guantanamo, among them alleged Osama bin Laden deputies, would never be integrated into the general population of more than 430 captives, for fear they would talk about their secret confinement to other captives, who could, in turn, pass on the details to their lawyers.

In seeking to redefine attorney-client contacts, Justice Department lawyers offered a seven-page affidavit from CIA officer Marilyn Dorn, who describes herself as "the information review officer for the National Clandestine Service."

Dorn's office, she said, decides what secret CIA documents can be provided to civilian U.S. courts without jeopardizing "CIA interests, personnel or facilities."

Because Khan was held for three years in a "top secret" program, she says, "he may have come into possession of information, including locations of detention, conditions of detention and alternative interrogation techniques."

Attorney disclosure in court records of those details, she argues, could compromise clandestine relationships between the United States and its foreign allies.

All civilian lawyers at the Guantanamo naval base already go through a security screening before they're allowed to visit. Then they must turn over their notes to the military before they can leave the base. They can disclose their contents only by permission of a classification review team set up by the federal courts.

Now the CIA seeks a more restrictive review and disclosure process whose "particulars ... are still being worked out," said Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist.

She couldn't say whether the government will again propose to eavesdrop on attorney-client meetings, which a court refused to grant three years ago.

The Khan case also illustrates the ongoing Bush administration effort to curb civilian court intrusion at Guantanamo, a process that has evolved fitfully around two years of court rulings on detainee rights.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Frustration Grows At Carousel As More Baggage Goes Astray (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

ATLANTA, Nov. 6 — Since Aug. 10, when a ban on most carry-on liquids sent the amount of checked luggage soaring, airlines have been misplacing many more bags, and the fumbling could well escalate during the busy holiday travel season.

The Transportation Department reported that 107,731 more fliers had their bags go missing in August than they did a year earlier, a 33 percent increase. It got worse in September, with 183,234 more passengers suffering mishandled bags than a year earlier, up 92 percent.

Globally, about 30 million bags are mishandled each year, according to SITA, a company that sells software to airlines and airports for baggage and other systems. Airlines spend about $2.5 billion to find those bags and deliver them to waiting, often angry, passengers.

All but about 200,000 bags are eventually reunited with their owners each year — a number that sounds pretty high on its own, but that represents less than 1 percent of the billions of bags that are checked annually.

Efforts are under way to fix two of the worst baggage operations in the United States — at US Airways in Philadelphia and at Atlantic Southeast Airlines, which operates as Delta Connection here. Both airlines had scrimped on workers and equipment at these airports. But it is far from certain whether these hubs will be running smoothly by Thanksgiving.

DOJ_NMG_0092922

Because of the relatively primitive technology used by airlines to track baggage, passengers typically only learn that their luggage missed their flight after a futile wait at the carousel. Then, travelers must hunt down baggage agents, fill out forms, and wait for hours or even days for someone, often unannounced, to deliver their bags.

Rhoda Frank of Chicago took her 12-year-old granddaughter, Bronwyn, to Manitoba last month for a vacation in which they hoped to see polar bears. Bronwyn flew on United Airlines from Raleigh, N.C., to meet her grandmother in Chicago, but her bag stayed behind.

The flight to Manitoba was not until the next morning, and United told Mrs. Frank the bag would be delivered by midnight. "It didn't come," she said. They flew north anyway, without Bronwyn's long underwear or down jacket. The bag finally arrived, just before it was time to come home. In the meantime, "I scrounged for clothing," Mrs. Frank said.

Airlines were generally misplacing slightly fewer bags this year until Aug. 10, when authorities in London foiled a plot to blow up airliners using liquid explosives mixed onboard. The liquids ban led to a roughly 25 percent increase in checked bags, which stressed some baggage operations.

Many of the bag-handling problems are because of the industry's cost-cutting.

US Airways, twice in bankruptcy since Sept. 11, 2001, and then merged a year ago with America West Airlines, had a baggage meltdown at its Philadelphia hub around Christmas of 2004. Executives said they had known they needed to add people and equipment there. Some of that occurred. And through July of this year, fewer bags were going missing.

But with the surge of checked bags in August, the hub's bag-handling performance began "backsliding," said J. Scott Kirby, president of the airline. "A lot of balls in the air with the merger," he said. "This one didn't get done as well as it should have."

Crews at Philadelphia, for instance, were short of equipment and fighting over the tractors — known as tugs — that they use to pull baggage carts.

"There's a real lack of organization on the ramp in Philadelphia," he added, where three-to-four times as many bags are misplaced as at other US Airways hubs.

US Airways is hiring 190 additional workers and 60 managers to fix the bag mess. The company is also buying more tractors, but is still about 40 short of its needs.

"We're not going to fix the thing overnight," Mr. Kirby said.

Regional carriers have been the fastest-growing part of the airline business in recent years, as they started flying some of the short routes abandoned by big carriers like Delta Air Lines. For example, Atlantic Southeast — which Delta sold last year to SkyWest, but which still operates as Delta Connection — carried twice as many passengers in 2005, 12 million, as in 2000.

When it was owned by Delta, which is operating under bankruptcy court protection, Southeast was denied the tractors, carts, computers and people it needed to keep up with its baggage — in Atlanta 30,000 pieces a day now. "When Delta sold us Atlantic Southeast, part of the reason was for us to fix some things," said Jerry C. Atkin, SkyWest's chief executive.

But over the last year, Atlantic Southeast has showed only modest improvement, remaining the worst bag handler in the Transportation Department's rankings. And then in August its performance deteriorated again. Delta began complaining directly to Mr. Atkin, who installed new managers and agreed to hire 300 more ground workers and double Atlantic Southeast's fleet of carts to carry baggage, among other equipment purchases.

"I got tired of being embarrassed by the numbers," Mr. Atkin said. Now, he added, "there are some good people who have put their jobs on the line to fix things."

One of them is Walt Kaurin, the new baggage performance manager, whose leathery skin shows his 24 years working outside on the ramp for Atlantic Southeast. Told of Mr. Atkin's remark, Mr. Kaurin grimaced, explained his initial reluctance to become a manager, then, adopting a smile, said, "I was pretty confident we could fix it."

It will take time. October mishandled bag numbers, not yet released by the Transportation Department, will again be poor for Atlantic Southeast, said Joe Kolshak, an executive vice president at Delta, whose own bag performance is highly dependent on the regional carrier.

Getting those 300 new hires up to speed will not be easy. "They're minimum wage in many cases," Mr. Kolshak said. "And there's high turnover."

DOJ_NMG_0092923

Financial problems have slowed industry investment in technology that could improve bag handling. Radio frequency identification tags, in wide use among retailers to track inventory, would allow airlines to easily know if a bag did not make a flight. Then, the passenger could be warned via text messaging not to waste time at the carousel, and to call to arrange a delivery.

Not waiting for airlines, McCarran International Airport in Las Vegas is installing radio frequency readers and tagging all outgoing luggage. The tags cost about 20 cents each, but are worth it to a city that relies so heavily on tourists.

"If they have a bad travel experience, they'll look at each other and say, 'Wow, we don't want to do that again,' " said Samuel Ingalls, assistant director of aviation.

Meanwhile, airlines can hope more travelers adopt the Zen thinking of Pamela Ingram, a Binghamton, N.Y., consultant who travels five days a week. She checks her bags, fearlessly. In the rare instances — once this year — of a tardy bag, she happily makes do.

"I got to go to my meeting in jeans," Ms. Ingram said. "You can't travel this much and expect everything to go right."

WAR NEWS:

Panel May Have Few Good Options To Offer (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

After meeting with President Bush tomorrow, a panel of prestigious Americans will begin deliberations to chart a new course on Iraq, with the goal of stabilizing the country with a different U.S. strategy and possibly the withdrawal of troops.

Tuesday's dramatic election results, widely seen as a repudiation of the Bush Iraq policy, has thrust the 10-member, bipartisan Iraq Study Group into the kind of special role played by the Sept. 11 commission. This panel, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D), might play a decisive role in reshaping the U.S. position in Iraq, according to lawmakers and administration officials.

Those familiar with the panel's work predict that the ultimate recommendations will not appear novel and that there are few, if any, good options left facing the country. Many of the ideas reportedly being considered -- more aggressive regional diplomacy with Syria and Iran, greater emphasis on training Iraqi troops, or focusing on a new political deal between warring Shiites and Sunni -- have either been tried or have limited chances of success, in the view of many experts on Iraq. Baker is also exploring whether a broader U.S. initiative in tackling the Arab-Israeli conflict is needed to help stabilize the region.

Given the grave predicament the group faces, its focus is now as much on finding a political solution for the United States as on a plan that would bring peace to Iraq. With Republicans and Democrats so bitterly divided over the war, Baker and Hamilton believe that it is key that their group produce a consensus plan, according to those who have spoken with them.

That could appeal to both parties. Democrats would have something to support after a campaign in which they criticized Bush's Iraq policy without offering many specifics of their own. And with support for its Iraq policy fast evaporating even within its own party, the White House might find in the group's plan either a politically acceptable exit strategy or a cover for a continued effort to prop up the new democratically-elected government in Baghdad.

"Baker's objectives for the Iraq Study Group are grounded in his conviction that Iraq is the central foreign policy issue confronting the United States, and that the only way to address that issue successfully is to first build a bipartisan consensus," said Arnold Kanter, who served as undersecretary of state under Baker during George H.W. Bush's administration.

But the midterm elections may have made the job even tougher by emboldening panel Democrats, said people familiar with the panel's deliberations. The elections "sent a huge signal," said one of these sources, who added that the panel is trying to come to grips with whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government has the capacity to solve the country's problems.

While Baker has been testing the waters for some time to determine how much change in Iraq policy will be tolerated by the White House, Hamilton perhaps faces the now even-more-difficult challenge of cajoling Democrats such as former Clinton administration chief of staff Leon E. Panetta and power broker Vernon E. Jordan Jr. to sign on to a plan that falls short of a phased troop withdrawal, the position of many congressional Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0092924

In a brief interview, Hamilton conceded the obstacles ahead and emphasized that no decisions have been made. "We need to get [the report] drafted, number one," Hamilton said. "We need to reach agreement, and that may not be possible."

When it was formed in the spring by Congress, the Iraq Study Group was little known beyond the elite circles of the U.S. foreign policy world. Now its work has become perhaps the most eagerly awaited Washington report in many years -- recommendations are expected in early December -- with many lawmakers of both parties saying they are looking for answers to the troubled U.S. mission in Iraq.

"I can only be hopeful that they'll have a positive solution," Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who is likely to become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said in an interview Friday. Asked if he thought it was possible for the panel to please both the president and congressional Democrats, Skelton turned the question around, saying: "I wonder if the White House will not use them as a face-saving device."

Indeed, the White House, which had been skeptical that the group will have much new to say, has notably been more receptive since the elections. "If these recommendations help bring greater consensus for Republicans and Democrats, I think that could be very helpful," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to Bush. But he added: "If there were a rifle-shot solution, we would have already pulled the trigger."

Bush, Vice President Cheney and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley will meet with members of the commission tomorrow. During three days of deliberations, the panel will also hear, via video link, from British Prime Minister Tony Blair -- who, one source said, has been anxious to talk to the panel -- as well as consult with members of the Democratic shadow foreign-policy cabinet, including former secretary of state Madeleine K. Albright, former ambassador to the United Nations Richard C. Holbrooke and former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger.

While Hamilton's role may be growing as a result of Tuesday's elections, it is Baker who has been the dominant force in the panel's work so far, according to people involved. And it is Baker whose special connection to the Bush family -- he was the closest political associate of then-President George H. W. Bush -- has invited fevered speculation that he is maneuvering to save the Bush presidency from the disaster unfolding in Iraq.

Baker, who did not respond to an interview request, has publicly expressed skepticism about George W. Bush's ambition of transforming Iraq into a democratic beacon of change for the entire Middle East. Speaking at Princeton University, his alma mater, in April, shortly after the study group was formed, Baker said, "We ought not to think we're going to see a flowering of Jeffersonian democracy along the banks of the Euphrates," according to the Daily Princetonian.

Baker has offered other pointed critiques of the Bush administration's Iraq policy in recent months, during appearances aimed partly at selling his new memoir. In television and other interviews, Baker has made clear his desire to chart a middle road between the Bush administration's policy and what he regards as premature withdrawal from Iraq. "He's a pragmatist, a realist," said a Baker colleague, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the insistence on secrecy surrounding the panel's work. "He believes in America's moral values, but he also believes in trying to keep an essential balance with national security interests. When the pendulum swings too much one way or the other, we get into trouble."

Though Hamilton had a hand in selecting the Democrats on the group, its makeup reflects Baker's pragmatic, centrist approach to foreign policy. Few of its 10 members are true foreign policy experts. Rather, it is a classic Washington blue-ribbon commission, a group of "old hands" steeped in the ways of the capital -- two former secretaries of state (Baker and Lawrence S. Eagleburger), two former senators (Republican Alan K. Simpson and Democrat Charles S. Robb), a former defense secretary (William J. Perry) and a former Supreme Court justice, (Sandra Day O'Connor).

Within the panel, staffers and expert consultants have waged warfare by memo as idealists argue with pragmatists over particulars: Retired CIA officer Ray Close complained in one such memo that the deliberations "had degenerated into petty squabbling" and accused "obstinate neocon diehards" of trying to fashion a "stay the course" strategy.

With the assistance of the U.S. Institute of Peace and other Washington think tanks, panel members have heard testimony from a wide range of administration officials and outside experts, and have traveled to Iraq for several days of interviews with senior U.S. diplomats and military officials, as well as Iraqi leaders. Baker, who seems intrigued by the idea of gaining greater assistance in Iraq from U.S. adversaries, had a three-hour dinner in New York with Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations. Zarif hosted the dinner at his elegant ambassador's residence.

DOJ_NMG_0092925

Baker made clear that he was not negotiating for the United States but that the commission wanted Iran's input and suggestions. He specifically asked about the possibilities for cooperation between Tehran and Washington on Iraq, according to Iranian sources.

Such contacts have invited skepticism from some of the prominent neoconservatives who strongly pushed the invasion of Iraq but have come to be critical of the administration for not aggressively striving for military victory. They said the notion that Iran would help the United States out of its troubles in Iraq is ludicrous.

"There's no doubt that the majority of the people in this group, either as advisers or principals, either opposed the war or forgot that they were in favor of it," said Reuel Marc Gerecht, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute who was one of several dozen official expert advisers to the Baker-Hamilton group.

However, Gerecht and William Kristol, the editor of the Weekly Standard, said they believe their views received a respectful hearing from the panel. Kristol related a curious anecdote from his September appearance before the panel to promote a plan to provide more troops for security in Baghdad and elsewhere.

Then-panel member Robert M. Gates -- who quit the group Friday after Bush nominated him as defense secretary -- asked Kristol why he thought the president was so determined to stick with Donald H. Rumsfeld as the Pentagon chief.

Kristol replied that he was mystified -- at which point, as he recalled it, Baker interjected with the comment, "Well, you can't expect the president to do anything until after the election."

Staff writers Robin Wright, Walter Pincus, Glenn Kessler and Dan Eggen contributed to this report. Ricks, the author of "Fiasco," a book on the Bush administration's policy in Iraq, appeared before the study group at its members' request to answer questions about his book.

Blair To Address Iraq Study Group (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 11 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair will speak via video link with officials from the Iraq Study Group on Tuesday to discuss "U.K. ideas on Iraq and the Middle East," a Blair spokeswoman said Saturday.

The spokeswoman declined to detail what Blair would say to the bipartisan U.S. panel, which is chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana.

The panel, which is expected to make recommendations on Iraq policy by the end of the year, is widely seen as having the respect of the Bush administration and Democrats, who regained control of both houses of Congress in Tuesday's midterm elections.

Blair has been President Bush's chief foreign ally in the conflict and has nearly a decade's experience dealing with Middle East issues.

The Guardian newspaper on Saturday reported that Blair would urge the panel to push the Bush administration to begin talks with Syria and Iran to persuade those two countries to become more involved in finding a solution to the situation in Iraq.

The newspaper also reported that Blair would press Baker and Hamilton to recommend that any solution in Iraq depends on the United States making a "reenergized push for peace in the Palestinian-Israeli conflict."

The Blair spokeswoman, speaking on the condition of anonymity, as is customary here, called the newspaper's report "speculation."

But Blair has expressed similar sentiments in the past, and analysts here said his view that Syria could play a constructive role in Iraq diverges from the U.S. position.

The Bush administration has been reluctant to discuss Iraq with Iran and Syria, which administration officials widely regard as supporters of terrorism and obstacles to establishing a democratic government in Iraq.

Blair sent a top-level envoy, Nigel Sheinwald, to Damascus, the Syrian capital, this month to meet with high-level officials. Blair officials have declined to discuss the details of Sheinwald's visit, including whether he met with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

DOJ_NMG_0092926

A Blair spokesman said only that Syria has a "key relationship" with Iraq and that Syria "faced a choice: It can play a constructive role in international affairs or it can continue to support terrorism."

The Blair spokeswoman characterized the prime minister's conference with the Iraq Study Group as a "discussion" that would build on previous sessions the panel has held with lower-ranking British officials. She said she was unsure whether Blair or the panel had requested the discussion.

A Consensus On Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

WITH THE election over and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on his way out, both President Bush and leaders of the new Democratic congressional majority were talking about forging a bipartisan consensus on Iraq. But is consensus possible? The often polarized debate over the war, both before and during the campaign, might suggest that it's not. Yet a close look at what the White House and Democrats have been saying, along with what is emerging from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, offers grounds for some optimism. There is, in fact, a center to the war debate that offers the outlines of a way forward.

Start with what former Secretary of State James A. Baker III has said about the deliberations of the congressionally chartered study group, which will meet with Mr. Bush this week and deliver its report sometime after Thanksgiving. Judging from the public statements Mr. Baker has made so far, the panel won't propose an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, as the left wing of the Democratic Party favors. Nor will it endorse a U.S.-sponsored division of the country along ethnic lines, a proposal pushed in modified form by the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations committee, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.).

The group will, however, almost certainly endorse an idea long favored by Mr. Biden and many other Democrats: an attempt by the United States to find common ground on Iraq with its neighbors -- including Syria and Iran. Though the Bush administration has resisted such an initiative, the newly designated defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, is likely to favor it. Forging a stronger international consensus on stabilizing and reconstructing Iraq, perhaps by staging a multinational conference, is one major option the Bush administration hasn't tried.

Beyond these basic parameters, much current discussion about Iraq boils down to how the United States might induce Iraqi leaders, starting with the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, to negotiate compromises among warring Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, and to disarm ethnic militias. Some favor a peace conference like that which ended the Bosnian war; others want to announce timetables for U.S. troop withdrawals that they believe would force Iraqis to act. There are proposals for increasing aid to Iraqi reconstruction and linking it to progress on reconciliation or militia demobilization. The administration itself has been trying to get Mr. Maliki's agreement to an informal timetable for meeting certain benchmarks and threatening to curtail money for security forces if they don't reform.

What's clear from all this is that new steps could and should be taken to increase U.S. pressure for an Iraqi peace settlement. But a fresh strategy can't be limited to such measures. Both the Bush administration and Democrats must face the possibility that no amount of U.S. pushing will produce political results or diminish the violence in Baghdad, at least in the short term. For some time, Mr. Maliki and other Iraqis have been warning any American who will listen that the dynamics driving the war won't necessarily respond to timetables drawn up in Washington. If Iraq's civil war is like most others, the fighting might last years before a new order is established.

The United States needs a strategy for defending its own vital interests in that case. As it happens, Mr. Maliki has one to offer: In the last couple of weeks he has made clear that his government's priority is to gain full command over the Iraqi army the United States has been building and take the lead in fighting the Sunni-al-Qaeda insurgency. That means that U.S. troops could begin moving to a supporting role, backing up the Iraqi units with air power and rapid reaction forces. Rather than trying to pacify Baghdad and other cities -- an unwinnable battle in the near term -- more U.S. advisers would embed in Iraqi units, and the training and equipping of those units would be significantly stepped up.

Many Iraqis would welcome a U.S. policy aimed at letting the government and its army carry out the fight to stabilize the country while ensuring that it had the resources and support to prevail over time. That could be a course that Mr. Bush and the Democrats can agree on, as well.

Talking About Iraq (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0092927

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

You go to the polls, I hit the phones. Since the elections I've been burning my cellphone minutes trying to talk to every policy maker I could about how the elections are going to change Iraq policy. Here's what I've learned:

First, both parties are desperate to be substantially out of Iraq by 2008. Vietnam-haunted Democrats don't want to be saddled with the remains of the war if they retake the White House. Most Republicans don't want to wage another campaign under the Mesopotamian shadow. The president, however, is thinking about the decades-long struggle, not the next election, so the G.O.P. could be heading toward a blood feud between "Let's end this" Republicans and "Let's win this" Republicans, with the potential bitterness lasting for years.

Second, the elections have served as an intellectual release. Some within the Bush administration had been frustrated by the relative lack of freewheeling discussion as the situation in Iraq deteriorated. But that's certainly changed. Since I've been covering this administration, I've never heard such wildly divergent views from important advisers about where we are and what to do next. Some officials retain great faith in the Maliki government, others have very little. Meanwhile, in the Senate, there have been private conversations about forming bipartisan strategies, and an end to the campaign season freeze.

Third, the Baker-Hamilton commission may produce more peace in America than in Iraq. Essentially, the commission looks set to bring the two parties together by asking each to swallow a bitter pill. The administration will probably be asked to organize a regional conference, including Iran and Syria. This will be painful to some leading advisers, who think talking to Iran means abandoning the Bush doctrine (though others think a deal is possible and desirable).

The Democrats, for their part, could be asked to shelve calls for an imminent withdrawal. The Democratic Party is now divided between those, like John Murtha, who believe Iraq is unsalvageable and who want out, and those, like Joe Biden, who believe that with a change of policy it's still possible to head off full-scale disaster. The folks in the Murtha camp may squawk at the Baker-Hamilton emphasis, but the Democratic majority is not going to go McGovernite in the face of a bipartisan commission.

The fourth lesson is that events in Iraq are moving more quickly than adjustments in Washington. To put it bluntly, the era of the Green Zone may be coming to an end. That's in part because the Iraqi government is stumbling. Visitors to Baghdad have been surprised by the lack of urgency many Iraqi leaders seem to feel in the face of national disintegration.

But it's also because the country is segmenting organically. According to the U.N., 365,000 Iraqis have fled their homes and communities since the bombing of the mosque in Samarra in February, and more than 50,000 are retreating to their sectarian homelands every month. According to Senator Jack Reed, "the generals are feeling the pressure of the growing fragmentation of the country."

The upshot is that while oil revenues have to be divvied up from the center, fewer Americans in Washington believe there is much hope for a strong, functioning central government in Baghdad. (America's representatives in Baghdad may disagree.) The whole debate is moving in the direction of decentralization and federalism. And the real question is not whether the center will give way to the regions, it's whether Iraqi society is so atomized that the regions too are ungovernable.

The folks in the Bush administration have a reputation for stubbornly staying the course. In fact, the Bush staffers are producing more churn and fresh thinking than anyone gives them credit for. And today, the most radical thinking is within the administration. One official described a future U.S. role that sounds less like a normal fight against an enemy and more, to use my metaphor, like an effort to corral six violent tigers who are constantly having feral cubs. The trick is to carefully define American interests in the midst of this chaos, the official said, and to focus on the tasks that directly impinge on those interests.

In every call I made last week, I heard anguish, open-mindedness and a genuine desire to put aside partisan feuds. Most of all, I heard Democrats and Republicans who know a lot about Iraq, and who are honest about the grim reality, but who haven't totally given in to the hopelessness that is so fashionable everywhere else.

Right Vision, Wrong Policy -- And A Mideast Price To Pay (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092928

President Bush lost more than a midterm election and a cantankerous defense secretary last week. He also abandoned any lingering chance of remaking U.S. foreign policy into a radical force for democratic change in the Middle East and elsewhere.

He had to. The American electorate showed emphatically that it had lost faith in his party and his promises. Bush's refreshing generic denunciations of foreign dictators -- including those who played ball with Washington -- could not make up for his failure to produce positive visible results to support the rhetoric. He needed an immediate firebreak, and so he named Bob Gates to replace Don Rumsfeld at the Pentagon.

History's seemingly unlimited store of irony now makes Bush 43 the evident instrument of the resurgence of the "realist" school of foreign policy so beloved of Bush 41 and so regularly scorned by this president -- until he turned to it for salvation in Iraq and elsewhere.

Many will revel in this turn, and there is rough familial justice at work: Only the incompetence and discord of the past three years could cause reasonable people to welcome back with applause policymakers who failed to anticipate and then opposed the breakup of the Soviet Union; who were not realistic enough to see, much less prevent, the Balkans from plunging into flames; and who "coddled dictators from Beijing to Baghdad," as the Democrats once accurately described the handiwork of Brent Scowcroft, Bob Gates and Jim Baker under Bush 41.

So hold the champagne and cheers for the return of "realism," a word that has even less meaning than most of the labels that politicians, journalists and academics attach to schools of foreign policy. It is too often a euphemism for cynicism, for playing for time and for passing up big opportunities that carry high risks and potentially great rewards. Bush 43 took such a risk in Iraq and now pays the price for failing to develop anything resembling a Plan B.

Replacing Rumsfeld's abrasiveness and his now-aborted designs for military transformation with the safe hands and bureaucratic blandness of Gates, an ex-CIA chief formed by the Cold War, may give the White House a chance to get control of an interagency process that went off the rails in Iraq. One of Rumsfeld's last internal victories was to block an effort by Josh Bolten, Bush's chief of staff, to bring Gen. David Petraeus into the White House to coordinate Iraq policy.

But the problems of Iraq are so deep today that improved policy coordination in Washington will not fix them. That will become even clearer in mid-December when the Iraq Study Group headed by Baker and Democrat Lee Hamilton is due to deliver its findings and recommendations and, in the process, provide Bush with a second firebreak from rising opposition to the war.

Baker is, in fact, the smartest political operator Washington has seen in the past three decades. So he is too clever to put much stock in abstractions such as "realism" or "Wilsonian" democracy. The clearest foreign policy achievements of the Bush 41 administration turned on Baker's relentless dealmaking, from the Madrid Middle East peace conference to German reunification and management of the consequences of the Soviet collapse in Eastern Europe.

But even Baker will have to struggle to keep the faux realism of conventional thinking on the Middle East from making the study group's report instantly irrelevant. There was a time when let's-pretend policies -- championing regional or international peace conferences doomed to go nowhere, or naming special U.S. envoys to give Arab rulers a bone to toss to their publics -- usefully bought time, even though they were anything but realistic for the long term.

For better and for worse, the invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq, Iran's quest for nuclear weapons, and the bloody breakdown of Israel's occupation of the Palestinians have accelerated a profound radicalization of the Middle East that had already been unleashed by the pressures of globalization. Trying to get back to the 1990s is another bridge to nowhere.

Baker-Hamilton will certainly recommend that the United States urgently develop the regional and international structures to guide change that Bush has neglected, and the president must act on that advice.

But Bush's going on the defensive does not mean that the radical positive changes he had hoped for cannot come about on their own, even if on a different timetable and with much greater costs than he ever imagined. True realism lies in recognizing that his diagnosis of a crumbling order in the Middle East was sound, even if his prescriptions were not.

Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 33 In Baghdad, As Police Search For 50 Kidnap Victims (AP)

By Qais al-Bashir

DOJ_NMG_0092929

AP, November 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a police recruiting center in Baghdad early Sunday, killing at least 33 people and wounding 56, police said.

Crowds of recruits were gathering outside the center in western Baghdad's Nissur Square when the bomber detonated explosives strapped to his body, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said.

He said the death toll was expected to rise because many of the injuries were extremely serious.

The attack was one of several on Sunday in the capital, where sectarian violence kills scores each week. Just south of the city, police were searching for gunmen who killed 10 Shiite travelers and kidnapped about 50 others Saturday night along a notoriously dangerous stretch of highway.

Earlier Sunday, a pair of roadside bombings targeting police patrols in Baghdad killed at least six civilians and wounded six others, said police Cap. Mohammed Abdul-Ghani.

A car bomb outside a market in Baghdad's primarily Shiite downtown Karradah killed at least one person and wounded five others, while a similar bomb killed two people and injured 13 in the mainly Sunni neighborhood of Radhwaniyah, Police 1st. Lt. Thaer Mahoud said.

Unknown gunmen also shot and killed police Brig. Abdul-Mutalib Hassan as he was leaving his Karradah home for work. Hassan had been head of a police unit in charge of registering vehicles that is widely seen as a source of corruption.

Five people were killed in drive by shootings in different parts of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. The victims included a teacher, taxi driver, laborer, truck driver and phone company worker, provincial police said.

Patrols were looking for the Sunni gunmen who ambushed a convoy of minibuses at a fake checkpoint near the volatile town of Latifiyah, about 20 miles south of Baghdad in the so-called Triangle of Death.

The gunmen murdered 10 Shiite passengers before taking their captives to an unknown location, said the spokesman, who asked that his name not be used because he wasn't authorized to speak to media.

A leading Shiite politician warned that local tribes had armed themselves and were headed to the area to join in the search, a move likely to set off even greater bloodshed.

In an address to parliament, Abdul-Karim al-Anzi said the kidnappers had worn Iraqi army uniforms. He complained that security forces were doing little to capture the hostages.

"We demand that the government take quick action to send troops there in order to know the fate of those kidnapped," al-Anzi said.

Along with those killed, five bodies -- all blindfolded and bound at the wrists and ankles -- had also been recovered in various parts of eastern Baghdad early Sunday, police said. All had been mutilated by torture, marking them as victims of death squads that regularly kidnap rivals from Iraq's Muslim Sunni and Shiite sects.

Three more bodies were pulled from the Tigris River in Suwayrah, 25 miles south of Baghdad, morgue official Maamoun al-Ajili said.

U.S. forces, meanwhile, said they detained 10 people suspected of having links to al-Qaida in a raid in Baghdad early Saturday.

The military said no one was killed or wounded in the raid, and that those detained were "associated with terrorists who are involved in the housing, movement and enabling of foreign fighters, to include the organization of suicide operations within Baghdad."

Iraqi Sunnis Kill 10 Shiites, Kidnap 50 Others (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- Sunni gunmen ambushed a convoy of minibuses Saturday night at a fake checkpoint on a highway south of Baghdad, killing 10 Shiite passengers and kidnapping about 50.

Across the country at least 52 other people were killed in violence or were found dead, five of them decapitated Iraqi soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0092930

Police said the mass kidnapping and killing was near Latifiyah, about 20 miles south of Baghdad in the so-called Triangle of Death.

Shiite Muslims, a minority in that district, have routinely come under attack from Sunni insurgents who control the territory. The highway passing through the region from Baghdad leads to Najaf, the holiest Shiite city in Iraq.

Shiite pilgrims have become a favorite target of Sunni gunmen, although it was not immediately known where the victims of Saturday night's assault were headed.

Sectarian revenge killings, many thought to involve police and Iraqi troops, have left morgues full across a wide swath of the country.

There were no reported deaths among America's 152,000 service men and women in Iraq on Saturday. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, oversaw a Veterans Day ceremony at which 75 members of the armed forces from 33 countries were sworn in as American citizens.

In Baghdad, eight people died and at least 38 were wounded when two bombs hidden under parked cars exploded among noontime shoppers in downtown Baghdad's Hafidh al-Qadhi square. Police and a medical workers said at least 38 others were injured in the explosion at the formerly bustling area on the eastern bank of the Tigris River.

A Slovak and Polish soldier were reported killed overnight by a roadside bomb. Slovakian defense ministry spokesman Vladimir Gemela said the two died when their vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb near Kut, 100 miles southeast of Baghdad where coalition troops have fought fighters with the Mahdi Army militia loyal to the radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The deaths marked the 18th among Polish troops and fourth among those from Slovakia, which has about 100 troops in Iraq operating jointly with the 900 Polish troops in the country.

Slovakia's Prime Minister Robert Fico has said his country will pull its troops out of Iraq in February.

Baghdad police 1st Lt. Thayer Mahmud said his men found 25 corpses dumped in several parts of the capital in the 24 hours from 6 p.m. Friday.

A Samarra police captain, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he feared retribution, said the city morgue had received the beheaded bodies five soldiers who were kidnapped last week in the Meshahda area, 20 miles north of the capital.

Sectarian Rifts Foretell Pitfalls Of Iraqi Troops' Taking Control (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

BAQUBA, Iraq — It did not take long for Col. Brian D. Jones to begin to have doubts about the new Iraqi commander.

The commander, Brig. Gen. Shakir Hulail Hussein al-Kaabi, was chosen this summer by the Shiite-led government in Baghdad to lead the Iraqi Army's Fifth Division in Diyala Province. Within weeks, General Shakir went to Colonel Jones with a roster of people he wanted to arrest.

On the list were the names of nearly every Sunni Arab sheik and political leader whom American officers had identified as crucial allies in their quest to persuade Sunnis to embrace the political process and turn against the powerful Sunni insurgent groups here.

"Where's the evidence?" Colonel Jones demanded of General Shakir. "Where's the proof? What makes us suspect these guys? None of that stuff exists."

To that, Colonel Jones recalled, the Iraqi commander replied simply, "I got this from Baghdad."

The incident was one of many that alarmed Colonel Jones, who just completed a yearlong tour as commander of American forces in Diyala. In the end, he said, he concluded that the Iraqi general's real ambition was to destroy the Sunni political movement here — possibly on orders from Baghdad.

"I believe this is a larger plan to make Diyala a Shia province, rather than a Sunni province," he said.

Diyala is known as "little Iraq," because of its volatile mix of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. With its lush groves of date palms and abundant oil reserves, it is emerging as a crucial strategic territory in the sectarian struggle now gripping the country.

Long a stronghold of the insurgency — Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, was killed in a house only miles from here — Diyala is now teeming with Shiite militiamen who have rushed in from Baghdad in recent months to protect the Shiite population from attacks. Once considered by American officials to be relatively pacified, it has become a cauldron of violence carried out by insurgents and militias, intensified by sectarian-influenced security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0092931

As pressures for a phased United States withdrawal build, the experiences of American commanders over the past year in Diyala provide a window on the possible consequences of ceding authority to the Iraqi Army.

And with the civilian homicide rate in Diyala now running at about 10 killings a day, according to United States officials, compared with 4 a day in April, the commanders' experiences form a cautionary tale.

In July, the United States turned over "lead responsibility" for security in Diyala to the Iraqi Fifth Army Division. But within months, facing heavy violence and evidence of sectarian activities by the Iraqi Army, American commanders shelved plans to turn over full operational control of the Fifth Division to the Iraqi government on Oct. 1. "Recent operations conducted by the Fifth Iraqi Army seem to be focused strictly on the Sunnis," said Maj. Gen. Benjamin R. Mixon, division commander for northern Iraq.

American commanders are now hoping for a spring transfer of control, General Mixon said, adding that they are conducting a wide-ranging investigation into allegations of death squad involvement and other activities by the Fifth Division under General Shakir. The Iraqi general denies treating Sunnis unfairly and says he has no knowledge of death squads in Diyala. "We don't favor one side," he said.

General Mixon said: "He's either failing to supervise closely enough to know what's going on, or he's directly involved in it. One or the other. There can't be any in between."

A Contagion of Violence

Much of Baquba, a provincial capital of 400,000, is now dusty and lifeless, with boarded-up stores and charred wrecks of cars and trucks strewn about.

"Baquba is a dead city, controlled by Al Qaeda," said Sameerah Shibli, a Diyala journalist. "They stop all life."

Security has sharply deteriorated in this province of 1.4 million people in the past year, for reasons that go well beyond the sphere of General Shakir. The sectarian violence that exploded in Baghdad, after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, has spread like a contagion to other regions.

Shiite death squads in Baghdad have forced many Sunnis to flee to Baquba, 35 miles to the north, where some have joined the insurgency and have begun attacking Shiites.

"The Sunni have driven the Shia out of Baquba," said Lt. Col. Thomas Fisher, commander of the 1-68 Combined Arms Battalion, which left Baquba in early November after a yearlong deployment. "They have come from Baghdad, driven out by Shiites there."

Many Shiites are completing the circle, he said, fleeing to Baghdad or farther south.

Sunnis in Baquba now slaughter Shiites simply to avenge the killings of Sunnis in Baghdad, said Baquba's mayor, Khalid al-Sinjari, a Sunni. "They kill in Baghdad, we kill in Baquba," he said.

But now the Shiites also kill in Baquba. The Mahdi Army, a militia allied with the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, has 6,000 to 8,000 members in Diyala, said Ali Khazim al-Hamdan, an official in Mr. Sadr's Diyala political office. That includes social service workers as well as armed fighters, mostly in the cities of Muqdadiya, about 25 miles northeast of Baquba, and Khan Bani Saad, 12 miles south of Baquba, where the threats are greatest, he said.

"Their goal is to protect Shia in Diyala," he said. "If my brothers are killed, we have to react to that."

The growing militia presence combined with the sectarian turn by Iraqi commanders will increasingly leave the Sunnis with only one source of protection, Colonel Jones said: terrorist groups like Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and Ansar al-Sunna.

"We are really painting them into a box here," he said. "If you want to have a fight for the next 20 years, it's here. I can't imagine anybody who has seen war who wants that to happen. It's the innocents, it's these farmers out here, it's these kids who pay the price. But these interests are colliding and they don't care about that. Power is what they're going after, consolidated and uncontested political power."

"I think the sectarian war is coming this way," he added.

Sectarian Harassment

DOJ_NMG_0092932

Despite a population that is 50 percent Sunni Arab, Diyala has a Shiite-dominated government, because many Sunnis boycotted provincial elections last year. Now, much of the provincial police leadership appears to be allied with Shiite militias, American commanders say.

The Diyala police chief, Ghassan al-Bawi, "is stacking the deck in a sectarian manner," Colonel Jones said. "We believe there are death squads that are operating, if not sponsored by the police, certainly with the knowledge of the police."

In recent months, American commanders say, the most senior Iraqi Army and police leaders have ignored growing Shiite militia activity, provoking retaliatory attacks by Sunni insurgents, like the ambush and killing of 35 police officers in October in attacks near the city of Khan Bani Saad.

And General Shakir continued to harass Sunnis, the Americans said. In late September, troops led by General Shakir arrested 400 people, nearly all of them Sunnis, during raids in Baquba. Colonel Fisher estimated that there was reasonable justification to detain perhaps 10 percent of them.

He said the raids, which enraged the Sunni community, prompted American commanders to require General Shakir to clear all operations with them — a step back from the July 3 transfer of "lead" authority to the Iraqis. Nevertheless, while the Iraqi Fifth Division remains under the United States chain of command, American officers say that General Shakir is not fully complying with their instructions.

On Oct. 14, for example, commanders got word of what they said was a rogue Iraqi operation aimed at a Sunni sheik who had become an ally of the Americans in Khan Bani Saad. General Shakir never received approval for the operation, but ordered it anyway, Colonel Jones said.

After learning of the raid, American officers sent troops to force the Iraqis to return to base. When Sunni fighters saw the Americans arrive in the same sort of Humvees that the Iraqi soldiers use, they opened fire, Colonel Fisher said. The Americans returned fire and killed seven insurgents, he said.

General Shakir said he was not aware of the firefight.

American commanders also say the security forces are intimidating and arresting Sunnis who could be contenders for high political office — perhaps with an eye to welding Diyala eventually into a Shiite-dominated autonomous region under Iraq's new federalism law. That law would allow provinces to form into semi-independent states with wide powers over internal security.

"It just seems to be a deliberate attempt to make sure that the Sunnis are unable to organize politically here and represent themselves well in the next round of elections," Colonel Jones said, "because there is an awful lot at stake in this province."

General Shakir sought the arrest of Sheik Atta Hadi al-Sadoun, a general under Saddam Hussein, immediately after the sheik began to talk about running for governor, said Lt. Col. Frank Muggeo, who commanded a team advising an Iraqi Army brigade in Baquba.

Recently, Iraqi Army officials lured Sheik Atta to a meeting, where they arrested him. General Shakir was preparing to transfer the sheik to Baghdad when Colonel Jones intervened, he said, ordering the sheik into American custody because he feared he would be killed in Baghdad. "We saved his life," he said.

The Americans released the sheik for lack of evidence, Colonel Fisher said. But the sheik's nephew, who drove his uncle to the meeting and was seen leaving with General Shakir's men, is missing and feared dead, he said.

General Shakir said Sheik Atta remained a Saddam Hussein loyalist and had threatened Shiites. "One of my officers says Atta is worse than Zarqawi," he said.

Four Sunni police commanders and two key lieutenants have been killed in the past eight weeks, Colonel Jones said. A Sunni deputy police chief, he said, refuses to come to work because he believes "they're going to kill him."

Reports of detainee abuse in Iraqi Army facilities soared after General Shakir took over, Colonel Jones added, saying evidence shows some detainees were beaten and subjected to electrical shocks.

What is particularly disappointing for American officers is that there were two highly capable and even-handed brigade commanders serving directly under General Shakir — Brig. Gen. Rahman Challab al-Janabi in Muqdadiya and Brig. Gen. Saman Talabani in Baquba.

General Rahman was fired by General Shakir in late October, and General Talabani, who said he was frustrated with serving under General Shakir, has told United States officers that he expects that he will have to give up his command. During a recent operation he grabbed a radio and, in a reference to the militia led by Mr. Sadr, screamed at General Shakir, saying that he was not an Iraqi commander but a "Mahdi Army commander."

DOJ_NMG_0092933

General Talabani, a Kurd, said he believed that General Shakir took orders from Mr. Sadr. "He's working for Moktada," he said. "He's working just for the Shia people."

He also said aides to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite who to a great extent owes his position to backing from Mr. Sadr, had made it clear that they supported General Shakir.

In an interview, General Shakir — recently promoted by Baghdad to major general despite the American inquiry into his activities — said he was committed to fighting terrorists anywhere in Iraq, regardless of their sect.

He insisted that he pursued Shiite outlaws as aggressively as he pursued Sunnis. If he is given the names of Shiite militiamen, he said, he will order troops to seize them.

General Mixon said senior American commanders had told Iraqi officials of their grave concerns about General Shakir. Nevertheless, a spokesman for the Defense Ministry insisted that it had "received no complaints against him, nor have we had any bad indications."

Officials are "pleased" with General Shakir, and the descriptions by United States commanders in Diyala are incorrect, said the ministry spokesman, Mohammed al-Askari.

Tension Between Partners

During a recent joint American-Iraqi raid in a Shiite neighborhood of Abu Sayda, near Baquba, Iraqi troops stood around when they were supposed to be charging into homes. American soldiers, frustrated that the mission to apprehend men involved in sectarian violence was lagging, screamed and cursed at the Iraqis.

"Shoot them in the butt! Shoot them in the butt!" one yelled. "They're not motivated."

A 22-year-old platoon leader, Second Lt. Andrew Graziano, stepped up, barking orders and showing the Iraqis how to pound on doors.

After the raid some American officers said the Iraqi soldiers did not want to search Shiite homes. Lieutenant Graziano defended the Iraqis, saying their performance improved after a "stumble." But he conceded that a pullout of United States troops would leave Diyala in grave peril.

"It would be real bad," he said. "We all know that."

Lieutenant Graziano's unit, the Second Squadron of the Ninth Cavalry Regiment, put together evidence linking Iraqi officers to death squads after the squadron took over a base in August near Muqdadiya.

Led by Lt. Col. Louis Lartigue, the squadron detained the current and former commanders of the major crimes unit of the Muqdadiya police force and accused them of running death squads. They also arrested an Iraqi Army battalion commander in connection with death squad activity.

Troops also identified an Iraqi captain, now on the run and thought to be in Basra, who Colonel Jones said had been placed in his army job by General Shakir and is now believed to have led death squads in Muqdadiya.

"As we got into it, there were guys more than just partial to the Shia," Colonel Lartigue said. "They were criminals." He said General Shakir should be removed for "poor generalship," if nothing else. "It would be a little like getting Al Capone on tax evasion," he said.

But it is not clear whether anyone other than the Iraqi leaders can remove a commander of his rank, and even that would still leave Diyala with abundant problems.

"The U.S. Army is past the point where we say, 'Fire this guy,' " Colonel Jones said. "All we can say is, 'Hey, this guy is bad. Iraqi government, what are you going to do about it?' "

"We're going out on a low note," added Colonel Jones, whose unit, the Third Heavy Brigade Combat Team of the Fourth Infantry Division, is returning to Fort Carson, Colo. "We are very frustrated because we were so close to getting this thing moving in what we thought was the right direction. Now, the army and I believe the police are moving against this direction.

"This is a tipping point. If we demonstrate to the Sunnis that we are not going to remove Shakir and that we are going to allow him to do business as usual, then they're going to lose faith in us and faith in the reconciliation process. And this thing is going to go kinetic in a big way."

DOJ_NMG_0092934

In Gates Selection, White House Hopes To Close Rift Between State And Defense (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Scott Shane

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 — President Bush selected Robert M. Gates as his new defense secretary in part to close a long-running rift between the Defense Department and the State Department that has hobbled progress on Iraq, keeping the two agencies at odds on issues ranging from reconstruction to detaining terrorism suspects, according to White House officials and members of Mr. Gates's inner circle.

While Mr. Gates, a former director of central intelligence, had long been considered for a variety of roles, over the past two months Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, quietly steered the White House toward replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld with Mr. Gates, who had worked closely with Ms. Rice under the first President Bush. One senior participant in those discussions, who declined to be identified by name while talking about internal deliberations, said, "everyone realizes that we don't have much time to get this right" and the first step is to get "everyone driving on the same track."

White House officials said that goal may be difficult to accomplish in the seventh year of an administration. Ms. Rice and Mr. Rumsfeld never managed to resolve their differences, especially after their arguments over the handling of the occupation came into public view in late summer 2003. As national security adviser during Mr. Bush's first term, Ms. Rice was unable to halt a war between the State Department and the Pentagon that put senior officials in the departments in a state of constant conflict.

The question now is whether it is simply too late to achieve President Bush's goal of a stable and democratic Iraq, even if Mr. Gates and Ms. Rice are able to work together as smoothly in altering policy as they did 15 years ago on a very different kind of problem, managing the American response to the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

A few members of the Iraq Study Group — the commission created in March at the urging of members of Congress and led by James A. Baker III, from which Mr. Gates stepped down on Friday — have wondered aloud in recent days whether the insurgency and sectarian conflict in Iraq may be too far advanced to reverse. The group will consult with the British prime minister, Tony Blair, by video on Tuesday and is due to present recommendations to the White House and Congress in December.

And while Mr. Gates, who faces Senate confirmation hearings at roughly the same time, is considered far less combative and contrarian than Mr. Rumsfeld, he has a long-ago history of conflict with secretaries of state, most notably George P. Shultz, who objected to Mr. Gates's hawkish views of the Soviet Union and once tried to have him fired.

He is being thrust into the job at a moment when Democrats, newly empowered by their control of the House and the Senate, are promising investigations into the conduct of the war in Iraq and demanding a far greater voice in Iraq policy.

Nor is it clear how Mr. Gates will deal with Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Cheney worked for years to protect Mr. Rumsfeld, who had hired him for his first government job, and the top echelons of the Defense Department have been peppered with Cheney protégés. Many of them have told associates they expect to be leaving, as Mr. Gates takes over with a mandate, in Mr. Bush's words, to approach the job with "fresh eyes."

White House officials would say little on the record about the deliberations that led to the selection of Mr. Gates, 63, the president of Texas A&M University. But on Friday, they rejected the conventional wisdom in Washington that his selection amounts to a resurrection of the advisers to Mr. Bush's father, or a resurgence of realism to rescue a war started with the ideological certainty that toppling Saddam Hussein would help spread democracy across the Middle East.

"It dumbs this whole thing down to say that this is the victory of the pragmatists over the ideologues," said Daniel Bartlett, the president's counselor, who took part in the secret decisions to oust Mr. Rumsfeld and bring in Mr. Gates. "We are going to be practical in some respects, and ideological in others. But we knew that we needed a defense secretary who could hit the ground running and who was very familiar with the challenges we face."

A national security official who served under Ms. Rice in President Bush's first term said she regularly consulted with Mr. Gates, particularly on intelligence matters. "When she needed to figure out what had gone wrong at the C.I.A., she turned to him," the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0092935

Perhaps so, but Mr. Gates's friends say he will approach the current Iraq policy with a healthy skepticism. Joseph Nye, a Harvard professor and a Democrat who has known Mr. Gates for two decades and dealt with him on a variety of intelligence issues, describes him as "a realist, a conservative realist."

"He is open to evidence and less likely to be driven by fads, or the ideological certainties that sped this administration off course," Mr. Nye said. Mr. Gates's "frame of reference is more where Condoleezza Rice used to be, before the administration's excursion into democracy promotion."

In his memoirs, Mr. Gates writes of working with Ms. Rice, then a mid-level aide in the National Security Council, on a variety of projects, including the preparation of secret contingency plans in 1989 for the possibility that Mikhail S. Gorbachev might be overthrown and the Soviet Union descend into chaos.

Now, in a new partnership 17 years later, officials say their task is to guide Mr. Bush through even more treacherous waters: finding a way to stabilize Iraq, while devising options for the United States if the weak Iraqi government collapses or full-scale civil war breaks out.

All those possibilities have been debated by members of the Iraq Study Group. Mr. Gates was chosen as a Republican member of that commission by Mr. Baker, though the two occasionally clashed during the first Bush administration.

In his 1995 memoir, "The Politics of Diplomacy," Mr. Baker recounted his fury at learning in 1989 that Mr. Gates, then deputy national security adviser, intended to give a speech predicting that Mr. Gorbachev would not remain in power for much longer.

"When Gates had been at the C.I.A., he had given a speech that had completely undercut George Shultz on Soviet policy," Mr. Baker wrote. "That had hurt President Reagan then, and this would hurt George Bush now," he continued, referring to the first President Bush. Mr. Baker killed the speech.

In his long cold war experience as a C.I.A. director and deputy national security adviser, Mr. Gates never had to cope with an insurgency the size of the one that has erupted in Iraq, or devise a strategy for containing a battle between rival Islamic groups.

Last summer he told the Council on Foreign Relations that "we have the old line in the intelligence business that everything we want to know is divided into two categories: secrets and mysteries." Iraq, he said, "is very much the latter."

Yet together with Ms. Rice, Mr. Gates is expected to have to put into action recommendations by the study group that are likely to call for initiatives involving European allies and Iraq's neighbors in the Middle East. The new plans are expected to mix diplomacy, the training of Iraqi troops and the use of American force to quell the violence in Baghdad, and to require close coordination between the Departments of State and Defense.

"They needed someone who was not only capable but willing to try something new," said a former Gates colleague who has followed the process closely and who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Once these recommendations come out, some are going to be Gates's to carry out, and some are going to be Rice's."

Mr. Gates has at times been critical of Bush administration policies, most clearly in the case of how to deal with Iran, which administration officials fear is manipulating Shiite militias in Iraq. Along with Zbigniew Brzezinski, his former boss on President Jimmy Carter's National Security Council, he called in 2004 for a new approach, including talks with Tehran and expansion of and cultural contacts. So far, Mr. Bush has rejected most of that advice.

"He defies labels," said Bobby R. Inman, an old friend and former C.I.A. colleague of Mr. Gates. "His orientation is to solving problems."

In 1994, he endorsed with some reservations the idea of missile strikes to take out North Korean nuclear facilities. "Unless they believe we can and will use our strength, there is little chance of influencing them," he wrote. "A nuclear North Korea is the price we have paid to learn this lesson."

Similarly, in 1997, he proposed "a powerful air and missile campaign" to prevent Saddam Hussein from acquiring unconventional weapons.

But in 1998, he took a less bellicose approach in a prescient article on terrorism, written after the bombings at American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. He said the United States had to consider "whether to make a war against terrorism our highest priority in foreign policy."

DOJ_NMG_0092936

He counseled caution, arguing that “retributive violence, no matter how massive, almost inevitably begets more violence against us in response.” He advised a combination of terrorist arrests, targeted military action and promotion of human rights and political freedom in the Middle East.

Bush Swaps Idealists For Realists (BBC)

By Jonathan Beale

BBC.com, November 11, 2006

Even the White House acknowledges that the result of the mid-term elections was in some way the American public's verdict on the direction of US foreign policy - particularly in Iraq.

Will a change in personnel mean a change in policy? Battered and bruised, the Bush administration is now under huge pressure to change direction.

The departure of Donald Rumsfeld is seen as one indication that the White House has listened to its critics. But it's clear that is not enough.

Democrats also want the president to change America's ambassador to the United Nations - John Bolton, a totem of the right.

And this is not just about a change of personnel - Democrats and many moderate Republicans want a change of policy too.

Enter the 'realists'

The departure of Mr Rumsfeld and the arrival of Robert Gates at the Pentagon is being interpreted as the end of the road for the ideologues and the re-entry into orbit of the foreign-policy "realists".

So-called "realists" are supposed to have a more nuanced view of the world.

They do not - like the so-called neo-conservatives - see everything in black and white terms.

Bush 41 - the current president's father - is seen as a "realist".

Mr Cheney and Ms Rice served Mr Bush's father as well So is his former Secretary of State, James Baker.

Mr Baker is currently reviewing the options in Iraq as the co-chair of the Iraq Study Group - of which Robert Gates is also a member.

Mr Baker has already stated that he believes there is an alternative between "staying the course" and "cut and run".

Zbigniew Brzezinski - National Security Adviser to President Carter - said he hopes that personnel changes at the White House will bring "a degree of rationality, common sense, balance and historical perspective" to the table.

But it's worth remembering that many of the first George Bush's senior advisers have been surrounding his son for the past six years.

Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice and Stephen Hadley were around when Bush 41 was in charge of the White House.

The newly appointed Mr Gates may be seen as more "moderate" than Donald Rumsfeld.

But he was a "hawk" in the cold war era.

No doubt the new arrivals will bring a fresh perspective to the White House.

But don't expect US forces to exit Iraq overnight or for Iran and Syria to be greeted with open arms.

Talking to the enemy?

However President Bush will now be encouraged to talk to the enemy.

Even before the defeat there was a growing chorus of senior diplomats, Democrats and even Republican voices calling on the Bush administration to engage with countries like Iran and Syria.

Mr Baker's new Iraq plan might involve talks with Iran or Syria Until now the Bush/Rice policy has been akin to telling the naughty boy in the classroom to face the corner - in the hope that everyone will ignore him until he repents and mends his ways.

So far in the case of Iran, Syria, North Korea and Venezuela, the policy appears to have had limited success.

Mr Gates in the past has advocated talking to Iran.

But there is no guarantee that talking will get results either.

In truth, the Bush administration's foreign policy was already evolving.

DOJ_NMG_0092937

The arrival of Condoleezza Rice at the State Department signalled an emphasis on diplomacy rather than a reliance on America's military might. (Colin Powell might have wished to use the tools of diplomacy, but he never had the ear of the president.)

That change was forced on an administration that faced international isolation after the Iraq war.

Democrats' dilemma

In the euphoria of victory the Democrats might be hoping for wholesale change.

But Congress has never had the final say on foreign policy.

The Democrats' new power may now make life more difficult for the president, but George Bush has already made it clear that he is not going to abandon his goal of defeating terrorism in Iraq or ease the pressure on North Korea and Iran.

There's a dilemma too for the Democrats.

They cannot afford to appear weak in the face of the threats that America faces if they are to have any chance of eventually taking the White House.

Gates Struggled Through The Iran-Contra Scandal (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — Robert Gates successfully navigated the legal and political perils of the Iran-Contra scandal. He emerged as CIA director and survived an ordeal that took a heavy toll on the first President Bush, the man perhaps most responsible for Gates' success.

George W. Bush now has designated Gates as Donald H. Rumsfeld's successor at the Pentagon, a job that will require the next defense secretary to find a different direction for the Iraq war, which has devastated the political fortunes of the Bush administration.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada says he has questions about Gates' involvement in Iran-Contra. Republicans plan to push the nomination through before they lose control in January.

Thomas Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a private group that has collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents on the scandal and published several books on it, calls Gates "the ultimate hear-no-evil see-no-evil high official during Iran-Contra."

In a final report, Iran-Contra prosecutor Lawrence Walsh said that, "like those of many other Iran-Contra figures, the statements of Gates often seemed scripted and less than candid."

In rebuttal, Gates said Walsh's 1994 report was "unjustifiably disparaging, unbalanced, filled with innuendo and insinuation, and draws conclusions not supported by the evidence."

Questions about Gates focus not on what he did in Iran-Contra, but on what he knew. CIA Director William Casey had his own parallel chain of command that excluded Gates. At the time, however, Gates was the agency's No. 2 official.

"You would think he had to know, but was he involved? No," former CIA officer Vincent Cannistraro said of Gates.

Former Democratic Sen. David Boren of Oklahoma, who presided over Gates' 1991 confirmation hearings, among the longest in Senate history, said Casey shut out Gates because he was "the kind of person who wouldn't have put up with what was going on."

The Iran-Contra affair plagued the final two years of Ronald Reagan's presidency and damaged the final political campaign of Bush's father. The scandal that broke out 20 years ago this month also bruised Gates' career, forcing him to withdraw his nomination as CIA director in 1987.

Gates soldiered on as the No. 2 official at the CIA, then went to the White House's National Security Council. Four years later, the first President Bush nominated him for the top CIA job.

Iran-Contra was the convergence of two covert operations run by the Reagan White House — selling arms to Iran in an effort to free U.S. hostages in Lebanon and supplying arms to the Contra guerrillas fighting the leftist government of Nicaragua.

NSC aide Oliver North oversaw the Contra resupply network during a congressional ban on military aid to the rebels.

DOJ_NMG_0092938

Congress was kept in the dark. The two operations were exposed when a resupply plane was shot down over Nicaragua and when a Middle East newspaper disclosed the Iran initiative.

In 1991, as Gates prepared to testify at his confirmation hearings for the CIA, new evidence emerged that raised additional questions about whether he had told the truth in Iran-Contra.

An ex-CIA officer alleged that he and at least three other CIA officials besides Casey had heard early on about the most explosive secret in the scandal — the diversion of profits from the Iran arms sales to the Contras.

The new evidence meant that at least five people above and below Gates knew about talk of a diversion in the summer before the secret surfaced. Had Gates known?

The president stood by him.

"Hey, you're my man. I'm all for you. ... don't let 'em get you down," Bush said he had assured the nominee.

As with Gates, the president was dogged by Iran-Contra. He spent the final weekend of his last political campaign answering renewed questions about his role in the scandal.

Bush had described himself as being "out of the loop" regarding opposition by two Cabinet officials to the secret arms-for-hostages deals with Iran.

The comment, however, was undercut by a reissued indictment showing that Bush, while vice president, participated in a meeting where the opposition he later denied knowing about had surfaced.

After losing the election five days later, the Bush campaign said the allegations had stopped the president's comeback in the polls.

At his Senate confirmation hearings in 1991, Gates handled Iran-Contra with a carefully crafted acknowledgment of responsibility. He also received some supportive testimony.

Gates said he simply had forgotten about being told by a CIA colleague about a diversion. The CIA official who told him said that was "quite easy to understand," adding that the information had been "very speculative."

Prosecutors said Gates' explanation that he did not recall the conversation is "to say the least ... disquieting.

"He had been told by a very senior officer that two of President Reagan's personal priorities were in danger — not something an ambitious deputy director of central intelligence would likely forget," the prosecutors' final report states.

In rebuttal, Gates said, "I did not engage in obstruction or willful misleading" and that the prosecutors' report "should have so stated."

Gates told prosecutors he was unaware North had an operational role in supporting the Contras. Gates said he believed North's activities were limited to putting Contra leaders in touch with wealthy American donors and to giving the Contras political advice.

Cannistraro, who dealt with both Gates and North, says "I find it almost impossible that Gates wouldn't know what I knew, and I knew a fair amount. He couldn't avoid knowing."

But Gates has said he did not know.

"A thousand times I would go over the 'might-have-beens,'" Gates wrote in his memoirs. "I was new to the job and was trying to learn the ropes while all this was going on."

How (Not) To Run The Pentagon (WP)

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Robert M. Gates, the former CIA director tapped by President Bush to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary, would bring to the Pentagon some clear ideas about how to lead and reform unwieldy public institutions. In a recent speech at Texas A&M University, where Gates serves as president, the nominee cautioned against new leaders arbitrarily imposing their ambitious agendas, only to witness the reversal of their efforts immediately after they leave.

"It is a fact of life in institutions that leaders come and go. Sometimes when they leave, there is regret among the professionals and staff who remain. More often, the celebrations begin before the departing executive's taillights are out of sight. Some leaders arrive with ambitious agendas and seek to impose them by fiat -- unilaterally and from above. They usually provoke either paralyzing opposition and internal warfare, or see the reversal of every action immediately after their departure. We can all think of specific examples of both at other universities over the last year or two.

DOJ_NMG_0092939

What, then, is the formula for successful leadership in public institutions, above all a great university? I believe it begins with a leader's recognition that his or her time in office is finite and that the institution and those who carry out its mission endure. They were there long before the leader arrived, and will be there long after he or she departs. Whether at CIA or at a university, the professionals outlast both good and bad leaders.

I have long believed that the secret to successful leadership of public institutions -- especially in leading change -- is the involvement in decision-making of those who carry out the institution's mission: involvement in setting the agenda, involvement in shaping options, involvement in decisions, and involvement in implementation."

-- Robert M. Gates, Sept. 8, 2006

The Donald Rumsfeld I Know (WP)

By Douglas J. Feith

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Much of what you know about Donald Rumsfeld is wrong.

I worked intimately with Rumsfeld for four years, from the summer of 2001 until I left the Pentagon in August 2005. Through countless meetings and private conversations, I came to learn his traits, frame of mind and principles -- characteristics wholly at odds with the standard public depiction of Rumsfeld, particularly now that he has stepped down after a long, turbulent tenure as defense secretary, a casualty of our toxic political climate.

I know that Don Rumsfeld is not an ideologue. He did not refuse to have his views challenged. He did not ignore the advice of his military advisers. And he did not push single-mindedly for war in Iraq. He was motivated to serve the national interest by transforming the military, though it irritated people throughout the Pentagon. Rumsfeld's drive to modernize created a revealing contrast between his Pentagon and the State Department, where Colin Powell was highly popular among the staff. After four years of Powell's tenure at State, the organization chart there would hardly tip anyone off that 9/11 had occurred -- or even that the Cold War was over.

Rumsfeld is a bundle of paradoxes, like a fascinating character in a work of epic literature. And as my high school teachers drummed into my head, the best literature reveals that humans are complex. They are not the all-good or all-bad, all-brilliant or all-dumb figures that inhabit trashy novels and news stories. Fine literature teaches us the difference between appearance and reality.

Because of his complexity, Rumsfeld is often misread. His politics are deeply conservative, but he was radical in his drive to force change in every area he oversaw. He is strong-willed and hard-driving, but he built his defense strategies and Quadrennial Defense Reviews on calls for intellectual humility.

Those of us in his inner circle heard him say, over and over again: Our intelligence, in all senses of the term, is limited. We cannot predict the future. We must continually question our preconceptions and theories. If events contradict them, don't suppress the bad news; rather, change your preconceptions and theories.

If an ideologue is someone to whom the facts don't matter, then Rumsfeld is the opposite of an ideologue. He insists that briefings for him be full of facts, thoughtfully organized and rigorously sourced. He demands that facts at odds with his key policy assumptions be brought to his attention immediately. "Bad news never gets better with time," he says, and berates any subordinate who fails to rush forward to him with such news. He does not suppress bad news; he acts on it.

In late 2002, Pentagon lawyers told Rumsfeld that the detainee interrogation techniques in the old Army field manual were well within the bounds of the Geneva Conventions and U.S. statutes. Detainee information could help us prevent another terrorist attack, and al-Qaeda personnel were trained to resist standard interrogations. So, with the advice of counsel, military officers at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, asked Rumsfeld to authorize additional techniques thought to fall safely within the bounds of the law. He did so.

Less than a month later, in December 2002, Jim Haynes, the Defense Department's general counsel, brought him the disturbing news that some lawyers in the military departments questioned the legality of the additional techniques. Rumsfeld did not brush off the questions or become defensive. In short order, he directed Haynes to revoke the authority for the new techniques. He told him to gather all the relevant lawyers in the department and review the matter -- and he would not approve any new techniques until that review was completed. It took almost four months.

DOJ_NMG_0092940

I was impressed by how quickly Haynes brought the information to Rumsfeld and how Rumsfeld changed course upon receiving it. It seemed to me that if the country's leading civil libertarians had been in on the meetings with us, they would have approved of the way Rumsfeld handled the service lawyers' dissent. This story bears telling because when the cruel and sexually bizarre behavior at Abu Ghraib occurred many months later, critics inaccurately depicted Rumsfeld as disrespectful of laws on detainee treatment.

Rumsfeld's drive to overhaul the Pentagon -- to drop outdated practices and modes of thought -- antagonized many senior military officers and civilian officials in the department. He pushed for doing more with less. He pushed for reorganizing offices and relationships to adapt to a changing world. After 9/11, he created the Northern Command (the first combatant command that included the U.S. homeland within its area of responsibility), a new undersecretary job for intelligence and a new assistant secretary job for homeland defense. Improving civil-military cooperation, Rumsfeld devised new institutions for the Pentagon's top civilian and military officials to work face to face on strategic matters and new venues for all of them to gather a few times a year with the combatant commanders. He also conceived and pushed through a thorough revision of how U.S. military forces are based, store equipment, move and train with partners around the world -- something that was never done before in U.S. history.

When he told organizations to take on new missions, their instinct -- typical of bureaucracies -- was to say they needed more people and more money. Rumsfeld responded: If changes in the world require us to do new things, those changes must also allow us to curtail or end old missions that we continue for no good reason. He made numerous major changes in the Defense Department at the cost of goring a lot of oxen.

On Iraq, Rumsfeld helped President Bush analyze the dangers posed by Saddam Hussein's regime. Given Hussein's history -- starting wars; using chemical weapons against foreign and domestic enemies; and training, financing and otherwise supporting various terrorists -- Rumsfeld helped make the case that leaving him in power entailed significant risks. But in October 2002, Rumsfeld also wrote a list of the risks involved in removing Hussein from power. (I called the list his "parade of horribles" memo.) He reviewed it in detail with the president and the National Security Council. Rumsfeld's warnings about the dangers of war -- including the perils of a post-Hussein power vacuum -- were more comprehensive than anything I saw from the CIA, State or elsewhere.

Though we knew that the risks involved in ousting Hussein were high, it hardly means that Bush made the wrong decision to invade. I believe he made the correct call; we had grounds to worry about the threats Hussein posed, especially after 9/11 reduced our tolerance for security risks. But Rumsfeld helped the president see that he had no risk-free option for dealing with the dangers Hussein posed.

Rumsfeld has been attacked for insisting that troop levels for the Iraq operation be kept low, supposedly out of ideology and contrary to the advice of the military. What I saw, however, was that Rumsfeld questioned standard military recommendations for "overwhelming force." He asked if such force was necessary for the mission. And he asked what the consequences might be of having a large footprint in Iraq and playing into propaganda about the United States wanting to take over the country.

But Rumsfeld never told Gen. John Abizaid or Gen. Tommy Franks that U.S. Central Command could not have the number of troops that the commanders deemed necessary. Rumsfeld is more politically sensitive than that -- he would never expose himself to the risk of a commander later saying that he had denied him the forces needed. If other generals are unhappy with the troop levels in Iraq, the problem is not that they failed to persuade Rumsfeld, but that they failed to persuade Abizaid or Franks.

Historians will sort out whether Rumsfeld was too pushy with his military, or not pushy enough; whether he micromanaged Ambassador L. Paul Bremer and the Coalition Provisional Authority, or gave them too much slack. I know more about these issues than most people, yet I don't have all the information for a full analysis. I do know, however, that the common view of Rumsfeld as a close-minded man, ideologically wedded to the virtues of a small force, is wrong.

Rumsfeld had to resign, I suppose, because the bitter political debate of recent years has turned him into a symbol. His effectiveness was damaged. For many in Congress and the public, the Rumsfeld caricature dominated their view of the Iraq war and the administration's ability to prosecute it successfully. Even if nominee Robert Gates pursues essentially the same strategy, he may command more public confidence.

DOJ_NMG_0092941

What Rumsfeld believed, said and did differs from the caricature. The public picture of him today is drawn from news accounts reflecting the views of people who disapproved of his policies or disliked him. Rumsfeld, after all, can be brutally demanding and tough. But I believe history will be more appreciative of him than the first draft has been. What will last is serious history, which, like serious literature, can distinguish appearance from reality.

Douglas J. Feith, a professor at Georgetown University, served as undersecretary of defense for policy from 2001 to 2005.

Rumsfeld's Self-inflicted Wounds (LAT)

By Frederick W. Kagan, Frederick W. Kagan Is A Resident Scholar At The American Enterprise Institute And The Author Of "Fin

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

The outgoing defense secretary was too focused on transforming the military, and failed to plan for achieving political goals in Iraq.

DONALD RUMSFELD had the chance to be one of the great American heroes of all time. He held office at a moment of enormous danger. He had many admirable qualities necessary for success. But like the tragic heroes of old, hubris and inflexibility made vices of his virtues, leading to his own fall and the collapse of his life's work.

Rumsfeld was in many ways ideally suited to be secretary of Defense in the wake of 9/11. His experience in the same position under President Ford and as ambassador to NATO seemed to fit him to the task of overseeing a complex military coalition. His determination and self-confidence were essential in a wartime secretary — and unusual in recent times. When he showed, early in his tenure, that he meant to take positive control of the Pentagon's sprawling bureaucracy, many observers cheered. This was precisely the sort of man the nation needed at the military's helm at a time of crisis.

As former CIA Director Robert Gates prepares to succeed Rumsfeld, the chorus is already rising to declare that Gates must be more open to advice from the military, more of a consensus-builder than a tyrant. Perhaps. It isn't clear how a more open secretary of Defense would have fared given the advice the military gave Rumsfeld.

Belief in the value of technology and the need for light, swift ground forces pervaded the senior military leadership in the 1990s. Then-Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki had launched an ambitious program to "lighten" the Army and equip it with advanced precision weapons. Shinseki certainly warned that more troops would be needed to secure Iraq in the wake of major combat operations. But Gen. Tommy Franks, the commander who developed and executed the actual war plan, wanted fewer. Many officers opposed the "light footprint" approach with which Rumsfeld tackled the problem of the Iraqi insurgency — but not Gen. John Abizaid, who took over from Franks right after the end of major combat operations. A secretary of Defense who encouraged discussion and dissent would have perhaps anticipated more of the flaws in the policies he was proposing. Still, the strategy that has led to disaster in Iraq belonged to the commanders at least as much as to Rumsfeld. Scapegoating him in isolation will prevent us from learning the essential lessons of our recent failures.

For the problem with Rumsfeld was not his flawed managerial style, but his flawed understanding of war. Early in his term, he became captive of an idea. He would transform the U.S. military in accord with the most advanced theories of the 1990s to prepare it for the challenges of the future. He was not alone in his captivity. As a candidate, President Bush announced the same program in 1999 — long before anyone thought Don Rumsfeld would return as secretary of Defense. The program, quite simply, was to rely on information technology to permit American forces to locate, identify, track and destroy any target on the face of the Earth from thousands of miles away. Ideally, ground forces would not be necessary in future wars. If they were, it would be in small numbers, widely dispersed, moving rapidly and engaging in little close combat. This vision defined U.S. military theory throughout the 1990s, and it has gone deep into our military culture. Rumsfeld's advent hastened and solidified its triumph, but his departure will not lead instantly to its collapse.

At its root, this "transformation program" is not a program for war at all. War is the use of force to achieve a political purpose, against a thinking enemy and involving human populations. Political aims cannot normally be achieved simply by destroying targets. But the transformation that enthusiasts of the 1990s focused too narrowly on destroyed the enemy's military with small, lean and efficient forces. This captivated Rumsfeld, becoming his passion. He meant it to be his legacy. It was the fatal flaw in this vision that led, in part, to the debacle in Iraq. Focused on destroying the enemy's military quickly and efficiently, Rumsfeld refused to consider the political complexities that would follow that destruction. He and Franks pared the invasion force down to the smallest level that could defeat Saddam Hussein's army, but refused to consider the chaos that would follow the collapse of Hussein's government. This failure is inherent in the military thought of the 1990s. Rumsfeld did not invent it. He simply executed it.

DOJ_NMG_0092942

Having made the mistake of failing to plan for achieving the political goals of the Iraq war, Rumsfeld then compounded his error. The war in Iraq threatened military transformation. It was expensive and sucked scarce defense resources away from transformational programs. It was manpowerintensive and hindered Rumsfeld's efforts to reorient the military away from a focus on land power. It was intellectually distracting; counterinsurgency has little to do with transformation. Here Rumsfeld's virtues became his greatest vices. Instead of recognizing the danger of losing Iraq, he remained committed to transforming the military to meet undefined future threats, spending billions of dollars preparing to fight Enemy X in 2025. He consistently opposed increasing the size of the ground forces, despite the obvious growing strains on the Army and the Marines of repeated deployments to Afghanistan and Iraq.

He fought to keep expensive weapons systems, such as the F-22 fighter jet and the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, which were billed as "transformational" because they used precision-guided munitions to strike remote targets. That money could have been used for better armored vehicles, more body armor and more soldiers. The same determination that had seemed so promising when he first took over became a stubborn refusal to change course in a storm.

Rumsfeld has paid a high price for this failure. He will not be known as the secretary of Defense who transformed the military, but as the secretary of Defense who, at best, nearly lost the Iraq war. Worse still, his stubbornness has destroyed the ground forces. The Army and Marines have worn out their equipment and their troops. Units must swap tanks and Humvees just to be able to train. The Army brass recently leaked the fact that only the units that are in Iraq or about to deploy to Iraq are combat-ready — an unprecedented military crisis. Rumsfeld leaves behind him a military far weaker and less capable than the one he took charge of in 2001.

The greatest irony of all is that the military Rumsfeld has destroyed is the one he created. He was secretary of Defense in the mid-1970s as the military was shifting from conscription to the all-volunteer force. He shepherded the volunteer military through its early growing pains and supported it valiantly against its many critics. Perfecting it through transformation was to be the culmination of his life's work. The damage he has done to it instead is his tragedy — and the nation's.

Now What? (NYT)

By Franklin Foer

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

ANDY CARD began his political ascent as George H. W. Bush's driver and carried forward a valet's mind-set into the job of White House chief of staff. Less a power broker than a punching bag, Card made it his mission to venture before the cameras to swallow blame for administration follies, like its catatonic response to Hurricane Katrina. And behind closed doors, his role was even more humiliating. The former Treasury secretary Paul O'Neill recalled George W. Bush interrupting a top-level meeting to issue Card an extremely urgent request: "You're the chief of staff. You think you're up to getting us some cheeseburgers?"

It is startling, therefore, to read Bob Woodward's portrayal of Card as the conscience of the Bush administration. In his telling, Card orchestrated a brave but doomed campaign to oust Donald Rumsfeld and change course in Iraq. Where other advisers evaded responsibility, Card constantly told the president, "You should not be afraid to change me." Card occupies considerable space in "State of Denial" and has dominated coverage of it. Such an unconventional portrait inevitably provokes a cynical explanation: that Woodward, amanuensis to the Washington stars, has once again uncritically transcribed someone's self-serving version of events.

Cynicism, however, trivializes the significance of Card's confessions. To have so many of the president's fiercest loyalists, like Card, testify to his incompetence — and with the ultimate Establishment journalist's tape recorder running — is itself a turning point. With two years to go, Woodward has written the Bush administration's version of "The Final Days."

DOJ_NMG_0092943

He has retroactively bundled his books on the Bush White House into a trilogy. "State of Denial," the jacket tells us, is Part 3 of his "Bush at War" cycle. This is obvious sleight of hand. Woodward's first book provided so favorable a treatment of the administration that the Republican National Committee recommended it on its Web site. But "State of Denial" isn't a continuation of his previous work as much as a repudiation — the installment in which he takes a mulligan and attempts to correct for past obsequiousness.

Your standard volume of Woodward reportage could be titled "Everything That Happened Since My Last Book." But "State of Denial" deviates from this model. It doesn't even begin where his last Bush book, "Plan of Attack," left off — in the euphoric early days of the Iraq war. Instead, Woodward retraces his reportorial steps back to the moment George W. Bush first considered running for president, when his father called the Saudi ambassador, Prince Bandar bin Sultan, down to Austin to provide his boy a foreign policy tutorial. And Bandar initiates the book's flood of unflattering details. According to him, Bush exclaimed, "I don't have the foggiest idea about what I think about international, foreign policy." (Domestic foreign policy was another matter.)

Where Bush appeared resolute in the first two installments of Woodward's trilogy, he now comes across as a "Saturday Night Live" version of himself. He cracks fart jokes with Karl Rove and conspires to play a prank on the current Federal Reserve chairman. Woodward argues that this Andover grad still views himself as a cheerleader, bucking up the polity even if his rosy exhortations come at the cost of the truth. (When a C.I.A. briefer informs the president of the deteriorating security situation in Iraq, Bush dismisses the messenger from Langley as "Baghdad Bob," a reference to Saddam Hussein's old spokesman.) And if the president can't face the facts, it may have something to do with his insecurities. According to Woodward, the president's legs anxiously jiggle under the table in meetings. He also suggests, as others have, that our adventure in Iraq had less to do with the promotion of democracy and more to do with the president's relationship with his father. Bush wanted to outdo his dad by taking down the tyrant his old man had left standing.

But the president is too passive a player to be Woodward's central villain. Besides, Donald Rumsfeld fills that role far too perfectly. He comes across as utterly contemptuous of other human beings. When Condoleezza Rice makes important presentations to the president, Rumsfeld ostentatiously fails to pay attention — and then fails to return her calls afterward. What's worse, he is an obsessive micromanager, but one who disavows projects once they look doomed. As soon as the hunt for weapons of mass destruction seemed fruitless, he handed over the mission to the C.I.A.

Rumsfeld takes so much pummeling that he eventually becomes a strangely sympathetic character. While almost every other member of the Bush administration stiffed Woodward's request for on-the-record interviews, Rumsfeld manfully subjected himself to two sessions — this despite his obvious disdain for the author. In the course of these interviews, Woodward breaks his own time-honored rules of access journalism. Instead of rewarding Rumsfeld's openness, he uses the interviews to disprove his own reputation for softness. After Rumsfeld employs the metaphor of a "fruit bowl" to describe the administration's varying methodologies for measuring insurgent attacks, Woodward writes: "I was speechless. Even with the loosest and most careless use of language and analogy, I did not understand how the secretary of defense would compare insurgent attacks to a 'fruit bowl,' a metaphor that stripped them of all urgency and emotion."

While Woodward reserves particular antipathy for Rumsfeld, his descriptions of nearly everyone else in the administration are equally damning. Every chapter in the book presents a heretofore uncovered anecdote of incompetence. Why did we botch postwar reconstruction? Weeks before the invasion, one of the men recruited to help rebuild Iraq is sitting in a library scraping for any bit of available information about "what we should do with the Iraqi Army." Unfortunately, the United States government didn't have any good intelligence on the subject. When Jay Garner, who was in charge of the reconstruction, asked Rice on the eve of the invasion how he should put together a postwar government, he didn't receive an answer. Garner didn't even know he should relocate his operations to the Middle East until Paul Wolfowitz told him, "You should already be there."

Amid all of Woodward's maddening reports of administration ham-handedness and arrogance, unintentional comedy abounds. He captures official Washington offering the lamest excuses as it trips over itself to deny responsibility for the Iraq war and the Bush era. George Tenet, the former director of central intelligence, is shown decrying the Iraq invasion as a "mistake" on the eve of the war — despite Woodward's previous reports of his "slam dunk" assessment of the Iraqi arsenal. After Richard Armitage's initial pre-presidential encounters with George W. Bush, he "was not sure Bush filled the suit required of a president"

DOJ_NMG_0092944

— yet nevertheless went on to serve as his loyal servant for four years. But Woodward doesn't render this rat-jump with the appropriate comic flair. He portrays these revisionist accounts with far more sympathy than they deserve.

This book, after all, is an object lesson in precisely this brand of retreat. You can easily understand Woodward's urge to retreat. For the past decade, he has received unending abuse, suffering a devastating Joan Didion hatchet job and then the scorn of the anti-Bush left. His critics have turned him into a symbol of journalism's rot, a leading force in the sad demise of adversarial reporting that led to Judith Miller and media passiveness in the face of Bush spin. After writing "All the President's Men," Woodward became one of them.

With "State of Denial," you sense this (somewhat overwrought) critique has rattled Woodward. It has forced him to change his style. There's less of his signature omniscience here — a style that not only reflected his proximity to power, but captured the self-confidence of the Washington Establishment. In its place, he has grown self-referential, nervously mentioning his past books, as well as inserting himself as a character into his own tale. That Bob Woodward has strayed from the Bob Woodward method tells you a lot about the state of American journalism.

Rumsfeld Was My Squash Partner (LAT)

By David Hiller

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

THERE WAS A PERIOD in the late 1990s when Don Rumsfeld and I played squash almost every month in Chicago, and before I say anything else, I should acknowledge this: He beat me almost all the time, even though, as he regularly pointed out, he was "almost old enough" to be my father.

We both lived in Chicago at the time. Don was in his late 60s, and I was in my 40s. I attribute my regular trouncing to several things (apart from my own poor play). Don was a strong technical player with a keen sense of court geometry and shot placement. He followed diagrams that his friend Arthur C. Nielsen, founder of the TV ratings business and one of the best amateur racquet-sport players in the U.S. in his day, had drawn for him by hand. I'm still looking for the copy Don gave me.

Don had a deadly, hard overhand service that came off the front wall like a bullet, came straight to the back wall and dropped in the corner, safe from my racquet. I'm sure that serve is what tore Don's rotator cuff.

Don also held the strategic ground in the center of the court better than anybody. We once collided as we both moved there, and I couldn't play for a week. Don moved well, certainly for a guy in his 60s. As he said, "I'm quick, not fast."

I think what struck me most was that Don never gave up on a point. His view was that every shot could be made, every game could be won, and he never surrendered until the last volley was played out. With me he was usually right.

Were these the qualities he brought to his job as secretary of Defense? I'm not sure, but I suspect that the rules he lived by were the same ones he played by, and I thought of them again as I watched the president announce Don's resignation.

DAVID HILLER is publisher of The Times.

Top Commander In Iraq Says U.S. Won't Abandon Its Mission (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, voiced confidence Saturday that the United States would not abandon its mission in this violence-racked country amid a postelection reevaluation of Iraq strategy.

"The weeks and months ahead will require courage and determination," Casey said at a Veterans Day naturalization ceremony for 75 U.S. troops at Baghdad's Camp Victory. "But succeed we will."

His comments were among his first public statements since the resignation last week of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Washington political insiders have speculated that both Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who was also at the ceremony, could leave their posts because of the Republican Party's defeat at the polls Tuesday. Both men quickly left the ceremony after reading prepared statements.

At least 40 Iraqis and two European soldiers were reported killed in Iraq on Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0092945

The U.S. military indicated that it had come up empty-handed in its quest to find a soldier missing for nearly three weeks. It offered a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of Army Reserve Spc. Ahmed Qusai Taei, an American of Iraqi descent.

He was abducted Oct. 23 outside the U.S.-protected Green Zone in Baghdad while on a visit to his Iraqi wife and in-laws.

The European soldiers, a Slovak and a Pole, were killed overnight by a roadside bomb near the southern city of Kut, news agencies reported.

Iraq's south has come under the sway of rival Shiite Muslim militias with anti-U.S. agendas.

Police in Najaf discovered a cache of antitank rockets, armor-piercing weapons and mortars hidden in the city's ancient cemetery. In 2004, Najaf was the scene of intense street battles between U.S. forces and Shiite militias.

In the capital, two car bombs exploded near the main market, killing eight civilians and injuring 37. Almost daily explosions at the wholesale market have further stifled an already moribund economy.

In other violence, a roadside bomb in an upscale Sunni Muslim neighborhood in central Baghdad killed one and injured five. Another roadside bomb in west Baghdad killed three passersby and injured three.

News agencies reported that as many as 10 Shiites traveling south of Baghdad on minibuses were killed in an apparent sectarian attack, but the account could not be confirmed. Dozens more reportedly were kidnapped by the gunmen.

Assassins killed a police sergeant in east Baghdad and an official in Iraq's intelligence service in south Baghdad as he locked up his car.

Gunmen killed two bodyguards of a former member of parliament in an east Baghdad shootout that left four people wounded, including the politician.

Iraqi police discovered the mutilated, bullet-riddled corpses of at least 24 men and a woman around the capital, police officials said.

Suicide bombers rammed U.S. military convoys near Taji, 20 miles north of the capital, and in east Baghdad, Iraqi police said. The military did not report any casualties from either incident.

U.S. Offers Reward For Help In Finding Missing Soldier (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 11 — The American military on Saturday announced a $50,000 reward for anyone with information leading to the recovery of an American soldier who was captured nearly three weeks ago outside the heavily protected Green Zone.

Iraqi and American soldiers conducted another raid in the impoverished Shiite district of Sadr City on Friday, looking for a "top-level death squad leader" as part of efforts to find the soldier, military officials said Saturday.

Also on Saturday, Sunni Arab gunmen pulled over a group of minibuses carrying Shiites traveling through a volatile region just south of here, killing 10 and kidnapping dozens, Iraqi state television said. And in one of several deadly attacks here in the capital, a pair of car bombs tore through a popular downtown shopping area just after noon, killing at least six people and injuring 32 others, an Interior Ministry official said.

A roadside bomb near Kut, about 100 miles southeast of Baghdad, killed one Polish and one Slovak soldier late on Friday, The Associated Press said.

The missing American soldier, identified by the military as Specialist Ahmed Kousay al-Taie, 41, an Iraqi-American translator from Ann Arbor, Mich., disappeared Oct. 23 after he left the Green Zone without permission to visit his Iraqi wife at her home nearby. Armed men handcuffed him and took him away, his relatives and the military said.

Since then, he has been the subject of a hunt that has involved some 2,000 American troops and 1,000 Iraqi security officers, who flooded the middle-class Karada neighborhood outside the Green Zone and surrounded Sadr City, where the military and his relatives said they believed he had been taken.

Last week, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki demanded that American troops lift the security cordon that they had placed around Sadr City. The checkpoints were quickly removed, and little has been heard since about progress in the search.

DOJ_NMG_0092946

The case took a turn late last week when Entifad Qanbar, an associate of Ahmad Chalabi, the influential Iraqi politician, identified himself as the soldier's uncle and said that the kidnappers had issued a $250,000 ransom demand. American officials had been meeting with an intermediary trusted by those who had captured his nephew, he said. Mr. Qanbar said that he had asked for proof from the captors that his nephew was still alive, setting a deadline of noon last Saturday.

But he has not had any contact with the kidnappers or their representatives since then, Mr. Qanbar said Saturday.

Several people who claim to know the captors have contacted family members, indicating that he is still alive, he said. The family has also reached out to people on their own, who have given them assurances about his well-being, he said. "God willing, I hope he is alive." .

Relatives believe a notorious Mahdi Army militia commander named Abu Rami who lived near the wife's home in Karada took Specialist Taie. Mr. Qanbar said Saturday that he had been told that the commander operated a well-organized criminal ring that functioned independently from the militia, whose members ostensibly claim loyalty to Moktada al-Sadr, the Shiite cleric.

American and Iraqi troops have followed up on some 335 tips from Iraqi citizens about Specialist Taie's disappearance, leading to 53 missions, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman. The most recent mission took place in Sadr City on Friday, in which five men were detained, he said.

The soldiers in the raid were looking for a death squad leader who "controls the actions of multiple cells, with hundreds of cell members, that conduct sectarian murder and torture, kidnappings, improvised explosive devices attacks and other attacks and crimes against Iraqi civilians and Iraqi security forces," the military said in a statement.

The soldiers seized six makeshift bombs and an array of Iraqi Army uniforms, the statement said. Military officials declined to identify the specific target of the raid, but confirmed it was part of its efforts to find Specialist Taie.

In all, 38 people have been arrested and held for questioning in connection with Specialist Taie's capture, Colonel Garver said.

The attack Saturday on the minibuses took place near Latifiya in the so-called Triangle of Death, an area plagued by Sunni insurgents. The bus had been on its way from the mainly Shiite southern city of Diwaniya to Baghdad, Iraqi state TV reported.

The twin car bombs that killed six people in the capital struck Hafud al-Qadi Street near the Shurja market, an area crowded with stores.

Earlier in the day, another roadside bomb exploded in eastern Baghdad, killing at least one person and wounding five others, an Interior Ministry official said. Another concealed bomb that detonated Saturday evening in the western Baghdad Sunni neighborhood of Amariya killed three people and wounded three others, the official said.

The police also discovered the bodies of 25 people dumped across the city on Saturday, the official said.

Dissenting Officer Faces Court-martial (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe,

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada cites ethics in becoming the first commissioned troop to refuse Iraq deployment.

The nation's first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq said he was disappointed by the Army's decision last week to proceed with a court-martial against him but reiterated that he believed he did the right thing in opposing the war.

As the nation honored its military veterans Saturday, Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada said he believed his refusal to lead his soldiers into what he viewed as an illegal and immoral war was fulfilling his duty to them and the Constitution he pledged to uphold.

"I am at peace with my decision because I feel that from the beginning I made it according to my conscience and my duty as a soldier and officer," said Watada, who is stationed at Ft. Lewis, Wash., about 50 miles south of Seattle. "The reason I'm standing up is that no one else is speaking up for the troops dying every day — not to mention the 600,000 Iraqis who have died.

"I'm willing to accept the punishment, whatever it may be," said Watada, whose case has sparked widespread debate over a soldier's duty to follow orders versus conscience.

In phone interviews Friday and Saturday, Watada also said that recent events had reinforced his belief that many Americans, including a growing number inside the military, shared his sentiments against the Bush administration's conduct of the war. Those events include the midterm election results giving Democrats control of Congress, the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and a landmark editorial in four affiliated military-focused publications calling for the Pentagon chief's ouster.

DOJ_NMG_0092947

On Thursday, the Army announced, as expected, that it would refer Watada's case to a general court-martial for refusing to deploy to Iraq.

What observers were closely watching was whether Lt. Gen. James Dubik, Ft. Lewis' commanding general, would also refer to trial charges involving critical public statements Watada made about the administration's war efforts.

Watada stated in a June news conference: "The war in Iraq is not only morally wrong but a horrible breach of American law…. The wholesale slaughter and mistreatment of Iraqis is not only a terrible moral injustice, but it is a contradiction to the Army's own law of land warfare. My participation would make me party to war crimes."

The Army contends that that statement and others — expressing shame over wearing the uniform to conduct a war he said was based on "misrepresentation and lies" — brought dishonor to the military.

In his decision, Dubik dismissed two of the speech-related charges of "contempt toward officials" but referred to trial four charges of "conduct unbecoming an officer." The lieutenant could be sentenced to a maximum of six years in prison.

Army officials were not available for comment.

Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz of Honolulu, said Saturday that he was disappointed that the Army had refused to negotiate on the charges. Seitz argued that Watada's statements, made off-duty and out of uniform, were permissible exercises of his free-speech rights.

The trial is "going to be a spectacle," Seitz said. "It's going to raise a lot of issues that frankly I don't understand why the Army wants to raise" in an antiwar political climate.

Watada, a Honolulu native who enlisted after the Sept. 11 attacks, said he gradually came to his conclusion that the Iraq war was illegal and immoral after his superiors told him to study up on it last year in preparation to deploy to Iraq in June with his Stryker brigade combat team.

Watada said he concluded that the war violated international and U.S. law because the administration failed to obtain U.N. Security Council authorization for it and secured congressional authorization based on wrong assertions that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and was linked to Al Qaeda.

The Nuremberg principles adopted after World War II, he said, require soldiers to disobey illegal orders.

Watada offered to deploy to Afghanistan or resign his commission instead, but the Army refused to allow that. Army spokesman Col. Dan Baggio told The Times in a previous interview that soldiers could not pick and choose their conflicts but must uphold their oath to follow orders.

Although some soldiers have fled the country, gone absent without leave, claimed conscientious-objector status or taken illegal drugs to avoid Iraq service, Watada said, it was never his aim to avoid combat per se.

"I felt I could never do any of that personally because I needed to take a stand and hold people accountable for this illegal and immoral war," he said. "It all boils down to 'What is the purpose of a soldier and officer?' And that is to serve the American people."

teresa.watanabe@latimes.com

Democrats Aim To Save Inquiry On Work In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz, David Johnston, Thom Shanker

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 — Congressional Democrats say they will press new legislation next week to restore the power of a federal agency in charge of ferreting out waste and corruption in Iraq and greatly increase its investigative reach.

The bills, the first of what are likely to be dozens of Democratic efforts to resurrect investigations of war profiteering and financial fraud in government contracting, could be introduced as early as Monday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0092948

The move would nullify a Republican-backed provision, slipped into a huge military authorization bill, that set a termination date for the agency, the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. The agency's findings have consistently undermined Bush administration claims of widespread success in the reconstruction of Iraq.

Oversight, the power wielded by Congressional committees to demand information and internal documents and to haul executive branch officials to hearings, by subpoena if necessary, is reverberating through Congress as a Democratic battle cry.

"The unilateral decision made by House Republicans to shut down this critical office should be reversed immediately," said Senator Harry Reid, the Nevada Democrat who is poised to become the majority leader.

The House version of the bill will be introduced by Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat likely to take over as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, a member of Mr. Skelton's staff said Friday. Mr. Skelton also said he would resurrect a subcommittee on oversight and investigations that was jettisoned by Republicans to investigate military spending.

In the Senate, Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who is in line to become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said that seeking a new strategy for Iraq would be his primary focus, but that he would also look carefully at military contracting.

"There have been serious allegations and evidence of misconduct among suppliers," Mr. Levin said. "And the taxpayers, of course, get socked on that. And the troops are not properly taken care of when that happens."

Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, said on Saturday that the administration was willing to have discussions with Congress on the proposal to extend the inspector general's tenure. Mr. Fratto added, "We have a history of cooperating fully with and supporting inspectors general."

Mr. Fratto said he could not speak more definitively on the subject because the legislation was yet to be released.

In a measure of the momentum behind the bill, it is expected to be introduced in the Senate by Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, along with co-sponsors Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, and Joseph I. Lieberman, who won re-election as an independent in Connecticut.

"It is inconceivable that we would remove this aggressive oversight while the American taxpayer is still spending billions of dollars on Iraq reconstruction projects," Ms. Collins said.

Mr. Reid has said that after the lame-duck session ends, the Democrats will press ahead with Congressional oversight, particularly on Iraq. But Democratic leaders have also been conciliatory in discussing broader efforts to review the administration's initiatives of the past six years.

The imperative to investigate financial misdeeds extends beyond the military. Congressional aides said that the House government reform committee under Representative Henry A. Waxman of California might also investigate spending related to domestic security and the response to Hurricane Katrina.

The Appropriations Committee, which is likely to be led by Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, is likely to review more closely spending like large supplementary requests for Iraq and Afghanistan.

In addition, after the negative political fallout of corruption cases involving lawmakers, the Appropriations Committee is under pressure to curtail earmarks, which are spending measures for specific projects not sought by a federal agency but sponsored by a lawmaker — sometimes anonymously and often for a financial supporter.

Potentially explosive confrontations over foreign policy issues between Democrats and the Bush administration may be unavoidable. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, who is expected to become the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, has been a critic of the C.I.A.'s secret detention program and the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program.

It is unclear how far chairmen like Mr. Rockefeller may push the administration to obtain more information about secret programs. The committee, like many others, has often degenerated into partisan rancor over the past two years, and Mr. Rockefeller, like other incoming chairmen, has told colleagues that one of his priorities is to restore the committee's historic bipartisanship.

But there is unlikely to be much downside for the Democrats in going after waste and fraud in government contracting, particularly in the Iraq war, which is not only unpopular with the American public but also where corporate giants like Halliburton, Parsons and Bechtel have committed highly publicized missteps in the rebuilding program.

DOJ_NMG_0092949

Investigations by the Iraq oversight agency, led by Stuart W. Bowen Jr., have already led to convictions of American occupation officials on bribery charges and uncovered many instances of substandard construction.

Mr. Bowen's investigations of Halliburton have uncovered tens of millions of dollars of charges for work that achieved little in the way of results, but apparently met the letter of the company's contract with the United States to repair oil facilities. Mr. Bowen has also found that Halliburton has been using federal loopholes to impede investigations of its work by declaring nearly all information about company activities in Iraq to be proprietary, or sensitive because it could aid the company's competitors.

So it came as a surprise to many that Mr. Bowen's office was directed to go out of business on Oct. 1, 2007, by an obscure provision in an authorization bill that President Bush signed last month. The termination language was quietly inserted into the bill by staff members working for Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who now leads the House Armed Services Committee.

As in the bill that the president signed, the new Senate proposal would expand the pot of money that Mr. Bowen could investigate, but it would not set a hard deadline for the agency's work to come to an end. Both the House and Senate measures extend the deadline at least into 2008, by most readings, but the House measure would also add about $2 billion — for training and equipping Iraqi security forces — to the amount that the agency could investigate, a Congressional staff member said. Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who is expected to become the House speaker, said she would strongly support that legislation.

"Democrats want the inspector general to stay at work until the job is done," Ms. Pelosi said. "Those individuals and companies responsible for shoddy work or fraudulent billing practices must be held accountable."

Several officials on Capitol Hill said that the locus of resistance to extending the tenure of Mr. Bowen's office came from the State Department, which believes that its own inspector general should begin taking on the job of investigating reconstruction in Iraq. But that notion finds resistance among some lawmakers who distrust the administration's will to investigate itself.

Outside the reconstruction program, some agencies are likely to be singled out for special scrutiny, not only the Pentagon, but also the Central Intelligence Agency and Federal Bureau of Investigation. Incoming Democratic chairman have said they plan to review the C.I.A.'s secret detention and interrogation program for important terrorism suspects and what some lawmakers have said is the sluggish pace of the F.B.I.'s effort to transform itself into a counterterrorism agency.

The Homeland Security Department has had at least some scrutiny from Congress in recent years, most particularly related to its performance and that of the Federal Emergency Management Agency during Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

But the new Democratic leaders, their aides said, intend to significantly broaden the oversight efforts, a step that may include more frequent subpoenas for administration officials who have declined to appear for some hearings, as was the case in the hurricane investigation.

One area that almost certainly will draw additional oversight is mass-transit security, said Dena L. Graziano, spokeswoman for Representative Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, who is expected to take over the House Committee on Homeland Security.

And Democrats have long argued that the administration is too focused on aviation security, and has failed to devote enough money or attention to preventing bombings like those that have occurred in Madrid and London. Some Democrats, nursing years of slights at the hands of Republican appointees in federal agencies who ignored or brushed aside hundreds of their letters asking for information, are eager for answers. The Senate Judiciary Committee has staff members trying to compile a complete list of unanswered questions.

Some Democrats said before the election that they would inquire more deeply into some issues, asking for fuller accountability among senior officers and civilian officials at the Pentagon over the harsh treatment of detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

"I think the accountability for Abu Ghraib has not yet been accomplished in terms of finding out who was involved, at what level," said Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island.

For all the pledges of rigorous oversight, Democrats are moving warily, fearful of a misstep, mainly in national security areas, that could return them to the sidelines as a minority party.

DOJ_NMG_0092950

That may explain the focus on less volatile issues like waste and fraudulent spending and why few Democrats are proposing inquiries on hot-button issues, like the underlying rationale for the war in Iraq or the underpinning for the administration's counterterrorism policies.

Agendas are likely to shift over time, particularly in the House, where the leadership lineup will not be known with certainty for weeks. In addition, the transfer of majority control in both chambers means Republicans and Democrats must switch offices in the House and Senate. Republicans will be forced to dismiss some committee staff members, and Democrats will expand their workforce, in some committees nearly doubling staff size.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Skelton said that in the past, "the Congress has not worked, and has not asked the tough questions or held the administration to account."

But he said it was the responsibility of every Democrat taking over a subcommittee chairmanship also to apply more scrutiny to government action, and not just those of subcommittees specifically charged with that mandate.

"Our subcommittee chairmen will be able to bring oversight back to their individual subcommittees," he said.

Despite Billions Spent, Rebuilding Incomplete (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

For a little more than $38 billion, the United States and its contractors in Iraq have provided 4.6 million people with access to water. They have distributed seeds to Iraqi farmers, improving wheat harvests. With electricity-generating capacity now above prewar levels, they have given many Iraqis more daily hours of power. They have repaired more than 5,000 schools and vaccinated 4.6 million children against polio.

The list goes on. But as the U.S.-led, U.S.-funded portion of Iraq's reconstruction nears its end, American officials and contractors alike are grappling with a cold reality: Thousands of successes in Iraq may add up to a single failure.

"We accomplished a significant amount of work. But it was just overwhelmed by the overlay of violence," said Clifford G. Mumm, who has spent much of the past three years in Iraq managing projects for Bechtel Corp. "It's hard to be very optimistic."

U.S.-funded projects have long been a target for sabotage. Many of those that were spared remain unused by a population paralyzed by violence.

Yet those inside the reconstruction effort say security concerns were hardly the only problem. Poor planning and coordination by U.S. officials meant that even successful individual projects failed to do the job; for example, health-care centers were built at great cost but had no water and sewer service. Poor work-site management by contractors meant that some projects went awry. And now that the United States is handing over reconstruction efforts to Iraq, many involved with the process worry that the Iraqis don't have the training or the money to keep U.S.-built facilities running.

This was not how the rebuilding of Iraq was supposed to go. In the fall of 2003, six months after the U.S. invasion, President Bush promised Iraq "the greatest financial commitment of its kind since the Marshall Plan." Top administration aides said they considered that plan, which helped rebuild Europe after World War II, to be a model for Iraq. Congress soon passed a spending bill that, while offering less money than the Marshall Plan, was expected to be enough to get Iraq back on its feet.

Riding through the streets of the northern city of Mosul three years later, taxi driver Sattar Khalid Othman has barely noticed.

"What reconstruction?" Othman said in an interview last week. "Today we are drinking untreated water from a plant built decades ago that was never maintained. The electricity only visits us two hours a day. And now we are going backwards. We cook on the firewood we gather from the forests because of the gas shortage."

Othman's view is shared by many across the country. In interviews last week, Iraqis expressed frustration not just with the United States but with Iraqi leaders, too, for pocketing aid money that was supposed to be for everyone.

"When the occupation came and we heard the promises, we said, 'Now the conditions in the city will improve.' But things got worse," said Ahmed Mohammed, 45, a teacher in the central province of Salah al-Din. "We know that large amounts of money have been dedicated to the city, but they were all stolen."

DOJ_NMG_0092951

The United States has committed more than $38 billion to reconstructing Iraq, far more than any other nation, according to the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction. Most of that money is now gone. Three-quarters of the primary fund for rebuilding has been spent and the rest has been set aside for finishing key projects.

Overall, 88 percent of planned projects -- about 12,000 -- have been completed, with just 4 percent yet to begin.

Yet tallying finished projects can be a misleading way of measuring success.

"We knew it wasn't a matter of how many projects were completed. It was a matter of: Is the electricity flowing to Baghdad? Is there security on the streets? Is the oil flowing? Those were the things that mattered," said Jon C. Bowersox, who until this summer was the health attache at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. "Too often, though, from what I could see, it was all about the process -- how many hundreds of millions of dollars you had put under contract -- and not the product."

In the transportation sector, for example, the numbers look good. The United States has finished repairs on 86 of 98 railway stations. But few trains run because of security concerns. In the oil sector, despite the fact that production capacity has nearly returned to prewar levels, the country had a severe fuel shortage this summer because of high demand and sabotage.

Millions of children have received vaccinations and thousands of health-care workers have been trained. But more than 100 health-care facilities that were scheduled to be finished by now instead are empty because the contractors assigned to build them did not get their jobs done.

The problem, Bowersox said, was that the plan to build new facilities across the country was too ambitious. "We could have gone in and done low-cost rehabs, and not tried to transform their health-care system in two years," he said.

Bechtel was responsible for one of the facilities that was not finished: a children's hospital in the southern city of Basra that was supposed to provide world-class care and had been championed by first lady Laura Bush.

Mumm, the Bechtel manager, said the project, which is just an empty shell today, could not continue because of security threats. "It was impossible to get people to come to work. They were threatened every which way," Mumm said. Fifty-two people associated with company projects died, most of them Iraqi. Overall, 650 civilian contractors have died working on U.S.-funded reconstruction.

Not every U.S.-backed effort came under assault. CHF International, a Silver Spring nonprofit organization, has operated in Iraq since the U.S. invasion, completing hundreds of projects on slim budgets.

The organization's Middle East director, Bruce Parmelee, said CHF has avoided violence because local communities were always involved in the work. "Before we could do anything, the community would have to agree. I would tell them, 'It's for your community. You're the Iraqis. You can pave the way for this to happen.' And they did that," said Parmelee, who spent months at a time living among Iraqis in the areas where CHF worked. "It was never a case of some American saying, 'This is what you need in your country.' People won't attack projects that they feel ownership of."

That community-based approach, he said, wasn't broadly shared by others involved in the reconstruction. "Large contractors didn't necessarily have that mandate," he said. "Security was challenged right from the beginning, so a majority of decisions were made behind a bulletproof shield."

Bringing Iraqis into the process early also made it easier to transfer projects to Iraqi control, Parmelee said. Auditors surveying U.S. efforts have been warning for more than a year that all will be for naught unless Iraqis are trained in how to operate, maintain and pay for their new facilities. Last month, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., wrote that the process for transferring U.S. assets to the Iraqis "appears to have broken down."

"Many successful projects have been completed," Bowen said. "Whether they are operating within a sustainable Iraqi infrastructure is yet to be answered."

Many Iraqis say they're looking forward to playing a bigger part in their country's rebuilding. But given the security situation, they don't know that they'll have any more success than the Americans did.

"The insurgents targeted the contractors by killing, kidnapping, slaughtering them and forcing them to pay enormous ransoms, till all the work stopped," said Fawzi al-Nieami, who works in construction in Mosul. "Now there are lots of profitable contracts, but no one dares to take them."

Democrats And Iraq (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0092952

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

The Democrats will not be able to savor their victory for long. Americans are waiting to hear if they have any good ideas for how to get out of Iraq without creating even wider chaos and terrorism.

Criticizing President Bush's gross mismanagement of the war was a winning electoral strategy. But criticism will not extricate the United States from this mess, nor will it persuade voters that the Democrats are ready to take back the White House.

Let us be clear. The responsibility for all that has gone wrong lies squarely with Mr. Bush. Even with control of the Congress, the Democrats' role in changing things will be hortatory. And while we too are eager to hear the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group — better known as the (James) Baker commission — it should be the start, and not the end, of a bipartisan discussion on Iraq strategy. The Democrats need to be ready to play a full role.

Under Republican control, Congress has exercised virtually no oversight of the administration's misconduct of the war, and the new Democratic leadership is eager to hold extensive hearings. The public deserves a full accounting (backed by subpoenas, if necessary) of how prewar intelligence was cooked, why American troops were sent to war without adequate armor, and where billions of dollars in reconstruction aid disappeared to.

The Democrats will also need to look forward — and quickly. So far they have shared slogans, but no real policy. During the campaign, their most common call was for a "phased redeployment" — a euphemism for withdrawal — of American troops starting before the end of this year.

Threatening to pull out may be the only way to get cooperation from Iraq's prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, who is thwarting even the most limited American efforts to disarm militias and set timetables for genuine political compromise on the most fundamental issues, like protecting minority rights and fairly apportioning the country's oil wealth.

Unless America's exit plans are coupled with a more serious effort to build up Iraq's security forces and mediate its sectarian divisions, a phased withdrawal will only hasten Iraq's descent into civil war — while placing American soldiers who remain behind in even greater danger. We also fear that Iraqis will have no interest in anything but retribution, until they see that security and rebuilding are possible. For that reason we have suggested one last push to stabilize Baghdad. That would require at least a temporary increase in American and Iraqi troops on Baghdad streets.

We are skeptical of calls, by some Democrats, to divide the country into three ethnically based regions. Most Iraqis — except for the Kurds — show little enthusiasm for the idea. And while there has been horrific ethnic cleansing, it hasn't yet got to the point that boundaries could be drawn without driving many more people from their homes.

Such ideas deserve a full discussion, something the United States has not had since its troops first rolled into Iraq. We are not sure that any shift in strategy can contain the disaster. But we are sure that even a few weeks more of drift and confusion will guarantee more chaos and suffering once American troops leave. Voters gave the Democrats the floor — and are now waiting to hear what they have to say.

Anti-corruption Official In Iraq Accused Of Fraud (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

The head of the Commission on Public Integrity says he is the target of an intimidation campaign.

BAGHDAD — Iraq's top anticorruption watchdog, a high-profile judge whose efforts have been hailed by Americans as one of the few bright spots in the country, is himself the target of a corruption probe, officials said Saturday.

Judge Radhi Radhi, head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, is under investigation by court authorities, accused of turning his 1,700-employee agency into a personal fiefdom and padding his salary with an extra $50,000 a year.

Radhi denies the charges, arguing that they're part of a campaign of intimidation by government officials to quash his investigations, which include examinations of corruption in ministries controlled by Iraq's dominant Shiite Muslim parties.

He said he has come under pressure to shut down his commission or cede its independent status. The government has ignored his requests for information, threatened his legal mandate and demanded he halt his investigations, said Radhi, who is a Shiite, but secular.

DOJ_NMG_0092953

"They tell me, 'You are not a ministry to be giving us orders,' " he said in an interview Saturday. "There are voices among them who say there is no need for this commission."

Lawmakers have threatened not only to remove Radhi from his post for alleged incompetence, but to prosecute him for corruption, as detailed in an Oct. 29 affidavit submitted to the Supreme Judicial Council.

"I don't want him to be just removed from his post, I want him to be punished according to the law," said Sheik Sabah Saadi, a Shiite lawmaker who heads the parliamentary anti-corruption committee and has spearheaded the efforts against Radhi. "We have found financial and administrative corruption inside the integrity commission."

Transparency International, a Berlin-based organization that monitors official graft, patronage and bribery, lists Iraq as the world's third most corrupt nation, behind Haiti and Myanmar.

U.S. officials have hailed Radhi's work. He has pushed for the prosecution of several former ministers and uncovered corruption in the Interior Ministry, which has been infiltrated by Shiite militias. His targets have included former Defense Minister Hazem Shaalan and former Electricity Minister Ayham Sameraei.

Radhi has worked closely with Stuart W. Bowen Jr. of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, a U.S. agency created to investigate waste and fraud by U.S. officials and contractors in Iraq. That agency's legal mandate has run out, and it may soon be folded.

The integrity commission, too, rests on precarious legal ground. It was created by an order of an American, L. Paul Bremer III, head of the former Coalition Provisional Authority, and has never been written into Iraqi law. Iraqi legislators have stalled a vote on whether to give the commission permanent status or dissolve it and let government inspectors audit their own agencies.

The affidavit submitted against Radhi accuses him of hiring staff without publicly advertising jobs.

"We have documents and we have witnesses," Saadi said in a telephone interview from Basra. "It is not a mere accusation."

Saadi also charged that Radhi has managed to show relatively few results, despite the nearly $20 million his agency has been allocated. Saadi called his work sloppy and unprofessional. His few successes, such as his pursuit of Shaalan, were uncovered by others, he said. Under Shaalan, who is no longer in Iraq, billions of dollars disappeared from the Defense Ministry.

"There is no clear strategy to combat corruption," said Saadi, who plans to hold a news conference in coming days to make public his battle against Radhi.

The commission's work "amounts to listening to complaints on a hotline and forwarding those complaints to the inspector general" of each ministry, he said, without determining whether they are true.

Radhi said he had grown used to nasty accusations by the targets of his investigations. Shaalan accused him of being partisan, and Mishaan Jaburi, a Sunni lawmaker who fled the country after being indicted on charges of stealing millions, accused Radhi of pursuing a sectarian agenda.

Radhi said the pressure on his office might be a reaction to his attempts to ferret out corruption in key Shiite-controlled ministries.

Among his commission's current investigations are the quality of food purchased by the Trade Ministry for monthly rations, the disappearance of petroleum products under the supervision of the Oil Ministry, a lack of progress in refurbishing the railroad system and misconduct by 451 police officers who work in the Interior Ministry. Each ministry involved is controlled by a Shiite politician.

Times staff writer Raheem Salman contributed to this report.

Could A New Strongman Help? (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

BAGHDAD - THE sight of Saddam Hussein haranguing the court that sentenced him to death last week in Baghdad may have done little to slow his trip to the gallows, which looks ever more likely to come early next year if the appellate court, as expected, moves swiftly to uphold the sentence.

But Mr. Hussein's outbursts served to remind many Iraqis, even those who hated him most, of something they crave in the rudderless nightmare Iraq has become under his successors: a strong leader, able to forge a nation from the country's fractious ethnic and religious groups, and to end the current wave of sectarian bloodletting that, left to build on itself, could ultimately match the mass killing that characterized Mr. Hussein's psychopathic years in power.

DOJ_NMG_0092954

It is something ordinary Iraqis say with growing intensity, even as they agree on little else. Let there be a strongman, they say, not a relentless killer like Saddam Hussein but somebody who will take the hammer to the insurgents and the death squads and the kidnappers and the criminal gangs who have banished all pretense of civility from their lives.

Let him ride roughshod, if he must, they say, over the niceties of due process and human rights, indeed over the panoply of democratic institutions America has tried to implant here, if only he can bring peace.

The message appears, so far, to have found little resonance in Washington as President Bush sets out, after the shock of the midterm elections, to review American policy on Iraq. The closest anyone with the White House's ear has come to suggesting anything short of democratic rule, let alone an authoritarian model typical of other countries in the Middle East, are leaks from the bipartisan commission headed by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, which is charged with suggesting a new American approach to Iraq; some of its members have said that the group has considered recommending that stability, rather than democracy, should become the principal objective there.

For the Bush administration, which made democracy-building here a cornerstone of everything it did after the American-led invasion, abandoning that goal now would be tantamount to abandoning one of its core missions. Coming on top of the failure to find the weapons of mass destruction that were the original justification for going to war with Mr. Hussein, it would constitute an about-face of historic proportions. But many Iraqis believe that it may now be the only hope — and a slim one, at that — of halting their country's descent into catastrophe.

Of the many hard lessons America may take from its enterprise here, the impracticality of grafting American political values onto a society as different as Iraq's, by measure of culture, religion and historical experience, will surely be one. History may judge that attempting it in the midst of a savage war was the greatest of follies. Far from Iraq becoming a beacon of democracy for the Middle East, some Arab scholars have said, the violence in Iraq will embolden other Arab leaders who defend their authoritarianism as a bulwark against chaos.

Lately, President Bush has put less emphasis on building democracy in his evolving definition of the American objective in Iraq. "A government that can defend, govern and sustain itself" was the way he put it at his news conference on Wednesday, a formulation that suggests that he, too, may have reduced the focus on the Jeffersonian ideals prevalent in the headier days after the American-led invasion. Then, L. Paul Bremer III, head of the American occupation authority, set aside $750 million for what was called "democracy building," sometimes with results that bordered on the comical.

One example was a democracy center in the southern city of Hilla, led by a man Mr. Bremer described as one of the most remarkable Iraqis he had met, Sayyid Farquat al-Qizwini. Mr. Qizwini, a towering figure with a bird's-nest beard and a black turban signifying his descent from the Prophet Mohammed, moved onto the American payroll after he "liberated" a mosque Saddam Hussein had built and named for himself, and used it for democracy classes for Shiite imams and tribal leaders. Away from the Americans, Mr. Qizwini liked to make a joke of the enterprise, saying he had once had to sing the praises of Mr. Hussein and, for $100 a day, was happy to do the same for the Americans.

The American enterprise in Iraq has had its high points, notably the three occasions when Iraqis went to the polls in their millions — the election in January 2005 for a transitional government; the referendum in October 2005 on a new Constitution; and a second election in December 2005 for the four-year government now in office. For anyone who experienced the brutal repression under Mr. Hussein — and the single-candidate "referendum" in 2002 that gave him a new, seven-year presidential term with a claimed 100 percent of the vote — there was something intoxicating in the sight of Iraqis voting freely for the first time in their history, with dozens of parties contesting for their support.

But in hindsight, the elections, far from bringing Iraqis together, served to harden the divides of ethnicity and religion. In the two elections, only a tiny percentage of the votes went to secular parties that bridged those divides. The big winners were Shiite religious groups whose objective was to secure Shiite domination after centuries of subordination to the minority Sunnis, and to extend the role of Islam in the national life. The Americans succeeded in drawing moderate Sunnis into the political process, and later into a subordinate role in the national government. But the net effect of the elections, for many Sunnis, has been to ratify their new status as second-class citizens in the new Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0092955

Now the divides are wider than ever, entrenched by Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads that are locked in a sectarian nightmare of suicide bombings, kidnappings and mass executions. America's 150,000 troops are caught in the middle, hunting killers on both sides, but finding little partnership from the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

After pledging from the outset of his tenure six months ago to act decisively against the militias that spawn the death squads, Mr. Maliki has so far resisted any concrete actions to disarm or demobilize them. Instead, he bows to Shiite leaders in the coalition who control the two most powerful militias, the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization.

If anything, Mr. Maliki's standing, outside the Shiite religious constituency he represents, is lower now than that of his predecessor as prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whose year at the head of the transitional government was notable, American officials say, for its lethargy and corruption.

So plainly disaffected have the Americans become with Mr. Maliki that he used a telephone call with Mr. Bush last month to ask if the White House planned to unseat him. Aides to the prime minister said he sought and received Mr. Bush's reassurance after picking up rumors in the Green Zone government compound that American officials were feeling out Iraqi politicians on the possibility of replacing the Maliki administration with a "national salvation government" to be headed by an unnamed "Shiite strongman."

The leading candidate for strongman, among secular Iraqis, at least, would be Ayad Allawi, whom the Americans named prime minister in the first post-Hussein government, in 2004. Mr. Allawi, though Shiite, has strong ties with Sunnis, and a reputation as a hard man that goes back to his time as a young Baathist enforcer. During his government, as much as $1 billion in Iraqi defense funds went missing, Iraqi officials have alleged, but no charges have been brought against him. These days, out of government, he spends most of his time at his family home in London.

But even if President Bush were convinced that Mr. Maliki should go, it is far from clear that the Americans would have the means to get rid of him.

The mechanism for any such move could hardly be so crude as the American-backed overthrow of President Ngo Dinh Diem of South Vietnam in 1963; he ended up dead, a bullet in his head, in the rear of an American-made armored personal carrier outside Saigon's presidential palace. The obvious route in Baghdad would lie through the Iraqi Parliament, where the ruling Shiites, bitterly divided among themselves, control the government through a shaky alliance with Kurdish parties.

A parliamentary coup might unseat Mr. Maliki personally, but it would be much tougher to shake power loose from the Shiite religious groups. Those parties have been held together by the overarching influence of Iraq's most powerful Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani.

The ayatollah is keenly aware of the lessons of the 1920's, when Shiites split among themselves, rose in rebellion against the British colonial administration and ultimately lost power to the Sunnis. From his cloistered existence in the holy city of Najaf, he has told the Shiites that they must hang together at all costs.

So far, they have, and little now on the horizon suggests that is likely to change.

Romania Vows Not To 'Abandon' Iraq (AP)

By William J. Kole, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 12, 2006

Romania has no intentions of withdrawing its troops from the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, President Traian Basescu said Saturday, vowing to stay "because it's a dishonor to leave your allies."

In an interview with The Associated Press, Basescu said he empathized with mounting calls to withdraw the country's 608 non-combat personnel in Iraq, including impassioned pleas from the families of those serving.

But "Romania's honor is greater than its feelings," he said.

"An exit strategy is a matter of concern for us, and we are building it with our main allies, the U.S. and the U.K. But the states that form the coalition cannot abandon Iraq as it is now," he said after addressing reporters at a presidential retreat about 60 miles northeast of Bucharest.

"We have an obligation to the Iraqi people. We will leave when the local authorities can provide security for the people," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0092956

Basescu also lashed out at Britain for announcing restrictions on Romanians trying to seek jobs there after the ex-communist country joins the European Union on Jan. 1.

"Romania isn't a perfect country. It has good features, but also people who steal, who drink," he said. "At the same time, it is hard for us to accept that countries such as Britain have imposed measures that are tougher than those imposed on the nations that joined (the EU) in 2004."

"We are not afraid to call this discrimination, and it's very difficult for us to accept such treatment," he said.

Ireland has also said it would limit the number of workers from Romania and fellow EU newcomer Bulgaria after Jan. 1. Basescu said he hoped employers would pressure the two countries to overturn the proposed restrictions.

"I didn't see them so outraged to have our troops fighting side by side with them in Iraq," said Basescu, 55, a tough-talking former sea captain who made it a priority after his 2004 election to forge closer ties with Britain and the U.S.

Romania and Bulgaria are being admitted under unprecedented EU conditions that will require both countries, which shook off communism in 1989, to report back every six months and ensure they are making progress on key reforms — or risk losing lucrative EU subsidies.

But Basescu said Romania would be "a pleasant surprise" for the EU, and would make important economic, social and cultural contributions. He also underscored Romania's key role in securing the 1,680-mile frontier along the Black Sea and the non-EU countries of Serbia, Moldova and Ukraine.

Steering His Nation Without A Rudder (LAT)

By Paul Watson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

Afghanistan's Karzai faces disaffection in a nation hungry for progress. Many see him as a shadow of a president, and they fear a slide back to the Taliban.

TRIBAL elders pleaded with Hamid Karzai to intervene in a land feud with their neighbors. But it was too dangerous for the president of Afghanistan to travel south to the heart of the Taliban insurgency, so Karzai invited them up to Kabul for lunch.

At least 120 men arrived, making their way past razor wire strung out a mile from the palace doors. After being repeatedly frisked and scanned, they finally passed through the palace gates.

The desert dust still clung to their plastic sandals and tattered clothes as they sat down under vaulted ceilings and crystal chandeliers. Waiters in black uniforms served up platters of roast chicken legs and heaping plates of pulau rice with raisins, almonds and pistachios.

The elders of the Tokhi and Hotak tribes, ethnic Pashtuns from Zabol province, ate their meal off fine china and washed it down with tumblers of doogh, a salty yogurt drink sprinkled with chopped mint.

Karzai, 48, himself the son of a Pashtun chief, assured them that he would try to find a solution to their 40-year-old argument with the Nasir tribe.

"My father spent all of his life solving tribal problems, and I was with him the whole time," he said. The elders muttered skeptically.

Most presidents don't concern themselves with tribal disputes, but Karzai, like Afghan kings of old, makes local quarrels part of his daily routine.

Five years after the fall of Kabul, aides say he is turning to tradition as he struggles to build a stable democracy on a foundation of war, corruption, foreign interference and religious extremism. Critics counter that he is retreating behind the walls of his 19th century palace and losing touch with a country sinking deeper into trouble.

But Karzai's foreign backers have left him with little real power, and his weak, corruption-riddled government lacks direct control over billions of dollars in development aid, money meant to help Karzai win Afghan support for his administration.

After the United States joined forces with Afghanistan's Northern Alliance militia to oust the Taliban regime, it pledged to help rebuild the country and chose Karzai to lead the effort. Since then, foreign donors have spent at least $16 billion in Afghanistan; more than $10.3 billion of that has come from the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0092957

Afghanistan has made enormous progress in some areas. With hopes for a better future soaring, its citizens defied insurgent threats to elect Karzai to a full term two years ago and to choose a parliament last year. The elections were the freest and fairest in the country's history.

Under Karzai, more than 90% of Afghan children are in school, compared with fewer than 20% during Taliban rule. A multinational effort is training an army that is halfway to its goal of 70,000 soldiers in uniform, as it strives to overcome ethnic divisions, equipment problems and low morale. Parliament is gradually asserting its authority. A full quarter of the members are women.

But the progress has not met the rising expectations of Karzai's countrymen. Many see the nation slipping back into the grip of violence, corruption and extremism from which the West promised to liberate them.

On paper, the post-Taliban constitution gives Afghanistan's president ample power. But parliament wrangled with Karzai for months over his Cabinet picks and rejected his nominee to head the Supreme Court.

He has had better success shuffling provincial governors, but several are still regarded as corrupt and ineffective. Central government influence remains weak in large parts of the country.

Perhaps Karzai's greatest strength is giving pep talks to Afghans at news conferences and in speeches, urging them to unite and solve their problems. Still, many say they would prefer honest justice, jobs and peace to fine words.

From ethnic minorities in the north to his fellow Pashtuns in the south, Karzai faces the same growing disaffection.

Sitting on a curb in the northern city of Mazar-i-Sharif, Sanam Shah spoke of the Karzai era's mixed blessings. A mother of eight and an ethnic Uzbek, she suffers kidney and digestive problems and traveled from her desert village of Andkhoi to find a good doctor.

Foreign aid has delivered new equipment to her local clinic, but none of the employees are properly trained to use it, she said, speaking through the mesh of her white burka veil. "I think Karzai is doing a fine job, but nothing has changed in my life," she said.

Hundreds of miles to the south in Lowgar, the owner of a two-pump gas station, a Pashtun, said he was unemployed under the Taliban but was able start his own business when U.S. aid rebuilt the highway.

But the Taliban are back, scaring off customers by ambushing cars at night, said Hekmatullah, who, like many Afghans, uses one name.

"Power is back in the hands of those who had it before, like warlords, the Taliban and thieves," he said. "Nobody pays attention to poor people like us."

In the eyes of Afghans, the restrictions on Karzai's authority imposed by foreign governments make him a shadow of a president with only the trappings of power: photo opportunities, ribbon cuttings, bodyguards with wraparound sunglasses who carry M-4 assault rifles and whisper into microphones in the sleeves of their dark suits.

Although Karzai is officially commander in chief, he has no control over the foreign troops fighting the Taliban insurgency and little over his own army, which answers to the United States and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. His defense minister's main job is cajoling donors into providing the army with better equipment.

Karzai repeatedly has demanded changes in tactics, but each time foreign troops accidentally kill Afghan civilians, he loses credibility with his people.

In the meantime, the insurgency has spread across more than half the country, with fighters advancing northward from strongholds in the east and pushing all the way to the Iranian border in the west. Government officials say the militants in villages and districts near Kabul, the capital, are laying the groundwork for future offensives.

Former mujahedin retain ties to their old commanders, and many are ready to fight again if democracy falters.

Corruption in the courts and police has made many Afghans nostalgic for the Taliban's ruthless justice. The threat of violence has forced hundreds of schools to close and left others without enough books or teachers.

The country's gross domestic product has doubled since Karzai came to office, but the drug trade is the largest employer and source of income. Drugs account for half of Afghanistan's economy and create what the United Nations calls a "narco society."

DOJ_NMG_0092958

Despite hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign aid aimed at persuading farmers to grow legal crops, this year's opium harvest is expected to set a record. It's up 50% from last year, to an estimated 6,700 tons, the U.N. said in early September.

Though reconstruction spending could help the government draw support away from drug lords, the Taliban and other foes, only a quarter of public spending goes through the Afghan government, World Bank figures show.

U.S. money supports a wide variety of projects to improve agriculture and government institutions, support schools and clinics, and rebuild roads, bridges, canals and other infrastructure destroyed by war. But unlike Britain and a few other countries, the United States has not demonstrated confidence in Karzai's government by giving it direct control of the funds.

William Byrd, senior economic advisor at the World Bank office in Kabul, said more of the money should be channeled through the government, allowing Afghans to learn to handle it and showing respect for the country's sovereignty.

"The only way to get these government systems going is to start working with them, and in them, rather than on parallel tracks outside," he said.

Aid groups and their contractors are also guilty of corruption, but they aren't accountable to Afghan voters, said Jawed Ludin, Karzai's chief of staff.

"Democracy is about the empowerment of people," Ludin said in an interview. "To make democracy in Afghanistan real, we should give the Afghan people the sense that they can control things, that they can implement their own decisions."

Journey from Pakistan

UNTIL the war to oust the Taliban five years ago, Osama bin Laden and other Al Qaeda leaders were comfortably entrenched in Afghanistan and Karzai was living in exile in Pakistan, trying to organize opposition.

Karzai shared a Pashtun heritage with most of the Taliban. His father, Abdul Ahad Karzai, was chief of the Popalzai tribe. Karzai inherited that post when his father was killed in 1999 in what was widely regarded as a warning from the Taliban to Pashtuns who opposed them.

In October 2001, with the war underway, Karzai entered southern Afghanistan with a small group of armed men, including U.S. Special Forces, to rally tribal leaders on the mullahs' home turf.

For those Afghans suspicious of U.S. intentions, Karzai's close ties to the U.S. military were an issue from the start. When Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld announced that an American chopper had rescued Karzai from a firefight with the Taliban, Karzai insisted that he had walked away from the battle and never left Afghanistan.

Still, Ludin now cites that incursion into the Taliban heartland as a sad irony.

"The president and American Special Forces were going in a leisurely fashion from village to village in 2001, and they were welcomed everywhere," Ludin said. "And everywhere they went, the Taliban were driven away from those villages, districts and provinces without a fight."

Five years later, President Karzai can't risk a visit to his home region. "Now these same areas are seen as hotbeds of the Taliban and terrorism," Ludin said. "Today, if the president wants to go to Kandahar, he needs massive security arrangements."

Ludin blames Pakistan for reviving an insurgency that once looked to be on its last legs.

After they were ousted from power in 2001, the Taliban retreated to bases in Pakistan, where the military's powerful Inter-Services Intelligence agency had once nurtured them. From there, the Taliban and its allies regrouped in eastern and southern Afghanistan, U.S. military intelligence documents say.

Washington today regards Pakistan as a key ally in fighting terrorism, but many Afghans suspect the country of playing a double game, cooperating with the United States while fostering the Taliban insurgency.

Karzai wants the U.S. to do more to stop the insurgency at its roots in Pakistan, but Washington strongly supports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

Karzai's frustration over tactics used by the U.S. and allied military forces, including the continued bombing of civilian areas, is raw. Senior Afghan officials are surprisingly frank about the dangers of foreign military dominance.

Despite the success in uniting Afghanistan's fractured ethnic groups into a national army, a senior aide to Karzai, speaking on condition of anonymity, called the army a "sort of lame-duck institution" without the capacity to make decisions.

"It will fall the instant that the U.S. military is not behind it," the official said.

An open tent

DOJ_NMG_0092959

KARZAI lives and works in an 83-acre compound called the Arg-e-Shahi, or Citadel of the King, which was built in 1880 to replace a royal fortress destroyed by British troops. Three miles and a world away, one of his chief critics, Ramazan Bashar Dost, holds court in a large canvas tent in Kabul's main park. Outside, noisy children chase soccer balls in the swirling dust.

Each afternoon, Dost, a member of Afghanistan's parliament, sits next to a small, round folding table, framed by two yellow tent poles sunk into a dirt floor honeycombed with cracks. He listens quietly as Afghans vent their anger over corruption, unemployment and other ills.

Dost has become a kind of anti-Karzai, a French-educated intellectual who presides over a humble court of last resort where anyone is free to take a seat and gripe or ask for help, no appointment required. He is in high demand as ordinary Afghans wait their turn to complain about big issues such as corruption and foreign interference, or something as small as bullies at school.

Dozens duck through the tent flap each day, joining a circle of people waiting on plastic patio chairs in the dim light of a bare bulb. Some of Dost's visitors are fellow intellectuals who come to debate policy; others are activists who lobby for legislative agendas. But, like most of the people clamoring for Karzai's time, the majority in Dost's tent are seeking solutions to personal problems.

A few bedsheet banners hang on the tent's faded yellow walls. One explains the meaning of democracy in Dari, one of Afghanistan's main languages.

"Demo = people, cracy = government," it explains. "The famous definition by Abraham Lincoln is government of the people, for the people and by the people."

Dost resigned as planning minister last year after Karzai refused to let him shut down most nongovernmental aid agencies, which Dost claimed were embezzling money. The controversy made Dost one of Afghanistan's most admired politicians.

He offers a sympathetic ear to Afghans who feel wronged by the system. Even if Dost can't solve their problems, the visitors seem to leave feeling they've accomplished something. At least he sat and listened, which is more than most felt they got from bureaucrats.

Afghans also rely on Dost to tell uncomfortable truths if he can't pressure Afghan officials to do so first. As an example, he cites the roughly $60,000 a month the government had been paying two German experts to fix the national airline, Ariana. "Ariana has become worse. It is more dangerous," he said.

Meanwhile, the families of men who died fighting the Soviets in the 1980s get no more than $6 a month in compensation. "The Afghan people see this gap between $6 and $60,000 and they say they cannot accept this impossible situation," Dost said.

Examples like that are, "in my opinion, the biggest reason why the Taliban have become so strong in Afghanistan," he said. "Now the Afghan people have lost their trust in the international community."

Karzai's leadership style is making matters worse, Dost said. "He has a tribal image of the state. He believes that he's not a president of a country, but he's a father of a family, or a chief of a tribe."

One summer evening, a 22-year-old orphan came to ask Dost's help in finding money to launch an agency for street children and other orphans. Another young man wanted Dost to arrange a transfer to a safer high school because thugs were threatening him.

Dost took notes and gave the men slips of paper with the phone numbers of government officials who might help. But he didn't hold out much hope.

"For Afghan people, democracy means you can do anything you want," Dost said. "There are no rules, no laws, no justice or authority. When you have power now in Afghanistan, then you have the money, and you can have everything."

Behind palace walls

IN contrast to Dost's tent, Karzai's door is difficult to pass through. Few Afghans are allowed onto the palace grounds, and those who are must make their way through at least five high-security layers. Dogs sniff for explosives. Guards scrutinize pens, key chains and other everyday items.

A suspected Taliban militant tried to assassinate Karzai in 2002 as he waved from an open-roofed car in Kandahar, his hometown. Karzai's American guards killed the would-be assassin. Now his trips outside Kabul are infrequent.

DOJ_NMG_0092960

Karzai allowed an intimate look behind the scenes on two difficult days this summer as he toiled in his palace. He declined to sit for an interview, but he allowed a reporter and photographer to watch him maneuver the shifting sands of Afghan politics, culture and war.

The president's office is in the two-story Gul Khana, or House of Flowers, whose outer walls have softball-sized patches where masons have filled in hundreds of shrapnel holes from Afghanistan's long years of war. He lives there with his wife, Zinat, an OB-GYN who stays mostly out of the public eye. They have no children.

His is a draining schedule. Karzai, who earned a degree in political science in India, works seven days a week, 12 hours a day, normally starting with a briefing from his intelligence chief.

On a routine day this summer, he met with French Defense Minister Michele Alliot-Marie. That was followed by a meeting with his two vice presidents and other senior officials to discuss Cabinet nominations.

Karzai sat in a high-backed chair behind a large wooden desk that had a small globe of colored stone in one corner. His officials sat at a glass-topped boardroom table, polished to such a gloss that it mirrored Karzai.

Then Karzai had lunch with the elders from Zabol.

The petitioners were reaching for the toothpicks when Mohammed Nabi Tokhi, a retired senator who is said to be more than 100 years old, rose from his seat next to Karzai.

His fiery eyes were magnified by the thick lenses of black-rimmed glasses. Tottering to a microphone stand, he said a prayer for the president and then railed against the Nasir tribe, whom he accused of stealing about 2,500 acres of Tokhi land in the 1960s.

"They are a faithless tribe, a tribe of cowards," he said, his voice rising. "There is no way that we and the Nasirs will ever be able to live together in one area."

There was little Karzai could do that wouldn't anger one side. So he passed the problem to a special commission and urged his bickering fellow Pashtuns to talk to each other.

"No matter what you say," he told the Zabol elders, "you have to accept one thing: The Nasiris are also an Afghan tribe and they have equal rights with other tribes, don't they? Are they the sons of this nation or not?"

"Yes," a few men replied. Others grumbled or pushed past Karzai's guards to press their own petitions into his hands.

Afterward, Karzai retreated to his inner office, where he usually has some quiet time each afternoon. Typically he settles into a leather armchair to watch news on a large flat-screen TV or read a book before returning to his official schedule, which often runs until 10 p.m.

The next day, Karzai received a delegation of about 30 villagers from Oruzgan province, where U.S. bombers had killed about 60 civilians along with scores of Taliban fighters.

Over green tea and sponge cake, Karzai related how Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar had once asked him to join the regime as foreign minister. Karzai said he saw the Taliban, then backed by Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, as a foreign tool and wrote to Omar, "This nation has never been a slave and will never be a slave."

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Karzai said, he was sitting on a mountain in Oruzgan when his hand-held satellite phone rang. The call was from an aide to Omar who said the chief wanted to speak to him on a field radio. Karzai told him that he didn't have a radio and that his phone's battery was dying.

"Then this guy told me, 'Mullah Omar is asking, "What do you want?" ' I said: 'Hey man! I want my country!' " Karzai recounted. " 'Kick the foreigners out of this nation.' "

Afghanistan's enemies are still allied with foreigners, Karzai told the elders. Then he turned to look into the eyes of Abdul Rauf, a shy 7-year-old who had lost his family in the American bombing.

"He saw his father and mother dying but couldn't do anything. He is just a child," an elder said as Karzai sadly shook his head.

"The enemies are coming from Pakistan," the president said, "and the international community is bombarding them. And, caught in between, we suffer, not Pakistan."

It was time for Karzai to go. He told the elders the future was in their hands.

"They should not bombard us like this!" one shouted back.

DOJ_NMG_0092961

"Definitely! You are right," Karzai replied. "Don't call me the president. Call me your small brother, call me your son. I am your servant, not your president. If you need anything just tell me."

"The first need of the people is security," another elder interrupted. "And security comes when the nation and the government get together."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Shower Curtain Sold Separately (NYT)

By Elizabeth Olson

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

When the government presented L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former head of Tyco International, with a bill for $167 million in fines and restitution, it was likely that everything would have to go.

After his 2005 conviction for looting Tyco, Mr. Kozlowski sold some big-ticket belongings, including his 130-foot yacht Endeavor and Impressionist paintings, whittling his debt to $59 million.

Now he's parting with his 8,600-square-foot chalet in Beaver Creek, Colo., complete with eight bedrooms and nine and a half baths — including one decked out as an outhouse. The sale price was $10 million, reduced from $11.5 million.

Brokers declined to identify the new owner, an oil-and-gas man based in Dallas, but said he also paid $750,000 for Mr. Kozlowski's furnishings, which include a stuffed mountain lion to greet visitors but no shower curtain like the infamous $6,000 model in his Manhattan flat. ELIZABETH OLSON

CASH ONLY, PLEASE Speaking of restitution, the Securities and Exchange Commission settled its lawsuit against five executives of the failed NextCard online credit card bank, which collapsed in bankruptcy amid an accounting scandal in 2002.

Without admitting or denying wrongdoing, the five people — John V. Hashman, the chief executive; Yinzi Cai, the chief operating officer; Bruce Rigione, the finance chief; Douglas Wachtel, the controller; and Jeremy R. Lent, chairman and chief strategy officer — agreed to pay a total of $1.4 million in restitution to investors.

Most of the cash, $894,000, will come from Mr. Lent, a co-founder and the chief executive for four years. He was accused of having sold $7 million worth of NextCard stock before the company failed. MARK A. STEIN

LANDING ON HIS FEET Five months after Delta Air Lines eliminated his job as chief marketing officer to save money, Paul G. Matsen has checked into the Cleveland Clinic. There's nothing ailing Mr. Matsen, 47. He was hired to help the hospital and medical research center expand its services — and its brand name — abroad.

The clinic recently opened an office in Toronto and signed an agreement to build and operate a hospital in Abu Dhabi. "But we are looking at more expansion," said Mr. Matsen, who likened the challenge to an airline opening international routes.

He noted that airlines and hospitals had a few things in common — neither is known for good food — but he added that the health benefits in his new job were hard to beat. BARNABY J. FEDER

REAL MONEY Having already pleaded guilty to securities fraud for his role in booking phantom revenue at the dot-com Homestore, Peter B. Tafeen agreed last week to settle a civil lawsuit in the matter by paying more than $2.6 million.

A day before Mr. Tafeen settled the civil suit, Judge Percy Anderson of Federal District Court in Los Angeles ordered him to pay $240,000 in restitution directly to investors and sentenced him to federal prison for 30 months. MARK A. STEIN

WILL WORK FOR A CURE The prospect of riches was not what inspired Raymond E. Joslin to leave a 40-year career in cable television for a medical research company. It was a concern about cancer.

Mr. Joslin, the former president of Hearst Entertainment and Syndication, became chief executive of CAD Sciences, which creates cancer-detection software, in 2004.

"Just about every family on earth is affected one way or another by cancer," Mr. Joslin, who had a brush with prostate cancer in 1999, said at a recent benefit for the Breast Cancer Alliance.

He said he had invested "quite a bit" in CAD, and pays himself only $1 a year. "But," he said, "I negotiated a 50 percent severance clause. If they fire me, I get 50 cents." FRANCINE PARNES

DOJ_NMG_0092962

DO AS WE — ER, NEVER MIND Among an American ambassador's duties is the promotion of free enterprise, markets and trade as vital to a robust economy. Imagine how hard that became as Enron set off an avalanche of corporate scandals.

Three former ambassadors met at Southern New Hampshire University in Manchester last week to reminisce. They were A. Elizabeth Jones, a former ambassador to Kazakhstan; Cynthia P. Schneider, a former ambassador to the Netherlands; and Carl Spielvogel, the advertising executive who was ambassador to Slovakia.

Myron Kandel, the host, said ambassadors used to cite "the ethics, values and rule of law" underpinning American business. That, he added wryly, has been "sorely tested" lately. MARK A. STEIN

WELL, MAYBE HIM At a discussion sponsored by The Week magazine on "The Digital Media Revolution," Michael J. Wolf, the president of MTV Networks, said technology means constant change and "nothing is going to last forever."

At which point someone in the audience at the Four Seasons restaurant asked, "Not even Sumner?" — a reference to Sumner M. Redstone, the famously controlling, 83-year-old chairman of Viacom and Mr. Wolf's boss.

The aside drew laughs from the audience, particularly from Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius, the satellite radio company — and the former president and chief operating officer of Viacom. LAWRENCE INGRASSIA

CRIMINAL LAW:

More Subpoenas In Menendez Probe (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Jeff Whelan

Newark Star-Ledger, November 11, 2006

Federal investigators have resumed their inquiry into a rental deal between U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) and a nonprofit agency, issuing new subpoenas in the days after he was elected to a full six-year term, according to a government source.

The subpoenas sought documents related to the more than $300,000 in rent Menendez collected from the North Hudson Community Action Corp. between 1994 and 2003, the source said. It was unclear what records were sought or who was subpoenaed.

"More are coming," said the source, who declined to be named because of the sensitive nature of the investigation.

Matt Miller, a spokesman for Menendez, said neither the senator nor his campaign or congressional office has been contacted by federal authorities. He said Menendez is unaware of any new subpoenas and maintains he did nothing wrong.

"We're confident that when the U.S. Attorney's Office completes its review it will come to the same conclusion as the House Ethics Committee, that the transaction was completely appropriate," Miller said.

The latest development cuts short Menendez's political honeymoon as he prepares to head back to Washington next week as part of a new Democratic majority in Congress. Menendez's victory Tuesday was critical to Democrats taking control of the U.S. Senate by 51 to 49.

In September, federal authorities launched the investigation by issuing a subpoena seeking records of the rental deal between Menendez and North Hudson, a nonprofit that provides health care and social services to the poor.

The first subpoena followed a report in The Star-Ledger that Menendez collected more than $300,000 in rent from the organization while he represented Hudson County in the U.S. House of Representatives. Menendez leased a Union City house to the agency that it used for an administrative office. During that period, he also helped the nonprofit win millions of dollars in federal funding.

Republican State Sen. Tom Kean Jr. made the probe a central issue in his unsuccessful campaign to unseat Menendez, who repeatedly denied he was under investigation.

Told of the subpoena yesterday, Kean said: "The people have spoken and I respect their decision. At the same time, I stand by the message and the thrust of my campaign and believe that the issue of corruption continues to be of critical important to the citizens of New Jersey."

Independent ethics observers have said Menendez's rental deal posed a conflict of interest, but Menendez said he had received verbal clearance for the deal from the House Ethics Committee. He also said the agency paid just below market rent.

DOJ_NMG_0092963

The House ethics attorney whom Menendez said he consulted at the time said recently that there is no rule against such an arrangement.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie's office has repeatedly said it will neither confirm nor deny any investigation.

Menendez sought to downplay the subpoena throughout the campaign. He initially denied being represented by one criminal lawyer who had contacted the U.S. Attorney's Office on his behalf. Just days before Election Day, he acknowledged that for months, another attorney, Marc Elias, had been representing him in the matter.

Miller maintained again yesterday that the senator is not under investigation. He said Elias contacted the U.S. Attorney's Office in September and was told federal authorities did not need any information from the senator and that Menendez "had no status in any investigation" as a target or a subject.

Menendez spent the day thanking his supporters on Wednesday before leaving for an out-of-state vacation on Thursday, Miller said. He'll be back at work next week, he said.

FBI Probes May Target Congress (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The new chief of the FBI's Criminal Division, which is swamped with public corruption cases, says the bureau is ramping up its ability to catch crooked politicians and might run an undercover sting on Congress.

Assistant FBI Director James Burrus called the bureau's public corruption program "a sleeping giant that we've awoken" and predicted the nation will see continued emphasis in that area "for many, many, many years to come."

So much evidence of wrongdoing is surfacing in the nation's capital that Burrus recently committed to adding a fourth 15- to 20-member public corruption squad to the FBI's Washington field office.

In the past year, former Republican Reps. Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney have pleaded guilty to corruption charges. FBI agents are investigating about a dozen other members of Congress, including as many as three senators. The Justice Department also is expected to begin seeking indictments soon after a massive FBI investigation of the Alaska Legislature.

If conditions warrant, Burrus said, he wouldn't balk at urging an undercover sting like the famed Abscam operation in the late 1970s in which a U.S. senator and six House members agreed on camera to take bribes from FBI agents posing as Arab sheikhs.

"We look for those opportunities a lot," Burrus said, using words rarely heard at the bureau during the past quarter century. "I would do it on Capitol Hill. I would do it in any state legislature. ... If we could do an undercover operation, and it would get me better evidence, I'd do it in a second."

Philip Heymann, who oversaw the Abscam investigation as chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division during the Carter administration, expressed surprise to learn of the FBI's willingness to attempt another congressional sting after the outcry from Capitol Hill over Abscam.

"It shows courage at the FBI," said Heymann, now a criminal law professor at Harvard University. He said he concluded, after watching a recent public television documentary and listening to experts, that "there is more corruption (on Capitol Hill) than I ever thought imaginable" and that a single FBI sting "might result in very large numbers of prosecutions."

But even without an undercover operation, Heymann and other observers say they have been pleased with the GOP-controlled Justice Department's willingness to pursue old-fashioned investigations, even if they hurt congressional Republicans.

Nationally during the past year, 600 agents worked 2,200 public corruption cases, resulting in 650 arrests, 1,000 indictments and 800 convictions, Burrus said.

"Operation Rainmaker," the FBI's broad investigation of a Washington lobbying ring, has already led to a handful of convictions, including Ney's guilty plea last month. The inquiry was one reason for the resignation last year of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who also faces state campaign finance charges. Other investigations seem to be sprouting everywhere.

DOJ_NMG_0092964

But Reid Weingarten, a former Abscam prosecutor who now is a high-profile Washington criminal defense lawyer, said he would bet that the flurry of congressional cases has resulted from evidence "falling in their (investigators') laps," rather than a programmed FBI hunt for corruption.

The FBI does appear to be stepping up its use of electronic surveillance and has conducted stings of state politicians. Bureau agents secretly taped Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., before finding $90,000 in his freezer during a raid last May. Cell phones were wiretapped for four months in an investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., government sources say.

In "Operation Tennessee Waltz," 10 Tennessee state officials, including five current and former legislators, have been prosecuted in a scheme in which hidden cameras whirred as FBI undercover agents offered payoffs in return for help for a dummy company. Burrus said some targeted Tennessee legislators were moving so quickly that "we were actually having to discuss how we were going to slow it down" so that bills aiding the phony firm didn't become law.

A separate undercover inquiry led to the indictment of three members of San Diego's city council.

In Alaska, the FBI has more than doubled its manpower in a sweeping investigation of allegations that an oil industry services company bribed state legislators, people familiar with the inquiry said. On Aug. 31 and Sept. 1, the FBI conducted two dozen raids and searched the office of state Sen. Ben Stevens, son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska.

Burrus declined to discuss any investigation but said the FBI will focus on more state capitals during the next year, "because we have seen a trend in cases that leads us to believe there's more out there."

When he arrived as deputy chief of the criminal division in 2004, he said, field offices frequently told him they had "no idea" how to pursue public corruption leads. Since then, he said, agents in about 30 of the bureau's 56 field offices have been trained. FBI agents in Washington have studied congressional activities that might invite bribes, such as hard-to-trace "earmarks" in which members appropriate money for pet projects, often keeping their involvement off the public record.

"Public corruption cases have to be fished out," he said, noting that crooked politicians tend to do secret deals with one other person and often try to disguise their actions as "for the public's good."

Controversial new legal theories are also helping prosecutors bring cases in which they can't prove outright briberies. A vaguely written, 28-word 1988 law, for example, makes it a fraud for a politician to deprive taxpayers of "honest services." It was among the charges lodged against Cunningham, Ney, former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the San Diego councilmen.

Burrus said the FBI has to prove "that this person engaged in the activities specifically to receive this stream of benefits and knew that stream of benefits would stop if he did not support these particular projects."

Death Penalty Sought In Hawai'i Case (HONADV)

By Ken Kobayashi, Advertiser Courts Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, November 12, 2006

“Whatever you want to believe about the death penalty, it should never be used for political purposes, and it should never be used simply because, like a nuclear weapon, it’s out there, so let’s play with it.”

— Alexander Silvert | attorney for Naeem Williams’ wife

“The Justice Department has determined that the torture and beating to death of a small child warrants the death penalty as an optional sentence.”

— Edward Kubo | U.S. attorney

Justice Department officials have overruled federal prosecutors here and authorized seeking the death penalty for an Army soldier in a move critics say is part of a nationwide attempt by the Bush administration to spread capital punishment to non-death-penalty states.

Naeem Williams, charged with murdering his 5-year-old daughter last year, is believed to be the first in the country to face the death penalty under a provision passed by Congress three years ago for first-degree murder cases involving "a pattern or practice of assault or torture against a child or children."

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Hawai'i recommended against seeking capital punishment for Williams and his wife, Delilah, who is also charged with the murder, according to sources familiar with the case who do not want to be identified because the recommendation is considered confidential.

DOJ_NMG_0092965

The Justice Department went along with the recommendation for the 21-year-old wife, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who must approve federal death penalty prosecutions, authorized seeking capital punishment for the husband.

That move is part of a trend under the Bush administration to seek the death penalty in Hawai'i and 11 other states that don't have capital punishment, some critics of the death penalty believe.

WHITE HOUSE AGENDA

Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft authorized 180 death penalty prosecutions, including 51 cases in which the local U.S. attorney's office did not recommend capital punishment, according to the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, a national information clearinghouse for court-appointed defense lawyers in federal death-penalty cases.

Fourteen of the 51 cases are from non-capital-punishment states, said Kevin McNally, a Kentucky lawyer with the project.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the non-profit Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, D.C., which is critical of the way the death penalty is applied in this nation, said Ashcroft wanted to uniformly apply capital punishment across the country.

"To him, that meant seeking it in places that don't have the death penalty," Dieter said.

Dieter said there hasn't been any change in philosophy under Gonzales. He said local federal prosecutors now "have less of a say in the process."

Under President Clinton's administration, no one from a non-death-penalty state was sitting on a federal death row, but now there are six, Dieter said.

There are two from Iowa, and one each from Massachusetts, Michigan, Vermont and North Dakota.

David Bruck, a South Carolina lawyer with the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, raised concerns as early as 2003, when he said the trend reflected an attempt to "nationalize capital punishment."

"I don't think there's any doubt that this administration believes its role to be enforcing the death penalty nationwide without regard to local beliefs or policies," Bruck said in a recent interview.

He said Ashcroft dropped a provision under his predecessor Janet Reno that prevented federal death-penalty prosecutions when capital punishment was not authorized in the state where the crime occurred.

"This administration from the top down has been vigorously pro-death penalty," he said.

The criticism has been echoed by capital-punishment opponents in non-death-penalty states.

When Donald Fell was sentenced to death this year by a federal judge in Vermont for the 2000 fatal beating of a 53-year-old woman, the American Civil Liberties Union said Ashcroft sought to bring capital punishment to states without the death penalty. Vermont's ACLU said Ashcroft had earlier rejected a tentative plea agreement by federal prosecutors calling for a life term for Fell.

Vermont abolished the death penalty in 1987.

CONGRESS' ROLE

Peter Watkins, a spokesman for the Bush White House, deferred comment to the Justice Department on whether the administration is trying to expand the death penalty to non-capital-punishment states.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department, Kathleen Blomquist, said the recommendations by U.S. attorneys are confidential and that the department does not comment on the decision-making in specific cases.

Blomquist, however, said the goal of the department's capital-punishment review and decision-making process is a "fair, consistent and even-handed application of the federal capital sentencing laws nationwide to the worst offenders who commit the most egregious offenses."

The death-penalty prosecution will be unusual for Hawai'i, which abolished capital punishment in 1957. Sporadic attempts to revive it have never gotten far in the state Legislature, and Hawai'i remains one of 12 states that do not have capital punishment.

Congress, however, has authorized the death penalty throughout the country for federal crimes, starting in 1988 for drug kingpins. The law was expanded in 1994 to cover other offenses, such as murder for hire and murder of government officials. The provision involving a pattern of abuse and torture of children was added in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0092966

Currently, 46 prisoners from 20 states are sitting on federal death rows, according to the Death Penalty Information Center. Only three, including Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, have been executed under the federal death-penalty law. All three were executed by lethal injection.

In announcing on Sept. 8 that it would seek the death penalty in Williams' case, federal prosecutors accused the soldier of committing the murder in an "especially heinous, cruel and depraved manner in that it involved torture and serious physical abuse." The prosecutors said Williams' 5-year-old daughter was "particularly vulnerable because of her youth."

Williams also tried to thwart the investigation by washing his daughter's blood from the walls and instructing his wife to give a false statement to authorities, the prosecutors said.

In his statement to Army investigators, Williams said he used a belt on his daughter, Talia, daily for four months. On the morning of her death, July 16 of last year, he repeatedly hit the girl to discipline her, he told investigators. Later, he slapped her and she fell on her face, he said.

When the girl became unresponsive, he and his wife didn't call 911 for about an hour because Delilah Williams feared authorities would take away her 4-month-old baby, he said.

The autopsy report concluded Talia died from "inflicted head trauma due to battered child syndrome."

David Klein, Naeem Williams' lawyer, said the decision to seek the death penalty "compounded" the "tragic case."

He said his client "has no record of any significant convictions" and "has served his country in the military for a number of years."

Alexander Silvert, the first assistant federal public defender who is representing Delilah Williams, said he doesn't think capital punishment is appropriate for either defendant.

Silvert said he believes the death penalty is being sought for political reasons by the administration with Bush associates from Texas, a pro-capital punishment state. He said he fears the Justice Department is using the case to "test" the 2003 law.

U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo said the department did not reach its position because it wanted to "test" the new law.

"I don't think the president or any of the people under him from Texas knows about this case way out in Hawai'i," he said.

FIRST UNDER NEW LAW

Naeem Williams was initially charged by the military, but when the case was transferred to federal prosecutors in August last year, Kubo said Naeem and Delilah Williams were the first in the country prosecuted under the new law involving torture and abuse of a child.

Kubo said he does not know if there are currently any similar prosecutions in the country. Spokeswoman Blomquist of the Justice Department said those statistics are not readily available.

Silvert said that as far as he knows, Naeem Williams is the first to face the death penalty under the 2003 provision.

"To treat this as a death penalty case is really unwarranted," Silvert said.

He said the girl did not die as a result of a deliberate act to kill her.

"I don't think anyone can seriously argue that the child was struck with the intention to kill the child," he said.

If Williams had been charged under state law, he would have been charged with second-degree murder, punishable by life in prison with parole, but not with death, he said.

Silvert said he believes the U.S. Attorney's Office here gave the "appropriate consideration" on the death penalty issue for both defendants. "I think this is coming from Washington (D.C.)," he said. "I think it's political."

He contended that with the strong backing of the Justice Department, Congress added the provision in 2003, and that one reason for seeking the death penalty in Williams' case is that the Justice Department views the law as "its new toy."

"Whatever you want to believe about the death penalty, it should never be used for political purposes, and it should never be used simply because, like a nuclear weapon, it's out there, so let's play with it," he said.

Kubo disagreed.

"Unlike the state Legislature, Congress has determined that under certain horrific circumstances, death would be an appropriate sanction, and the Justice Department has determined that the torture and beating to death of a small child warrants the death penalty as an optional sentence," he said.

He said the law was in effect at the time Talia Williams died.

DOJ_NMG_0092967

"Since it's clear what it mandates and it fits within the facts of this case, we're just following the law of Congress," he said.

OCTOBER TRIAL

Naeem Williams and his wife are both being held separately at the Federal Detention Center.

His case is expected to generate a huge amount of litigation before U.S. District Judge David Ezra because it is a death-penalty case.

"I expect the case to be zealously litigated by both sides," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Marshall Silverberg, who is handling the prosecution.

Delilah Williams was added to the case when she was indicted by a federal grand jury Oct. 12 on a charge of murdering the girl. The maximum sentence she would face if convicted is life in prison.

Both have pleaded not guilty. Their trial is scheduled for next October.

Naeem and Delilah Williams are declining to comment, their lawyers said.

Silvert said his client has "very mixed emotions" with the death of her stepchild and the decisions that leave only her husband facing the death penalty.

"There's a lot of emotions that run through that, and I think she's entitled to her own privacy," he said.

Reach Ken Kobayashi at kkobayashi@honoluluadvertiser.com.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Decision Could End Fight To Balance Hispanic Vote (ORS)

By Mark Pino, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, November 12, 2006

Osceola County officials could agree on Monday to settle a federal discrimination lawsuit.

When Ana Erazo walked into the elections office on a summer day in 1990, her supporters followed and applauded after she filed the paperwork to run for County Commission.

"It all started with me," said Erazo, the first Hispanic to seek a commission seat. "In those days, there was lot of prejudice against us."

Erazo's tale is the first chapter in the struggle of Osceola's Hispanics for political power that came to a head last year when the U.S. Department of Justice sued the county, claiming countywide elections violate the Voting Rights Act by diluting Hispanics' political power.

The county spent nearly $2 million fighting, but now it looks as if Hispanic voters in Osceola may have a better chance to elect one of their own.

Commissioners are expected to vote Monday night on a single-member district plan to settle the suit after a federal judge noted "racial hostility" in Osceola and found that elections are "racially polarized."

"There is also evidence of a history of discrimination against Hispanic voters and candidates," U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell wrote in his ruling last month. "It is clear from the record that voting in Osceola County tends to be racially polarized."

Osceola's Hispanic population went from 1,089 in 1980 to 50,727 in 2000, according to census figures. The trend has continued. Today, 43,161 of Osceola's 127,176 registered voters -- or about a third -- are Hispanic and many live in the communities of Buenaventura Lakes, Lakeside and Poinciana. By 2011, Osceola County's Hispanic population is expected to eclipse its non-Hispanic population -- 139,000 to 135,000.

While Presnell found signs of discrimination, he did not find intent, and that was some solace for commissioners, who say single-member districts would disenfranchise taxpayers because they no longer would have a say in electing four of the five commissioners.

"This commission never singled out any ethnic group and ruled against them," Commissioner Bill Lane said last week.

Many who oppose single-member districts say the problem is in poor campaigning and the fact that Hispanics have not turned out to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0092968

But Presnell noted numerous instances where the county's non-Hispanic, white power structure created obstacles for the Hispanic community.

In particular, he cited splitting the largely Hispanic community of Buenaventura Lakes into two commission districts in 2001 and problems Hispanic voters experienced at the polls over the years.

The county and the Justice Department entered an agreement that mandated bilingual ballots and Spanish-speaking poll workers after the 2000 elections when "Hispanics suffered from discrimination at the polls when they were turned away without being allowed to vote, refused assistance, forbidden to use their own interpreters, asked for multiple forms of identification (unlike non-Hispanic voters), and treated in a hostile manner by poll workers," the judge wrote.

Only one Hispanic, the late Robert Guevara, was ever elected to countywide office, though last week Carlos Irizarry became the first to win a seat on the Kissimmee City Commission.

"Guevara's campaign generated racial hostility from non-Hispanics including Guevara's opponent, Charles Owen, who sent a campaign mailer that depicted Guevara with darker skin and portrayed him as 'Night' and Owen as 'Day,' " Presnell affirmed.

Today, Owen admits he should not have listened to a consultant about that flier.

"Reflecting back, it is probably something that shouldn't have gone out," said Owen. "It wasn't in good taste. It was not very professional."

It was Erazo's success in Osceola's burgeoning Hispanic districts in her 1990 loss to Larry Whaley that set the wheels in motion for the off-and-on battle during the past 16 years over how to elect commissioners.

Under the threat of legal action from Hispanic leaders, commissioners put single-member districts on the 1992 ballot and voters approved a referendum that changed voting from countywide to the district system for commissioners and School Board members.

The person who benefited from the switch was Erazo's neighbor and campaign manager, Guevara, who by 1991 had assumed the presidency of the county's chapter of the American Hispanic Voters League from Erazo.

Guevara became the first Hispanic commissioner in 1996 when on the same ballot voters approved a return to countywide voting.

"I feel it is an injustice," said Erazo, who now lives in Puerto Rico. "Single-member districts are needed right now. When I go back [to visit], many people remember me. I ask, 'Why?' and they say, 'You were the first one.' "

Mark Pino can be reached at mpino@orlandosentinel.com or 407-931-5935.

100 Bilingual Poll Workers Achieve Goal (RMA)

By NATALIA E. ARBULÚ

The Springfield Republican (MA), November 11, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - With more than 100 bilingual poll workers manning all but four voting precincts on Tuesday, the city has met a goal set in its voter reform agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice.

The federal government had filed suit against the city for violating the rights of Spanish-speaking residents by failing to provide enough help at the polls.

The reform agreement, reached in August, called for the city to have at least 95 bilingual poll workers who speak Spanish and English working at Tuesday's election.

Of the city's 410 poll workers, 127 are bilingual in Spanish and English and five speak Vietnamese, said Gladys Oyola, the city's Spanish Language Election Program coordinator.

The Justice Department required bilingual poll workers at all but four of the city's 64 precincts based on the number of voters with Spanish surnames in each precinct, said Election Commissioner Kathy Hoar Fleury.

Fleury said on Thursday that the Election Office has worked "extremely hard" to comply with the agreement.

"I think we've done a heck of a job in a short time," Fleury said.

The office has yet to calculate the number of bilingual workers that worked at Election Day, but Fleury said the figure is close to the original number hired.

DOJ_NMG_0092969

Federal observers monitored the polls on Tuesday to ensure Springfield's compliance with the Voting Rights Act, as they did during the Sept. 19 primary election, but they were at fewer locations this time.

City Solicitor Edward M. Pikula noted that the relationship between poll workers and federal observers was more cordial than it had been for the primary.

Jose Claudio, chairman of the city's Spanish Language Election Program Advisory Committee, said he has not received any complaints regarding bilingual poll workers.

The committee will meet later this month to discuss how things went on Election Day.

Maria Rivera was the sole bilingual worker at the Dunbar Community Center on Tuesday. Rivera said a lot of voters needed help because they did not understand how to vote or were illiterate in both languages.

Van Sickle Middle School had four bilingual workers. Poll worker Ivan Serrano said Hispanics who came to vote did not need services in Spanish. "A lot of Hispanic voting but not much help needed," Serrano said.

For the primary, the city exceeded the agreement's requirement to have 57 bilingual poll workers by 35 workers.

Feedback from federal observers for the primary was generally positive, Pikula said.

"Overall they were impressed with our ability to pull together an effort that we did in short period of time with limited resources," Pikula said.

The reports from federal observers regarding the primary have yet to be made public.

Pikula said city officials will once again confer with Justice Department lawyers to review observers' reports from the election and determine what the city needs to work on.

The case against Springfield will be dismissed by 2009 if the Justice Department is satisfied with the city's performance, Pikula said.

To Settle Suit In Boy's Death, New Jersey To Pay $7.5 Million (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, November 12, 2006

NEWARK, Nov. 11 (AP) — New Jersey has spent $7.5 million to settle a lawsuit over a child welfare case in which a 7-year-old boy's mummified remains were found in a basement here.

The payout, arranged last year but only recently announced, is the second-largest made by the State Division of Youth and Family Services over child welfare mistakes, according to state officials.

The size of the settlement is surpassed only by the $12.5 million the state agreed to give to four brothers from Collingswood who were deprived of food and medical care by their adoptive parents. The state announced that settlement last year.

With the Newark case, the settlement money is going to the estate of Faheem Williams, along with two of his siblings who are in foster care.

The discovery in January 2003 of Faheem's body prompted an overhaul of the child welfare agency. The state had investigated abuse complaints involving Faheem, but had closed the file 11 months before his body was found in the basement of an apartment rented by his older cousin, Sherry L. Murphy.

The boy's brothers — Raheem Williams, now 11, and Tyrone Hill Jr., 8 — were found emaciated in a room adjacent to where the body was found.

Faheem's cousin, Wesley Murphy, later pleaded guilty to reckless manslaughter, admitting that while the family was living in Irvington he had killed the child with a wrestling move in which he had forced his knee into the child's abdomen. He has since served his time.

Ms. Murphy pleaded guilty to two counts each of aggravated assault, criminal restraint and child endangerment for her treatment of the children, and is serving a 25-year prison sentence.

She admitted that she left the boy's body on the floor of her Irvington home, then put it in a plastic hamper, which she took with her when they moved to Newark.

DOJ_NMG_0092970

Faheem, Raheem and Tyrone had been living with Ms. Murphy after their mother, Melinda Williams, went to prison for endangering a child she had been baby-sitting. Ms. Williams was released weeks before Faheem's death, but had left the children with Ms. Murphy, her sister.

The child welfare agency and state attorney general's office representatives say the settlement approved by a State Superior Court judge in Newark gives $1 million to Faheem's estate, $2.75 million to Raheem and $3.75 million to Tyrone.

Lawyers in the case say legal fees still need to be settled, as well as the question of whether the boys' mother will have access to the money.

A Family Court judge in Newark ended Ms. Williams's parental rights last summer. She has appealed.

ANTITRUST:

Gannett Emerges As Possible Bidder For Tribune Properties (CHIT)

By Michael Oneal And Phil Rosenthal, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, November 12, 2006

Turning up the heat on the already simmering auction for the assets of Chicago-based Tribune Co., Gannett Co., the nation's largest newspaper publisher, has emerged as a possible bidder for Tribune's newspaper properties, the Chicago Tribune learned Saturday.

Executives from the McLean, Va.-based media giant, which publishes 90 U.S. newspapers, including top-read USA Today, were in Chicago last week to hear presentations on Tribune's financial condition, two sources close to the situation said.

Tribune has been hosting a number of bidders as part of a process it put in place in September to enhance shareholder value by possibly selling all of the company's television and newspaper assets.

But the emergence of a potential buyer with the resources and clout of Gannett could significantly change the complexion of the bidding process.

Spokespeople for Tribune and Gannett on Saturday declined to comment for this story.

The sources noted that the Tribune sell-off is still in its early stages and that Gannett has participated in newspaper auctions before without pulling the trigger. Most recently, Gannett expressed formal interest in Knight Ridder Inc. before eventually backing away.

But assuming it is serious, Gannett would be the first so-called "strategic buyer"—Wall Street parlance for a suitor in the same industry—to jump into the fray.

Until now, bidding for Tribune assets had been thought to be limited to financial buyers: several large private equity firms and a handful of wealthy entrepreneurs. But, unhappy with bids that valued the whole company close to the current stock price of about $32 a share, Tribune began asking for bids on its parts—newspapers such as the Los Angeles Times and the Chicago Tribune and television stations such as WGN-Channel 9, among other properties.

Sources said that opening up the bidding increased the level of interest among potential buyers in recent days. Last week, Los Angeles billionaires Eli Broad and Ron Burkle, who had earlier expressed interest in the Los Angeles Times, instead put in a bid for the entire company.

That may have induced others to move off the sidelines. At least one other media company, Denver-based MediaNews, is also interested in some of Tribune's newspapers, most notably the Hartford Courant, the Stamford Advocate and the Morning Call in Allentown, Pa., another source said. It's not clear, however, whether MediaNews has officially joined the bidding.

The emergence of a strategic buyer such as Gannett could mark a shift in the process by presenting Tribune Co. management with more flexibility in how to divvy up the company, said one Chicago attorney who has participated in many such deals.

Unlike a private equity player or a wealthy individual, a newspaper company like Gannett might see more immediate value in Tribune's newspapers, since it is already a large operator of papers across the country and might be able to find operating efficiencies and synergies other buyers would not.

DOJ_NMG_0092971

The auction for Knight Ridder earlier this year provides a good example. Initially, several teams of private equity companies, as well as MediaNews and Gannett, bid for the company, only to back out by the end. That left Sacramento, Calif.-based newspaper operator McClatchy Co. as the only bidder. McClatchy bought all the Knight Ridder papers and then immediately sold off the lower-growth ones. Because many of the Knight Ridder papers matched McClatchy's strategy, going through this process made sense in a way it didn't for others.

What Gannett's strategy would be is unclear. But industry sources noted that Gannett already owns several papers in Florida and would likely be most interested in owning Tribune Co.'s highly profitable papers in Orlando and Ft. Lauderdale.

In any deal for Tribune papers, taxes are likely to be an issue, since Tribune has owned its properties for so long. But tax experts say there are many ways around that, including tax-free, spin-off structures.

Tribune and Gannett have a long history of working together. Gannett earlier this year paid $180 million in cash for WATL-TV, Tribune's television station in Atlanta. And the companies are partners in several Internet-based businesses meant to replace the classified advertising disappearing from their newspaper pages: CareerBuilder.com, ShopLocal.com and Topix.net.

One consideration that might give Gannett pause in looking at Tribune's properties is the depressed state of the industry, which it knows as well as anybody.

Gannett, which also owns 23 television stations, is highly profitable—it earned $1.2 billion last year on revenues of $7.6 billion. But like every other traditional media company, it has been feeling the pressure of an anemic ad market for newspapers and local television stations, as well as declining readership and viewership. In the third quarter, the company reported a 12 percent decline in earnings stemming partly from expensing of stock options, but also because of "very challenging advertising environments that softened as the quarter progressed," Gannett Chief Executive Craig Dubow told analysts.

Mdoneal@tribune.com

PhilRosenthal@tribune.com

Microsoft Jury Pool Faces Long Survey (DMR)

Des Moines Register, November 12, 2006

The class-action lawsuit against the software giant could be one of the longest in Iowa history.

It's not until question 61 that the 31-page survey begins to get to the point.

Do you find subjects dealing with computer technology:

___ Interesting

___ Boring

___ Somewhere in between

Those of you ready to check "boring" should count yourselves lucky if you are not scheduled to report for jury duty Monday in Des Moines.

About 450 registered voters, in two shifts, will converge on the Polk County Courthouse to begin what could be the weeks-long process of picking a jury for a class-action, antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp. The trial is expected to last several months and could be worth up to $450 million for lawyers and four named plaintiffs, who contend that the giant computer software company used anti-competitive practices to drive up the cost of its Windows operating system, as well as its Microsoft Office, Word and Excel programs.

Potential members of the class include any person, business or other large organization that bought those programs between May 18, 2004, and June 30, 2006.

Microsoft has denied overcharging its customers and insists that consumers received fair and reasonable prices.

The trial is expected to be one of the longest in Iowa history.

The pool of prospective jurors - several times larger than the number of people typically summoned by court officials for a week's worth of trials - will be dedicated completely to the Microsoft lawsuit.

Lawyers plan to require each would-be juror to fill out the questionnaire mentioned earlier, then use those answers as a first-round screening before posing any additional questions face to face.

DOJ_NMG_0092972

The questionnaire asks would-be jurors to provide typical information about their background and employment history, as well as detailed responses about their history of computer use and their level of comprehension.

Lawyers will also seek insight by quizzing the potential jurors about their favorite TV programs, movies, newspapers and books and their political philosophy.

District Judge Scott Rosenberg will preside. Roxanne Conlin, a noted Des Moines lawyer, is among the attorneys representing the plaintiffs.

Sports Artist Sued For Mix Of Crimson And Tide (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

TUSCALOOSA, Ala., Nov. 7 — In the solemn cathedral of college football devotion and instruction that is the Paul W. Bryant Museum here, a large painting dominates the main chamber. It is called "The Sack," and it shows an encounter between a Notre Dame quarterback and a human locomotive in crimson and white.

"I've never been hit like that before," the quarterback, Steve Beuerlein, said after his near-lethal sack by Cornelius Bennett in 1986, in the University of Alabama's first victory ever over his team.

Daniel A. Moore, who painted "The Sack" and scores of other renditions of signal moments in Alabama football history, said he felt something similar last year, when his fax machine began to spit out a lawsuit from the university.

Mr. Moore's paintings, reproduced in prints and on merchandise, violated the university's trademark rights, the suit said. It asked a federal judge to forbid him to, among other things, use the university's "famous crimson and white color scheme."

Athletes, sports leagues and universities around the nation have become increasingly aggressive in protecting what they say is their intellectual property, and their claims have met with a mixed response from judges and fans. But almost no one here thinks the suit against Mr. Moore is a good idea.

"This lawsuit is the equivalent of the Catholic Church suing Michelangelo for painting the Sistine Chapel," said Keith Dunnavant, an Alabama alumnus and the author of "Coach: The Life of Paul 'Bear' Bryant."

A university spokeswoman, Cathy Andreen, declined repeated requests for interviews with university officials and lawyers, on what she said was the advice of counsel.

James Glen Stovall, who taught journalism at the university for 25 years, said only one sort of person would support the suit.

"I can see why, if you're sitting in a roomful of lawyers, you might come to that conclusion," Mr. Stovall said. "But no one outside of that room would say: 'Hey, that's a good idea. Let's sue Daniel Moore.' "

At his gallery in Birmingham, surrounded by prints and paintings reflecting his more than 25 years as a sports artist, Mr. Moore said he remained a loyal Alabama alumnus. He graduated from the university with an art degree in 1976; two of his daughters go there now, and a third is a recent graduate.

"I still love Alabama," he said. "I still love Alabama football. Obviously, I haven't yanked my daughters out of school."

But there is bitterness, too. For two decades, the university gave him sideline passes. Now he is not welcome on game day.

"As an artist," he said, "it helps to be there, to feel the emotion and excitement and strategy from an on-field perspective."

He said he did not understand why his work, copies of which have a place of pride in the dens of thousands of Alabama football fans, should not receive the same First Amendment protection that newspaper photographs do. "Artists," he said, "were the first journalists."

In its legal papers, the university's lawyers are grudging in their assessment of Mr. Moore's talent. "Though skillfully prepared," the lawyers wrote, Mr. Moore's art conveys nothing beyond the raw facts of football. Mr. Moore, the suit says, "literally replicates even the expression on the players' faces in his prints and he adds no message whatever not conveyed by the play itself."

That is not fair, Mr. Moore said. Though he uses photographs for reference, he said that his compositions and his style were his own. He calls his approach "photofuturism," which he describes as "five parts realism to one part motion."

Over the years, Mr. Moore said, his paintings and prints have cumulatively sold "in the low millions." An 8-by-10 reproduction sells for $25 retail, or $35 if it is signed. An original watercolor might go for $22,000, an oil for $65,000.

DOJ_NMG_0092973

The university's lawyers seemed to take particular offense at Mr. Moore's use of his paintings on merchandise like coffee mugs and calendars.

In response, Mr. Moore did not hesitate to invoke his own intellectual property rights. "Because I own the copyright," he said, "it's my opinion that I can put it on anything I want to. I can put it on a tattoo on someone's backside."

Mr. Moore has asked Judge R. David Proctor of the Federal District Court in Birmingham to dismiss the case on First Amendment grounds. His brief cited a decision of the federal appeals court in California ruling that a trademark owner "does not have the right to control public discourse" if "the public imbues his mark with a meaning."

After the citation, Mr. Moore's lawyer, Stephen D. Heninger, added a parenthetical aside. "Who could argue with a straight face," he asked, "that the cultural significance of Alabama football has not assumed such a role?"

A ruling on the motion is expected in the next few months.

Other courts have also tried to balance the rights of the owners of intellectual property against that of free expression. The cases, which involve a variety of legal theories, generally turn on whether consumers are apt to be confused about who produced the works in question and on whether artists managed to add something meaningful to the bare facts.

At one end of the legal spectrum, a federal judge in Louisiana had no difficulty in July in enjoining a company that sold shirts bearing the school colors and initials of four football powerhouses.

At the other, the federal appeals court in Cincinnati in 2003 rejected an effort by the golfer Tiger Woods to stop an artist named Rick Rush from using Mr. Woods's image in a painting commemorating his victory at the 1997 Masters in Augusta, Ga.

That painting, a panorama that included likenesses of six past winners, "communicates and celebrates the value our culture attaches to such events," the majority in the divided three-judge panel decision found. "It would be ironic indeed if the presence of the image of the victorious athlete would deny the work First Amendment protection."

In the middle of the spectrum is a 2001 decision of the California Supreme Court. It expressed great solicitude for the rights of artists under the First Amendment. But it ruled against an artist who had created a simple charcoal drawing of the Three Stooges and sold it on T-shirts.

The court attached no significance to the fact that the artist, Gary Saderup, reproduced his art on clothing. "First Amendment doctrine," Justice Stanley Mosk wrote for a unanimous court, "does not disfavor nontraditional media of expression."

But Justice Mosk found that the image itself contained "no significant transformative or creative contribution" and derived its worth mostly from the Stooges' celebrity rather than Mr. Saderup's talent. Andy Warhol's celebrity portraits, by contrast, Justice Mosk wrote, "may well be entitled to First Amendment protection" as "ironic social commentary."

These decisions, Mr. Moore said, make courts into critics, a role that may not suit them.

Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., in a 1903 decision holding that circus posters may be copyrighted, appeared to agree.

"It would be a dangerous undertaking for persons trained only to the law," he wrote, "to constitute themselves final judges of the worth of pictorial illustrations."

Mayberry Sheriff Calls The Law On Candidate (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, November 12, 2006

MILWAUKEE, Nov. 11 (AP) — Andy Griffith, the actor who portrayed the sheriff of the fictional town of Mayberry on television, has sued a Wisconsin man who unsuccessfully ran for sheriff of Grant County after legally changing his name to Andrew Jackson Griffith.

The lawsuit, filed Nov. 3 in Federal District Court in Madison, contends that the candidate, William H. Fenrick, 42, violated trademark and copyright laws, as well as the privacy of the actor when he used his new name to promote his candidacy for sheriff in southwestern Wisconsin.

Mr. Griffith, the actor, who is 80, starred in the 1960s program "The Andy Griffith Show," one of the most popular series in television history. He also played an unorthodox lawyer on "Matlock" in the 1980s and 1990s.

The lawsuit says the former Mr. Fenrick changed his name for the "sole purpose of taking advantage of Griffith's notoriety in an attempt to gain votes." It asks the court to order him to go back to his original name.

DOJ_NMG_0092974

The lawsuit also asks the new Mr. Griffith to publish disclaimers and an apology in Grant County newspapers that say he has no association with the actor. It seeks unspecified damages and court fees.

"Now that the election is over, if Fenrick is willing in some fashion to clear the record, we probably could find a way to resolve it," said the actor's lawyer, Jim Cole.

The candidate argues that he did not benefit from the name change.

"During this campaign I never sold or profited even one nickel from the use of the name Andy Griffith or any item bearing the name Andy Griffith," he said. "Everything was a promotional item, and everything was given away for free."

The new Mr. Griffith, a music store co-owner from Platteville, said he spent $5,000 on his failed campaign and changed his name to garner publicity for the race.

The incumbent sheriff, Keith Govier, a Republican who has held the post for 10 years, won with 8,452 votes, followed by the Democrat, Doug Vesperman, with 6,985 votes. Mr. Griffith, an independent, had 1,248 votes.

Mr. Griffith, the candidate, described the lawsuit as "incredibly absurd" and said he did not think people actually believe he is the actor.

"For such an American icon, it's a pretty un-American thing to do to me," said Mr. Griffith, who has about three weeks to respond to the filing.

ENVIRONMENT:

Asarco Leaves Costly Environmental Mess In The City (CCCT)

By Dan Kelley

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, November 12, 2006

Residents were promised nature preserve, but the company is now bankrupt

Ruth Einkauf and her Dona Park neighbors were promised a 30-acre nature preserve behind her home in 1999 as part of an Environmental Protection Agency settlement with a nearby recycling plant.

Before the settlement, announced as part of an enforcement action by the state and federal governments, she and neighbors tended the area. Now, weeds and tall grass on the lot provide cover for varmints that invade Einkauf's home.

It is unclear if the project ever will be completed. Dona Park residents are neighbors to one of the largest bankruptcies in the country, a vast and tangled affair that encompasses century-old mining giant Asarco and its subsidiary Encycle Texas.

"I really thought they'd do what they promised," said Zilma Champion, who lives nearby.

Tom Aldrich, vice president for environmental affairs at Asarco, said the company established a conservation trust at the 30-acre parcel and performed some environmental studies as a prelude to building the park. It has not built the walkways nor planted the promised vegetation that was required. With the company in bankruptcy, the future of that conservation trust is murky.

"We do not intend to put those walkways in at this time," Aldrich said.

Neighbors of other Asarco plants across Texas have yet to see more than $1.75 million in supplemental environmental projects - plans approved by the government as part of settlement agreements.

"The dilemma with Asarco has been that there's been no cleanup in any areas listed in the settlement," said Neil Carman, Clean Air Program director of the Lone Star Chapter of the Sierra Club. "They are skirting their commitment."

Other Encycle supplemental environmental projects include:

$1.8 million to pave a road in El Paso;

$260,000 to restore a four-acre wetland near Coy Mines in Knoxville, Tenn.;

Asarco's bankruptcy threatens an estimated $1.3 billion in environmental cleanups across the country, according to U.S. Justice Department claims. Asarco's parent company Grupo Mexico established a $100 million trust for all of the those cleanups as a condition of being allowed to transfer ownership of copper mines in Peru.

The local project is about 40 percent complete.

The faltering pace of the construction of the nature preserve isn't the first time the neighborhood has tangled with its industrial neighbors.

DOJ_NMG_0092975

About a decade ago, tests in Dona Park and another nearby neighborhood, Manchester Place, showed high levels of soil contamination.

State and federal agencies investigated. Neighbors filed suit alleging that a former copper company that operated nearby from 1942 until about 1982, when the plant shut, spewed heavy metals into the air. The matter was later settled out of court.

Asarco reopened the plant in 1984, and it sputtered along until 1985, when it was shuttered again. In 1989, Asarco again reopened the facility in a recycling project through a subsidiary called Encycle Texas. Encycle became ensnared in a government investigation into what regulators referred to as "sham recycling," resulting in a formal settlement with the state and federal governments. The company agreed to build a 30-acre nature preserve behind Einkauf's house in 1999 to settle the legal proceedings with the government.

There is also a question of whether taxpayers could end up paying for some of the cleanups through the Superfund program, according to the EPA. With Asarco in bankruptcy, other companies, including suppliers to the plant and successor corporations, face claims under broad liability provisions in EPA rules.

Encycle Texas sought protection under Chapter 11 of the bankruptcy code to reorganize in August 2005. It was later forced into Chapter 7 bankruptcy and is now undergoing liquidation.

The bankruptcy trustee overseeing that liquidation, Michael Boudloche, said the Encycle plant at 5500 Up River Road is for sale and has applied for The Texas Commission on Environmental Quality voluntary cleanup program. Total remediation costs are uncertain, with estimates from $2 million to $20 million. Consultants have been hired to calculate the total environmental costs.

That settlement also ignited controversy recently, when environmentalists in El Paso uncovered an EPA memo to the Justice Department detailing what regulators referred to as the "sham recycling" enterprise in which hazardous waste was trucked from Corpus Christi to El Paso for smelting. Though the settlement was announced, neighbors in Corpus Christi and El Paso were never informed of the claims.

The company claims there is nothing new to those allegations.

Contact Dan Kelley at 886-4316 or kelleyd@ caller.com

IMMIGRATION:

Boot Nazi Guard, Pol Says (NYDN)

By Derek Rose, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, November 12, 2006

A U.S. congressman rallied alongside hundreds of Jewish teenagers outside the home of a former Nazi camp guard - but some of the man's Jackson Heights neighbors say they should just leave the old man alone.

Jakiw Palij, 84, was stripped of his U.S. citizenship three years ago by a judge who ruled that Palij lied when he applied for an immigrant visa in 1949.

But he has not been deported because the government can't find a country to accept him - which the activists said was unacceptable.

"No one is going to hide in our midst," declared U.S. Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-Queens). "Thousands and thousands of people were murdered by this monster. He's not paying for his crimes by living here in a peaceful block in Jackson Heights."

Several hundred students from Rambam Mesivta High School in Lawrence, L.I., chanted, "We will not be silent!" and "Show your face!" outside Palij's home on 89th St. on Thursday.

It was the 68th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the organized riots in Nazi Germany that marked the beginning of state-sponsored terror against Jews.

"He's a Nazi criminal. He killed thousands of Jews. He doesn't deserve to be here," said David Zafarani, 17, a senior at the Jewish day school.

But several of Palij's neighbors, who describe him as quiet and frail, disagreed with the protesters.

DOJ_NMG_0092976

"It's wrong; why don't they just leave the people alone?" said Abraham Pabon, 48, a truck driver. "Everybody has a life to live. It's like they say, God forgives. It's very, very wrong what they're doing here."

Another neighbor, who would only give her first name, Ismelda, said, "Sometimes you have to forget.

"The guy that lives there is very, very old."

Earlier, students from the same school demonstrated outside the German consulate in midtown, demanding that the German government accept Palij's deportation and try him as a war criminal.

Palij did not answer the door Thursday, but has told the Daily News he was forced to serve at age 18 and would have been killed if he refused.

"I was nowhere near to any camp," he said in August. "I didn't hurt any Jews, anybody from Ukraine, Poland. Anybody."

Justice Department officials have acknowledged there's no evidence Palij engaged in atrocities - but say that the mere act of guarding prisoners sealed their fate. More than 6,000 Jews at Trawniki were shot to death on Nov. 3, 1943, in one of the single largest massacres of the Holocaust.

A retired draftsman, Palij received his immigrant visa in 1949 by falsely claiming he worked on his father's farm during the war.

Immigrant Protection Rules Draw Fire (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 9 — Dr. Stephen B. Turner built a profitable business here by providing low-cost "immigrant medical exams," including immunizations and blood tests, to hundreds of newcomers to America. Many of his clients did not speak English, but they paid in cash, spending a total of nearly $250,000 at Dr. Turner's practice from 2003 to 2005.

It was only later, after a tip from a suspicious client, that the San Francisco police and the district attorney's office learned the truth: Dr. Turner had been throwing out his clients' blood samples and injecting them with "inoculations" of saline.

Kamala D. Harris, the San Francisco district attorney, said the case, which led to a seven-year prison term for Dr. Turner, was one of many her office had been able to pursue under San Francisco's so-called sanctuary policy, which forbids police and city officials from asking people they encounter in the course of an investigation about their immigration status. It is a protection Ms. Harris says has made immigrants — legal and illegal — more willing to come to forward about crimes.

With immigration continuing to flare and frustrate as a national political issue, sanctuary cities like San Francisco may soon be the next battlefront. Critics argue that sanctuary policies discourage the police from enforcing laws, though about 50 cities and counties have enacted variations on sanctuary, according to the National Immigration Law Center. They include Detroit, Los Angeles, New York and Washington. A handful of states have similar policies, including Alaska, Maine and Oregon.

Conservative legal groups and politicians have begun to challenge such policies. Yet on the other side, cities like Chicago have announced they will avoid involving their police in issues that smack of federal immigration enforcement. And while a federal proposal to punish sanctuary cities recently failed to become law, some states have passed laws discouraging sanctuary policies.

"To say to a law enforcement official, if you encounter a foreign national who is in this country illegally and you believe that information would be of use and benefit to federal authorities, that you can't call them, that's just wrong," said Representative John Campbell, Republican of California, who authored a provision in the federal Homeland Security bill that would have denied federal antiterrorism money to cities with sanctuary policies. The provision passed the House, but was not part of the bill eventually signed by President Bush.

But even with Democrats in control of Congress, immigration hard-liners say the issue is here to stay.

"It's mind-blowing for us to see taxpayer dollars spent to subsidize criminal activity — that's the end result," said Christopher J. Farrell, director of research for Judicial Watch, a conservative legal group that is suing the Los Angeles Police Department over its sanctuary rule.

Some states have also taken up the issue. In Colorado, a law signed by the governor in May prevents localities from passing ordinances that stop officials or police from communicating or cooperating with federal officials on immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0092977

Other states have taken up larger immigration issues involving local cooperation with the federal authorities. A Georgia law enacted in April authorizes the state to enter into an agreement with federal officials to train and certify state law enforcement officials to enforce immigration. The Georgia law also requires the police to make a "reasonable effort" to determine the legal status of those they arrest for felonies or drunken driving.

Both the Colorado and Georgia laws include some protections against and stiffer penalties for exploitation of illegal immigrants.

In September, a sanctuary debate erupted in Houston after an illegal immigrant was accused of killing a police officer. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, a Republican city councilwoman who ran for Congress as an unsuccessful write-in candidate in place of former Representative Tom DeLay, called on the mayor to declare the city off-limits to illegal immigrants.

"Terrorists, drug runners and cartel members could be among us, and police officers are not allowed to check their identities," Ms. Sekula-Gibbs wrote in an e-mail message to supporters. "Why? Because some politicians fear that asking people who have no ID about their legal status might intimidate all illegals into not reporting crimes. This policy of appeasement must be stopped."

Craig E. Ferrell Jr., general counsel for the Houston Police Department, said the city did not have a formal sanctuary policy. But he said a tangle of laws — police codes and legal decisions, including those involving racial profiling and the Fourth Amendment guarantee against unlawful search and seizure — required caution by police officers.

"We're not just trying to be obstructionist or not trying to help," Mr. Ferrell said. "What we're against is the federal government mandating that local enforcement be initiated without addressing these issues."

Sanctuary supporters have pushed back. In San Francisco, Supervisor Gerardo C. Sandoval — who authored a resolution affirming the city's policy, which dates to 1989 — said the federal government was simply trying to pass the buck for failing to secure federal borders.

"If they want to enforce the law," Mr. Sandoval said, "they should put troops on the ground to do that."

Lt. Paul Vernon, a spokesman for the Los Angeles Police Department, which has operated under sanctuary guidelines since 1979, said, "We didn't want people to fear cooperating with police." Lieutenant Vernon added, "And the local police department job is not to enforce the federal immigration law."

An organization of police chiefs, the Major Cities Chiefs Association, said that requiring the local police to enforce immigration policy did not "take into full account the realities of local law enforcement dealing with this issue on the ground." The association said its concerns included a lack of authority, training, and resources, as well as risks of liability.

Advocates for illegal immigrants, meanwhile, said they feared that getting rid of sanctuary rules would encourage immigrant communities not to report crime, including human and drug trafficking, prostitution, domestic violence, and even terrorism.

"Once the police are seen as agents of the immigration service, it discourages and deters immigrant communities from going to the police," said Lucas Guttentag, the director of the Immigrants' Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union. "There's a whole mixture of people in these communities — some recent, some illegal — and its going to cause the entire community to fear going to the police if they feel going to the local cop is essentially going to the immigration service."

But opponents say localities should be forced to participate in solving some of the problems that accompany illegal immigration.

"You can't have it both ways," said Ira Mehlman, a spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which lobbies for stronger immigration enforcement. "If you want to harbor people who are in the country illegally, you can't expect to have federal funds for issues that arise from having illegal people in your community."

Sanctuary policies are often less sweeping than opponents make them out to be. In San Francisco, for example, where resources cannot be used in immigration investigations, the police can inquire about immigration status in felony or drug cases.

Joan Friedland, an immigration lawyer for the National Immigration Law Center, said the concept of sanctuary cities was often misunderstood and that it gave the impression that such cities were lawless havens for illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0092978

"It's not like people, if they are charged with a crime, they just escape immigration," Ms. Friedland said. "Even the cities that have ordinances limiting inquiries about immigration status cooperate and are in touch with the Department of Homeland Security when a serious crime is involved."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Poll: Bush Hits New Low (NSWK)

By Marcus Mabry

Newsweek, November 11, 2006

Nov. 11, 2006 - President George W. Bush's response was swift and decisive—if a little late. After voters gave Republicans "a thumpin'" at the polls, handing Democrats control of both houses of Congress, Bush banished his contentious defense secretary; invited the presumptive leaders of the new House and Senate to lunch (would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi had pasta; the president ate crow, a Bush aide joked); and suffered through two pained photo-ops with Pelosi and Harry Reid, the Nevada Senator expected to become Majority Leader. And what did the president get for listening to the voice of the American people? The worst approval rating of his presidency.

President Bush's job approval rating has fallen to just 31 percent, according to the new NEWSWEEK Poll. Bill Clinton's lowest rating during his presidency was 36 percent; Bush's father's was 29 percent, and Ronald Reagan's was 35 percent. Jimmy Carter's and Richard Nixon's lows were 28 and 23 percent, respectively. (Just 24 approve of outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's job performance; and 31 percent approve of Vice President Dick Cheney's.)

Worst of all, most Americans are writing off the rest of Bush's presidency; two-thirds (66 percent) believe he will be unable to get much done, up from 56 percent in a mid-October poll; only 32 percent believe he can be effective. That's unfortunate since 63 percent of Americans say they're dissatisfied with the way things are going in the country; just 29 percent are satisfied, reports the poll of 1,006 adults conducted Thursday and Friday nights.

But the new poll carries sobering news for Democrats, too, still on their post-victory high. Just about everyone believes the Republicans lost the 2006 midterms more than the Democrats won it. Presented with a list of factors that may have contributed to the Democrats' success, 85 percent of Americans said the "major reason" was disapproval of the administration's handling of the war in Iraq, 71 percent said disapproval of Bush's overall job performance, 67 percent cited dissatisfaction with how Republicans have handled government spending and the deficit, 63 percent said disapproval of the overall performance of Republicans in Congress, 61 percent said Democrats' ideas and proposals for changing course in Iraq. Tellingly, just 27 percent said a major reason the Democrats won was because they had better candidates.

That means the new Congressional majority may be kept on a short leash. A majority of Americans, 51 percent, believe it's a good thing that the Democrats regained control of Congress, including 18 percent of Republicans, while only 17 percent think it is a bad thing. (When the Republicans won the 2002 midterms, 30 percent thought it was a good thing that the GOP kept control, while 34 percent thought it was a bad thing.)

But the public is worried the Democrats will move too fast on Iraq and too slow on national security. For instance, 51 percent of Americans are very concerned that Congress will push too hastily for the withdrawal of U.S. troops in Iraq. (Only 20 percent say they are not too concerned or not at all concerned.) And 43 percent are very concerned that the new Congress may keep the administration from doing what is necessary to combat terrorism. Only 29 percent are not too concerned or not at all concerned.

The good news for Democrats is that voters believe they know their mandate is limited. Half of all Americans, 50 percent, say Democrats will take a moderate approach, compared to 34 percent who believe they will try to take the country in a more liberal direction. Not surprisingly, Republicans are most skeptical: 52 percent believe the Democrats will try to push America to the left while 37 percent believe they will be more moderate.

And there's massive support for much of the Democratic Congress's presumed agenda. For instance, 75 percent of Americans say allowing the government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies to lower drug prices for seniors should be a "top priority," including 67 percent of Republicans. Increasing the minimum wage comes next (68 percent) on the public's list, followed by investigating government contracts in Iraq (60 percent).

DOJ_NMG_0092979

There's less support for rolling back Bush's tax cuts: 40 percent say that should be a top priority and 24 percent say it shouldn't be done at all. And since the election, Americans have become slightly less interested in investigating impropriety and wrongdoing by members of Congress. The number of Americans who think this should be a top priority has dropped from 62 to 55 percent.

Overall, however, the public wants Congress and the president to put Iraq and national security before domestic issues like the economy and health care, by a margin of 51 to 33 percent. Fifteen percent say they should be equal priorities. But the public is not overly optimistic: 54 percent of Americans say partisan bickering will likely prevent important work from getting done, while 40 percent say the two sides will be able to work together.

With just two years before the next presidential election, the Republicans have some rebuilding to do. Today 48 percent of registered voters would generally like to see a Democrat elected in '08 (including 10 percent of Republicans and 37 percent of independents); compared to 28 percent who want a Republican (including just 3 percent of Democrats and 20 percent of independents). Twenty percent say they don't know.

When it comes to specific potential candidates, the ladies have it. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton registers the highest level of strong support, with 33 percent of registered voters saying there's a good chance they would vote for her and 20 percent saying there's some chance. But she also has high negatives: 45 percent of registered voters say there's no chance they would vote for her. Similarly, 24 percent of registered voters say there's a good chance they would vote for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and 27 percent says there's some chance; but 43 percent say there's no chance.

Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Arizona Sen. John McCain have lower negatives: 24 percent of registered voters say there's a good chance they would vote for Giuliani, 30 percent say there's some chance, and 32 percent say there's no chance. Twenty percent say there's a good chance they would vote for McCain, 34 percent say there's some chance, and 32 percent say there's no chance.

Twenty percent of voters also say there's a good chance they would vote for Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, while 19 percent say there's some chance and 24 percent say there's no chance. More than a third of voters, 34 percent, say they've never heard of him.

Also-rans include former Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry (16 percent good chance, 24 percent some chance, and 55 percent no chance) and Newt Gingrich (10 percent good chance, 17 percent some chance, and 58 percent no chance).

And therein lies some good news for President Bush as he faces the final two years of his Presidency. At least he's not John Kerry.

The NEWSWEEK poll, conducted Nov. 9-10, has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points. In conducting the poll, Princeton Survey Research Associates International interviewed 1,006 adults aged 18 and older.

At Home And Abroad, Things Are Not Going Bush's Way (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — For a relentlessly optimistic President George W. Bush, this is a season of disappointment, surprise and setbacks.

At home and around the world, things are not going his way. With Bush's legacy-building time running out, Americans sent a clear message in Tuesday's election that they were angry at him and wanted change. Though Bush's name was not on the ballot, voters took revenge on the Republican Congress and put the Democrats in charge of both the Senate and House of Representatives.

In an awkward bit of timing, Bush will be globe-trotting when Congress returns to town next week to open its lame-duck session, taking up business the White House deems vital.

DOJ_NMG_0092980

Departing Tuesday, Bush will be away for eight days at a summit of Asia-Pacific rim leaders in Vietnam and stops in Singapore and Indonesia. Back just before Thanksgiving, he will jet off again a few days later for a NATO summit in Latvia and a stop in Estonia.

World leaders will be watching to see if Bush, politically weakened at home, acts differently on the world stage.

Across the globe, the U.S. president is on the defensive about problems ranging from the mess in the Middle East to the nuclear standoffs with Iran and North Korea. Even in his own backyard, there is a growing camp of leftists in Latin America, from Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez to Nicaragua's newly elected Daniel Ortega.

And then there is Iraq.

Four years into an unpopular war that has defined his presidency, Bush thought that by this point he would be bringing some U.S. troops home. Instead, he had to sack his gruff secretary of defense, open himself to a new Iraq strategy and worry about pressure to pull out before he thinks the war is won.

Leaving the polls, a majority of voters said they disapproved of the war and the U.S. should withdraw some or all of its troops from Iraq. Bush meets Monday with members of a blue-ribbon commission looking for a new way forward in Iraq.

Victorious at the polls, Democrats put the White House on notice to expect tougher scrutiny of the war. "Let's find out what's going on with the war in Iraq, the different large federal agencies that we have," said Sen. Harry Reid, the incoming Senate majority leader. "There simply has been no oversight in recent years."

The election was a sobering splash of cold water on the president and political strategist Karl Rove, both of whom had insisted Republicans would win.

On election night, Bush had a dinner of beef loin and squash with Rove, Republican National Committee chief Ken Mehlman, chief of staff Josh Bolten, and friends Brad Freeman, a California venture capitalist, and Don Evans, former commerce secretary. Other officials joined later. The mood was businesslike as people read their Blackberrys and took cellphone calls, one participant said.

Bush is not a man given to second-guessing, self-analyzing or doubts. By the next morning, associates said, he was bouncing back.

"He's not one to get mired in kind of the shoulda, woulda, couldas," said Bush counselor Dan Bartlett. "I saw him coming to grips with it that night and by the time he came walking into the Oval Office Wednesday morning he was looking forward. We had to hold him back from calling Nancy Pelosi (the incoming House speaker) because it was still 6:55 in the morning."

"Why all the glum faces?" Bush said, opening a postelection news conference where he said he shared blamed for the Republican losses.

Later that day, Bolten pulled together several hundred White House staffers in the Old Executive Office Building for an unannounced visit by the president. Bush revved up the troops, told them they were there not to mark time but to get things done, Bartlett said.

"Obviously he's disappointed," Bartlett said, "but his mind's already racing forward, saying, 'All right, we've got to come at the same problems but from a different angle."

The big question is whether Bush, after six years of largely ignoring Democrats, really will be willing to work with the political opposition. Or whether his last two years will be clouded by partisan gridlock. Bush invited the new Democratic leaders to the White House and both sides pledged to cooperate.

"I think he's doing the right things now, right tone," said Republican strategist Ron Kaufman, who worked in the White House under Bush's father. "We'll see how long it lasts on both sides."

Kaufman and others recall how Bush, as governor of Texas, took a bipartisan approach to work with a legislature controlled by Democrats. Of course, many of them were conservatives and saw eye to eye with Bush.

"I think he liked the way he governed in Texas," Kaufman said. "I think he really enjoyed it. And somehow he's gotten away from that. ... I think he'd be relieved to go back to that."

Leon Panetta, a former Democratic congressman who was chief of staff in the Clinton White House, said Bush would have to change the way he does business if he wants to succeed.

DOJ_NMG_0092981

"He's going to have to understand he can't do this by the old playbook," Panetta said. "The Rove playbook is not going to work. If he's going to govern, it means he probably has got to go back and remember what it was like to govern in Texas with a Democratic legislature and the deals that he had to make."

There are doubts Bush will bend on issues dear to conservatives. "The fact is, to work with the Democrats requires him ... to basically say to a quarter or a third or more of his party, 'Sorry, you're out,'" said Norm Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Bush Uses Veterans Day Speech To Thank U.S. Troops For Dedication And Bravery (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. (AP) — President Bush marked Veterans Day by praising U.S. troops for fighting tyranny and oppression, yet touched only briefly on the war in Iraq, where U.S. commanders are rethinking strategy.

Three days after announcing the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Bush hailed members of the armed services, past and present, for their dedication and bravery. His seven-minute speech at Arlington National Cemetery contrasted sharply with the strong rhetoric he used to defend the war on Veterans Day a year ago.

On Saturday, Bush did not cite Iraq and Afghanistan by name, though he did say, "From Valley Forge to Vietnam, from Kuwait to Kandahar, from Berlin to Baghdad, our veterans have borne the costs of America's wars — and they have stood watch over America's peace. The American people are grateful to the veterans and all who have fought for our freedom."

Kandahar is Afghanistan's second-largest city. Baghdad is the Iraqi capital.

Cannons fired a 21-gun salute and soldiers, clasping rifles with bayonets, stood at attention as Bush's motorcade wound through rows of white tombstones. The president laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns, holding his hand over his heart as a bugler played taps.

Paying tribute to American troops, the commander in chief said, "They've brought down tyrants, they've liberated two nations, they have helped bring freedom to more than 50 million people" — a reference to Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Through their sacrifice, they're making this nation safer and more secure — and they are earning the proud title of veteran," Bush said.

On Veterans Day last year, Bush rebuked congressional critics of his Iraq war policy. Speaking at an Army depot in Tobyhanna, Pa., he accused opposition lawmakers of being "deeply irresponsible" and sending the wrong signal both to America's enemy and to U.S. troops.

Last year's speech was part of a coordinated White House effort to bolster the president's waning credibility and dwindling support for the war. At the time, the U.S. death count had exceeded 2,000. Today it tops 2,840.

In Baghdad on Saturday, police reported gunmen ambushed minibuses, killing at least 10 passengers and kidnapping about 50, and a pair of car bombs tore through a downtown shopping district killing eight people

Democrats, who took control of the House and Senate in Tuesday's voting, read the elections as a demand for change in Iraq.

"Americans across the country made it clear that they want a new direction in Iraq and in the war on terror, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said in his party's weekly radio address.

Democrats have not coalesced around one alternative strategy for Iraq.

"We will listen to the military, take their advice, and ensure that our troops and agencies have the tools and equipment they need to defend our freedom," Dean said.

In the presidential radio address, broadcast before his visit to the cemetery, Bush said America's enemies should not read the election results as a sign of U.S. weakness. During the campaign, he contended Democrats would undermine national security.

"The elections will bring changes to Washington," Bush said. "But one thing has not changed: America faces brutal enemies who have attacked us before and want to attack us again.

"I have a message for these enemies: Do not confuse the workings of American democracy with a lack of American will," the president said. "Our nation is committed to bringing you to justice, and we will prevail."

DOJ_NMG_0092982

Bush and his national security team planned to meet Monday with members of the Iraq Study Group. The bipartisan panel, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, was expected to report its recommendations by the end of the year.

Meanwhile at the Pentagon where former CIA Director Robert Gates has been nominated to replace Rumsfeld, changes in Iraq are being evaluated by the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq; and Gen. John Abizaid, the head of the command that oversees U.S. forces in the Mideast.

"At this moment, more than 1.4 million Americans are on active duty, serving in the cause of freedom and peace around the world," Bush said, standing under a marble archway inscribed with a passage from President Lincoln's Gettysburg Address: "We here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain."

Bush Hails Bravery, Dedication Of Troops (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Steve Kowaleski has made a Veterans Day pilgrimage to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial for each of the past 14 years, and the experience never gets any easier.

More than 35 years after he served, he said yesterday, standing a few yards from the Wall, he still grapples with the reality that his friends never made it home.

They were comrades he knew from growing up in Bristol, Conn., and men he met in Vietnam. Altogether, Kowaleski said, he knew more than 20 people whose names are inscribed on the memorial.

"It's a place of saying goodbye -- still saying goodbye," he said softly, hands clasped at his waist, sunglasses concealing his eyes. "That's why I come back every year."

On a day when the country saluted the military with somber ceremonies and small-town parades, thousands of veterans and their families gathered at the Vietnam memorial to pay homage to the 58,249 missing and dead whose names are etched on the Wall.

At Arlington National Cemetery, President Bush laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns and praised members of the armed services, past and present.

"From Valley Forge to Vietnam, from Kuwait to Kandahar, from Berlin to Baghdad, our veterans have borne the costs of America's wars, and they have stood watch over America's peace," the president said. "The American people are grateful to the veterans and all who have fought for our freedom."

Referring to Iraq and Afghanistan, Bush hailed U.S. troops, saying, "They've brought down tyrants. They've liberated two nations. They have helped bring freedom to more than 50 million people."

At the ceremony at the Vietnam memorial, a bagpiper performed a rendition of "Amazing Grace," and a bugler played taps.

Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne laid a wreath for his brother, Patrick, who died in Vietnam on Aug. 8, 1966. It was the same day the secretary graduated from West Point and reported to the Air Force.

"This wall tells the story of those who fought in Vietnam, and it links us to future generations of American soldiers," Wynne said. "As Air Force secretary, I think daily of our forebears and the legacy of sacrifice and valor."

Elizabeth Lopez, who served in Iraq, told the crowd of the kinship she felt with Vietnam veterans when her tour of duty ended and she returned to her native El Paso.

Until then, she said, she never understood the true meaning of the words "welcome home."

"Every time I hear it, that knot in my throat is still there," she said. When Lopez's remarks ended, the audience rose from their seats and applauded.

Standing with a few friends in the back of the crowd, Ray Heikkila, 58, an Army veteran, said he looks forward to Veterans Day because he sees people who understood what remains a defining part of his life.

"It's like a healing," he said. "You get to sit down with other vets and get things off your chest."

His pal, Jim LaManna, 59, wore a camouflage jacket with an American flag stitched to the back. He said he knows veterans who refuse to make the trip because "they don't want to hear about the war."

DOJ_NMG_0092983

But LaManna said he has never felt that way, if only because of an innate sense of duty to recognize the fallen. "I was there. I know the guys who died there," he said. "It's a brotherhood, a camaraderie thing."

He tapped his fist on his chest.

"It's here," he said, "in the heart and soul."

For Vets And President, A Day Of Remembrance (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, November 12, 2006

President Bush yesterday attended Veterans Day ceremonies at Arlington National Cemetery to praise U.S. troops who have fought oppression around the world.

"This day is dedicated to all who answered the call to service," Mr. Bush said, "whether they live in honor among us or sleep in valor beneath this sacred ground."

The ceremony was one of many that took place yesterday at war memorials around the country and the region, including sites of honor for World War II and Vietnam veterans.

At Arlington yesterday, Mr. Bush laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns and paid homage to the more than 1.4 million Americans on active duty, calling them "our nation's finest citizens."

"They confront grave danger to defend the safety of the American people," Mr. Bush said. "They've brought down tyrants. They've liberated two nations. They have helped bring freedom to more than 50 million people."

At the U.S. Navy Memorial, the Naval District of Washington laid a wreath at the Lone Sailor Statue. The French War Veterans of Washington, D.C., also laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns in Arlington.

During a ceremony at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, thousands paid respects to the men and women who were killed while serving in the armed forces during the war in Vietnam.

"The memorial ... holds a special place in our nation's heart," said U.S. Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne, who graduated from the U.S. Military Academy and served in the Air Force for seven years.

Mr. Wynne's brother, Maj. Patrick E. Wynne, was killed in Vietnam in 1966. He was declared missing in action until his remains were discovered in 1974.

"Today is very much a day of remembrance and reflection," Mr. Wynne said.

A long line of people waited to lay flowers and wreaths at the base of the black granite wall, which is engraved with 58,249 names honoring the Americans who died in the war.

The scene at the wall alternated between solemn and celebratory, as families remembered loved ones and soldier buddies reunited.

John Reichenberg, an Army veteran from Annapolis, his fiance and a group of fellow military veterans visited the memorial -- a trip that Mr. Reichenberg for years had found too difficult to make.

"Up until '89, I couldn't even think about coming here," said Mr. Reichenberg, 61, who served two years in Vietnam beginning in 1968, almost immediately after graduating from college, "but they say it's a 'wall of healing.' It's really hard, but once you do it, it feels like a weight's been lifted."

Since he began attending the annual ceremonies at the memorial, Mr. Reichenberg has searched unsuccessfully for soldiers with whom he served.

"I've probably brought at least a half-dozen vets down here," he said, "and every time, whoever I bring, they meet someone that was in [Vietnam] with them, and I haven't done it yet."

Yesterday was also the anniversary of the Vietnam Women's Memorial, dedicated in 1993.

"Three months ago, I walked through this national park for the first time, and while facing different monuments, I was overwhelmed at every stop," said Elizabeth Lopez, a construction mechanic 2nd Class in the naval reserves.

Miss Lopez, of El Paso, Texas, also served in the Army seven years ago as a Patriot missile crew member in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia.

DOJ_NMG_0092984

After completing her enlistment, she became a reservist in a Seabee Naval Reserve unit. She was recalled to active duty last year to serve in Iraq as a gunner.

She returned home earlier this year to El Paso, where she is a readjustment counseling specialist at a veterans center.

"I am very humbled to be here, in this sacred place of healing that pays tribute to many generations of veterans," she said. "While I may not share the same battles that many of these great men and women have encountered, I do share a common connection with them."

Vote Won't Lessen Resolve, Bush Tells Terrorists (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush warned U.S. adversaries around the world Saturday that Republican losses in the midterm congressional election didn't signal a weakening of American resolve to win the war on terrorism.

"America faces brutal enemies who have attacked us before and want to attack us again," the president said in his weekly radio address. "I have a message for these enemies: Do not confuse the workings of American democracy with a lack of American will. Our nation is committed to bringing you to justice, and we will prevail."

Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean said in a response to Bush that voters made it clear they wanted "a new direction" in Iraq and his party intended to use its control of Congress to try to deliver that.

Bush also went to Arlington National Cemetery on Saturday to join in solemn observances of Veterans Day. On a sunny, spring-like morning, the president laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns and delivered brief remarks honoring the bravery of American troops.

"They are our nation's finest citizens," he said. "They confront grave danger to defend the safety of the American people."

Since the March 2003 start of the Iraq war, 2,845 U.S. service members have died, according to the Associated Press. And 288 have been killed in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Uzbekistan since the U.S. invaded Afghanistan in 2001 to oust the Taliban and attempt to capture Osama bin Laden.

In his radio address, Bush also praised outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who had become a lightning rod for critics of the war. After the Republicans lost control of Congress in an election that turned into a referendum on the war, the president announced that Rumsfeld would resign. Rumsfeld will serve until his replacement, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates, is confirmed.

Bush also said that Iraq, where about 145,000 U.S. forces remain in a struggle to squelch violence between Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias, is "the central front in this war on terror."

Giving the weekly Democratic response to the president, Dean appeared to draw a distinction between Iraq and the war on terrorism.

"On Tuesday, Americans across the country made it clear that they want a new direction in Iraq and in the war on terror," he said. "Voters also made it clear that they want defense policies that are tough and smart. Our agenda includes a new direction for defending America at home and around the world."

Democrats in Congress, said the former Vermont governor and 2004 presidential contender, "will listen to the military, take their advice, and ensure that our troops and agencies have the tools and equipment they need to defend our freedom."

Since Tuesday's election, the president has met with the Democrats who will lead the next Congress and signaled he intended to work with them to find a solution on Iraq. In the midst of the campaign, he spoke harshly of the desire of many Democrats to get out of Iraq, saying it would mean "the terrorists win and America loses."

On Monday, Bush is scheduled to meet with members of the Iraq Study Group, a committee of policy elders that is seeking to develop bipartisan proposals for a shift in the conduct of the Iraq war.

The group is led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who served under the president's father, and by former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), a longtime foreign policy expert.

DOJ_NMG_0092985

Chief among the recommendations the group is said to be considering: that the U.S. declare its commitment in Iraq not to be open-ended. That would be coupled with increased pressure on the Iraqi government to seek political solutions to the sectarian strife that threatens to tear the country apart.

Members of the group are also said to favor involving other nations in the search for political solutions in Iraq. That could mean reaching out to Iran and Syria, which the Bush administration has branded as supporters of terrorism.

At Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia, Bush singled out the 1.4 million active-duty members of the military for praise.

"They've brought down tyrants, they've liberated two nations, they have helped to bring freedom to more than 50 million people," he said.

"Through their sacrifice, they're making this nation safer and more secure — and they are earning the proud title of veteran."

Spinning Out Of An Electoral Beating (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

AT HIS NEWS conference after Tuesday's elections, President Bush struck a note of reassurance. "I have a message for those on the front lines," he said. "To our enemies, do not be joyful. Do not confuse the workings of our democracy with a lack of will…. To our brave men and women in uniform: Don't be doubtful. America will always support you."

Why would terrorists or U.S. soldiers think electing Democrats would suggest a lack of will or support for the troops? Oh, right. Because Bush had been saying so. "However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win, and America loses," he told a GOP crowd in October. "That's what's at stake in this election."

I guess if I were a terrorist, I would have been joyful to learn that the people who were going to help me win had prevailed in the elections.

It's a political tradition for candidates on both sides to immediately change their tune after an election. Last week, Democrats were ripping Bush to shreds, and now they're promising to work with him. Still, even by these standards, the Republican turnabout has been unusually abrupt. Suddenly they're all but admitting that everything they had said before the election was a lie.

Even beginning as early as election night, the conservative spin asserted that Democrats had won by running as ideological ciphers.

"Democrats, in my mind, don't have a mandate because they stood for nothing," said conservative radio host Laura Ingraham. And from a Wall Street Journal editorial: "While a thumping defeat for the GOP, the vote was about competence, not ideological change."

Of course, the Journal, and every other Republican organ, has been insisting for months that Democrats are a bunch of left-wing tax lovers. They have endlessly repeated a quote by incoming Democratic House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charlie Rangel of New York — who, when asked which Bush tax cuts he'd extend, replied that he couldn't think of one. Bush repeated this quote as recently as two days before the election. Presumably, some people actually believed the president when he said this.

Now they tell us that a vote for the Democrats was really a vote to continue Republican policies. It's kind of cruel to have the rug pulled out from under us. Hey, I was supporting the Democrats precisely because I thought they'd jack up taxes!

To be fair, the conservatives are right that there were plenty of nonideological reasons for the Democratic victory. People were frustrated about Iraq, the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Republican corruption and scandals and (though conservatives won't admit this last one) an economy that isn't raising most people's living standards.

So it's perfectly true that the election should not be interpreted as a line-item endorsement of the Democratic agenda.

Yet that's almost always the case.

Four years ago, George W. Bush won reelection in large part because he happened to be in office Sept. 11, 2001 (and also because nobody could stand John Kerry). That didn't stop conservatives from insisting that voters had signed up for his domestic and foreign agenda in its entirety. The Journal's 2004 postelection editorial called Bush's victory "a decisive mandate for a second term" and proceeded to explain why voters had endorsed measures such as privatization of Social Security.

DOJ_NMG_0092986

Possibly the funniest about-face in last week's elections came from Rush Limbaugh, who gleefully declared that, with the elections over, "I no longer am gonna have to carry the water for people who I think don't deserve having their water carried."

Other conservative talk-show hosts offered up similar sentiments. It's nice for Limbaugh to concede that up until this point he had simply been a GOP mouthpiece. But maybe he should have let his listeners in on the secret before.

Incoming Democrats Put Populism Before Ideology (NYT)

By Robin Toner, Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 — The newly elected Democratic class of 2006, which is set to descend on the Capitol next week, will hardly be the first freshmen to arrive in Washington promising to make a difference.

The last time Congress changed hands, the Republican freshman class of 1994 roared into town under the leadership of Newt Gingrich as speaker and quickly advanced a conservative agenda of exceptional ambition.

Many in the class of 2006, especially those who delivered the new Democratic majorities by winning Republican seats, show little appetite for that kind of ideological crusade. But in interviews with nearly half of them this week, the freshmen — 41 in the House and 9 in the Senate, including one independent — conveyed a keen sense of their own moment in history, and a distinct world view: they say they were given a rare opportunity by voters, many of them independents and Republicans, who were tired of the partisanship and gridlock in Washington.

Now, they say, they have to produce — to deal with long-festering problems like access to affordable health care and the loss of manufacturing jobs, and to find a bipartisan consensus for an exit strategy in Iraq, a source of continuing division not only between but also within the parties.

Many of them say they must also, somehow, find a way to address the growing anxiety among voters about a global economy that no longer seems to work for them. There is a strong populist tinge to this class.

In general, they set themselves an extraordinary (political veterans might say impossible) task: to avoid the ideological wars that have so dominated Congress in recent years, to be pragmatists, and to change the tone in Washington after a sharply partisan campaign.

“I see myself, hopefully, as a bridge builder, a consensus person,” said Harry Mitchell, 66, a longtime state senator and former mayor of Tempe, Ariz., who defeated Representative J. D. Hayworth, an emblematic member of the class of 1994. “I can’t be a rabid partisan Democrat and represent this district.”

Nancy Boyda, who defeated Representative Jim Ryun, the legendary track star, in a district in Kansas that President Bush carried by 20 percentage points in 2004, summarized her mandate this way: “Stop the gridlock, stop the nastiness, get something done. People are tired of excuses.”

Claire McCaskill, who defeated Senator Jim Talent of Missouri in a fiercely competitive race, said: “I’m not from a blue echo chamber. I’m from a state that’s really like America — it’s divided.”

“The problem with Washington,” Ms. McCaskill added, “is you have so many senators who are from bright blue and bright red states; they’re not interested in common ground. They’re interested in making each other look bad.”

These attitudes could lead to tensions with the party’s liberal base in Congress — many of the party’s expected committee chairmen are traditional liberals — and thus occasional headaches over the next two years for the Democratic leaders, Representative Nancy Pelosi and Senator Harry Reid.

But Democratic strategists say both leaders recognize that the new Democratic majority was elected, in large part, from Republican-leaning districts and states. If those new members vote in a purely partisan way, they — and the majority — will quickly be put at risk.

Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who recruited many of these candidates as head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, described the group as “moderate in temperament and reformers in spirit.” Conservatives tend to highlight the conservatism in the new class as a sign that Democrats are essentially ceding ground to the right on issues like gun control and abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0092987

But many of these freshmen Democrats are hard to pigeonhole ideologically. Even among the most socially conservative, there is a strong streak of economic populism that is a unifying force.

Heath Shuler, for example, the former professional football player and newly elected House Democrat from North Carolina, is anti-abortion and pro-gun, but sounds like an old-style Democrat on economic issues.

"I was taught at a very, very young age about faith and personal responsibility, and through that, that responsibility was about helping those who cannot help themselves," Mr. Shuler said. "If you look at what the Democratic Party stands for, it is about helping others who can't help themselves."

Like other Democrats, he supports legislation to increase the minimum wage and make college tuition tax deductible. He also opposes trade agreements that he says have led to a 78 percent loss in textile industry jobs in his state.

Similarly, Ms. Boyda of Kansas, a first-time office holder who relied on lengthy newspaper inserts to make her case to the voters, said, "The rural economy has been left out." She added: "A lot of my district feels a great deal of insecurity about their jobs, their health care, their business, their family farm. They feel like they're just kind of hanging out there."

Carol Shea-Porter, a social worker and new House member from New Hampshire who considers herself a populist, said, "The theme of my campaign was, I'm running for the rest of us." She added that no matter how much the Bush administration boasted of job growth, her voters "understood those were Wal-Mart jobs." And, she said, "They understood when they talked about the stock market boom, that half of Americans aren't even in the stock market."

Jim Webb, who defeated Senator George Allen of Virginia, campaigned heavily on the idea that the middle class was increasingly at risk in an age of growing inequality. Bob Casey, who overwhelmingly defeated Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, said he looked forward to "a really intensive focus on health care that I hope to be a part of."

That economic populism extends, for many candidates, to a new emphasis on expanding health coverage. Congressional Democrats who lived through the Clinton administration's failed effort to create a national health insurance plan, which many believe was a crucial factor in the Democrats' losses in 1994, have been wary of broad health legislation for years. (And being in the minority, they were unable to do much about it, regardless.) But the class of '06 is adamant that something major can, and will, be done.

Dave Loebsack, a political science professor in Iowa who unseated the veteran Republican moderate, Representative Jim Leach, said he intended to sign on to proposed legislation to create a single-payer, national health insurance program "as one of the first things I will do when I get to Congress."

"I have no idea where it's going to go next year," Mr. Loebsack said, "but at least we can give it a fair hearing."

Steven Kagen, an allergist who won a Wisconsin district that has been represented by a Republican for much of the past 30 years, campaigned on a "No Patient Left Behind" plan. Mr. Kagen won despite doubters who called it "the Hillary hot potato," a reference to the first lady turned New York senator who was the architect of the Clinton plan.

"This issue has blurred the lines between the two parties," Mr. Kagen said. "You don't have to be a Republican or a Democrat to be ill, and to understand that the health care system doesn't work."

Mr. Kagen is one of several new House members urging a renewed commitment to the more than eight million uninsured children in the United States, an issue that will move to the forefront when the State Children's Health Insurance Program comes up for renewal next year.

Most of these new Democrats said they were also committed to changes in the new Medicare prescription drug program; in fact, giving the government the power to negotiate prices with drug companies is one of the first items of business in the Democrats' "Six for '06 Agenda." The agenda also includes an increase in the minimum wage and expansion of embryonic stem cell research.

Ron Klein, a state senator who defeated the veteran Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida, said he had often heard both from retirees who fell into the gaps of the new Medicare drug plan and from "taxpayers who were really put off that this was something that could have been done a lot better."

Democrats, of course, had their chance to resolve the prescription drug problem in the past — their party held the Senate for a brief period in 2001-02 — and few issues have been more divisive on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0092988

But the new Democrats say they have high hopes of building bipartisan coalitions for these changes in Medicare, for expanding embryonic stem cell research, and for other parts of their agenda. “I’m still scratching my head” over Mr. Bush’s veto of last year’s stem cell bill, said Ed Perlmutter, a former state senator who won a House district in the Denver suburbs.

Representative Sherrod Brown, who is moving to the Senate from the House after beating Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, argued: “Tell me a whole lot of Republicans won’t work with us on finding a way for middle-class kids to get a college education, to vote for embryonic stem cell research, to raise the minimum wage. John McCain is already out there talking about prescription drug issues.”

The flip side to this, Democratic strategists say, is that Republicans could peel off a critical mass of conservative Democrats on certain issues. Some veterans on Capitol Hill remember the Democratic Congress of the early Reagan years, when conservative Democrats regularly broke ranks on tax cuts.

The true challenge to any new climate of bipartisanship will most likely come over Iraq. Many of the freshmen said they looked to the bipartisan Iraq Study Group — led by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton — as an invaluable vehicle for consensus building.

“I pray, and I mean that literally, that their recommendation can be seen as a way forward,” Ms. Boyda said.

They also said they were pleased that Mr. Bush announced, the day after the election, that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would be replaced. Gabrielle Giffords, newly elected to a House seat in Arizona, said she had rarely given a speech without calling for Mr. Rumsfeld’s removal.

But there are still divisions in the Democratic caucus over an exit strategy for Iraq, although many of the freshmen come to Washington with a keen sense of the voters’ desire for change. Joe Sestak, a former Navy vice admiral who won a House seat in Pennsylvania, said: “I honestly believe this nation in its vote has said: ‘What are we doing in Iraq? We can’t stay there.’ I think they are rightfully leading the leaders to say, ‘Set a date; move toward it.’ ”

Others stop short of suggesting a fixed timetable. As they headed to Washington for their orientation, many of the incoming freshmen still spoke like outsiders. Tim Walz, a Minnesota teacher, retired National Guardsman and newly elected House Democrat, described himself as “a farm state Democrat-soldier who’s concerned about the environment and civil liberties.”

He has seen how ugly the partisanship can get in American politics, Mr. Walz said, and is adamant about changing it. “I’m convinced that what we need to do is heal,” he said. “Tuesday was not a Democratic referendum; it was an American referendum. It’s not that the American people are so enamored with the Democratic vision, but what they believed is what we said about cleaning up corruption, having some real open debate. It just seems so broken.”

Democrats Find Lessons In GOP Reign (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Democrats preparing to take control of Congress for the first time in over a decade are looking to the Republican takeover in 1995 as an object lesson of what to emulate and what to avoid. They hope to match the legislative energy of the Newt Gingrich era while avoiding at all costs the partisan pitfalls that eventually soured voters on the GOP.

The majority party that takes control of the House and Senate in January will look significantly different from the party that was swept from power in the 1994 elections. The old-guard liberals and staunch union supporters in control then are giving way to a new generation of moderates with more temperate legislative ambitions.

Democrats last week picked up six seats in the Senate and at least 28 seats in the House en route to victory. Eleven of those House districts were solidly Republican in the 2004 presidential election, while new Democratic senators from Montana, Missouri, Virginia and Ohio will have to be mindful of their traditionally Republican constituents.

Led by a feisty Nevada senator and the first woman in history to claim the House speaker's post, the long-banished Democrats hope to prove their bona fides as lawmakers and challenge a president from the other party to accept their agenda, a game plan taken straight from the Gingrich era's "Contract With America." They also intend to challenge President Bush to change course in Iraq and consider their demands for a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0092989

But Democrats say they will avoid the overreaching, arrogance and rancorous partisanship that left them virtually powerless on Capitol Hill and spawned an era of political corruption and influence-peddling. Democratic leaders vowed last week to pass major ethics reforms early in the new 110th Congress, and to offer Republicans seats at the negotiating table and ample opportunities to amend bills on the floor -- opportunities that were denied their party.

"What they did was very effective in pulling up all the ladders for any other party to gain the majority," incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said last week of the Gingrich revolutionaries. "They just shut the doors to debate on the floor, to amendments coming, to even how special orders [speeches] were conducted. Everything they were effective in using to gain the majority they shut down."

"We're going to do the opposite," she pledged.

"This country has spoken loudly and clearly," Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), slated to become the new Senate majority leader in January, told a Capitol Hill rally last week. "There must be a change of direction in Iraq. We have to have results in doing something to make health care more affordable and more available. We have to do something to create energy independence."

House Democratic leaders have put forward an ambitious opening salvo for January, a 100-hour legislative blitz that includes raising the minimum wage, boosting alternative-energy research and repealing tax breaks for oil companies. They also want to beef up seaport screening, expand college tuition assistance, boost stem cell research and allow the federal government to negotiate lower drug prices under Medicare.

House Democrats also hope to approve rules changes to limit the influence of lobbyists, offer the minority party more input on legislation, curb home-state pet projects in spending bills and, possibly, give the District of Columbia voting rights on the House floor.

But once the 100 hours or so pass, pressure will mount on Democrats to confront what many liberals see as the misdeeds of Bush and the Republican Party. The party's base is clamoring for Democrats to repeal tax cuts skewed to the affluent, to revisit the new law authorizing military tribunals for terrorism suspects and to investigate the run-up to the Iraq invasion.

To some Democrats, such calls raise memories of the aggressive -- and ultimately self-destructive -- stance that House Republicans took when they stormed to power in the 1994 election and later voted to impeach President Bill Clinton, only to see Clinton acquitted in the Senate.

"They're under great pressure to placate the base, to be hard-line and in some ways to pay back the Republicans," said former senator Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.), the last Democratic Senate majority leader. "But they're also under tremendous pressure to produce and show they can govern. Finding the balance, that's going to be the big challenge."

"It's one thing to oppose and obstruct. It's another to try to govern and legislate," said Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), a moderate Republican who is urging bipartisan cooperation. "How they set in gear the motions for governing and legislating will clearly set the tone for the duration."

The ranks of the new Democratic leadership will include Reid, who once called Bush a "loser" and a "liar"; Pelosi, who bitterly remembers the power shift to the Republicans; and a new Democratic Caucus chairman, Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), who confronted Gingrich's revolution as an aide in the Clinton White House.

"Newt ran in and said, 'I'm basically the prime minister,' " Emanuel recalled. "We didn't do that. Nancy said we won an election. The president won an election. We have to respect the results of both 2004 and 2006."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, agreed: "We should always be mindful that there was a little bit of God and a lot of bit of luck here. A 4,000-vote shift and we would have four new senators, not the U.S. Senate."

If all voters see is interest-group politics and "a lot of shouting," Schumer added, "our victory could be ephemeral . . . more ephemeral than Gingrich's one was. Everyone has to be cognizant of the fact that keeping the majority helps all of us achieve far more of our goals than if we undermine it."

But there are limits to such sentiments. In the 1990s, Republicans shifted the number of committee seats allotted to the majority and minority parties to virtually ensure that no cross-party collaboration would be needed to draft and pass legislation. When asked whether she may change those ratios as a goodwill gesture, Pelosi last week snapped, "I don't see a scenario where there is going to be much appetite for that."

DOJ_NMG_0092990

And regardless of leaders' intent, conservative Democrats worry that Democratic old bulls, returning to chair committees after so long in the minority, could drive a partisan agenda. Some fear that Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), at the helm of the education panel, and Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, may be too quick to pick fights before Democrats can cement their gains.

"We increased our market share by going where the market was, to moderate, even Republican districts," said Rep. John S. Tanner (Tenn.), a leader of the conservative Blue Dog Democrats, which has grown to become one of the largest House Democratic factions. "If we're going to hold and consolidate that, we have to understand the reality that the face of the Democratic Caucus has changed from where it was in late '80s and early '90s."

Similar dynamics may be at play in the Senate, where Democrats will hold a one-vote majority. The incoming class of senators includes two economic populists in Reps. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) and Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.), a classic centrist with a slender mandate in Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), and a cantankerous conservative in Jim Webb (D-Va.).

"It's going to be an interesting year," quipped one Senate Democratic leadership aide.

Once Democrats have exhausted their consensus agenda, a legislative priority list they call "6 for '06," they will have to decide whether they need to become more ambitious -- balancing the budget, overhauling immigration policy, or tackling problems of poverty and the uninsured, for instance -- or focus on the nuts and bolts of governance to prove competence ahead of the 2008 campaign.

Schumer said they need to be aggressive: " 'Six for '06' is enough to establish a beachhead, but it's not enough for '08."

William Howell, a political scientist at the University of Chicago's Harris School of Public Policy and the co-author of a forthcoming book on the balance of power between Congress and the presidency, disagreed. There may be nothing in the Democrats' agenda beyond the opening salvo, he said, and there probably does not have to be. The election of 1994 brought to power a Republican leadership that campaigned on a specific platform, along with a huge freshman class of ideological conservatives. That was not the case in 2006.

"Everyone woke up Wednesday saying America wants change, but they didn't say, 'Americans want the following five legislative items,' " he said.

Howell said Democrats should pass new ethics laws to distance themselves from the scandal-ridden 109th Congress, push a few broadly popular initiatives such as a minimum wage increase and then concentrate on the business of governance -- passing spending bills on time, taking up nominations and confronting national issues as they arise.

Partisan energies should be channeled to hearings, especially on the conduct of the war in Iraq, which would be far more effective in marshalling public pressure on Bush than any legislation, he said.

Douglas MacKinnon, an aide to then-Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) during the 1990s, said Democrats must learn from Republican mistakes.

"Number one, you don't have a mandate," he said, addressing Democrats. "The American people were just sick of the other side, so don't turn things upside down, because they won't put up with it. . . . And guess what, the American people do want you to work with the other side. Republicans didn't. They let arrogance rule the day, and it hurt them in the end."

Reid, An Ex-boxer, Hasn't Forgotten Bush's Punches (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

In the coming months, it will probably be useful to remember that as a young man, Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) spent some time as an amateur middleweight boxer. Reid understands one reason his job title is changing from leader of the Democratic minority to Senate majority leader is that many voters recoiled against the unrelenting combat between the parties that has characterized George W. Bush's presidency.

But it's also apparent that Reid has not forgotten the punches thrown by the White House and GOP congressional leaders over the last six years, and that he considers more than a few of them low blows.

DOJ_NMG_0092991

President Bush, at his morning-after-the-deluge news conference Wednesday, grandly declared inoperative his slashing campaign-trail claim that the Democratic agenda on national security and Iraq could be reduced to a single equation: "The terrorists win and America loses."

Reid talks about turning the other cheek, but he also seems to remember exactly where that blow landed and how much it stung. "Some of the things that have been said by [Vice President Dick] Cheney and [the president] are hard to comprehend," Reid told a small group of reporters late last week.

It was only a single jab from Reid, tight and targeted, but it was also a signal of how much Bush's life will change during the next two years. Notwithstanding occasional dissent, the GOP Congress saw itself as a supporting member of the White House team, almost as if both were part of a parliamentary system. In that role, Capitol Hill Republicans allowed Bush to set the national agenda and minimized congressional oversight that might have embarrassed the administration.

With Reid and incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, Bush will face two pugnacious Democrats determined to challenge his agenda and to force him to react to their own goals. Bush could count on congressional Republicans to repeatedly schedule votes on his priorities, such as legislation to abolish the estate tax. Reid dismisses that idea with barely a shrug. "We wasted so much time on it," he says. Is Bush's goal of eliminating the estate tax dead? "It better be," he says.

Instead, Democrats want to force the national debate onto a very different agenda. Reid says he expects the Senate "pretty quickly" to pass legislation raising the minimum wage. He's also optimistic about quick action allowing Medicare to negotiate directly with drug companies for lower prescription prices — an idea the White House and the pharmaceutical industry blocked in 2003 when Congress passed the drug benefit for seniors.

Reid anticipates more aggressive congressional oversight, starting with Iraq. Outgoing Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), a close White House ally, slow-walked a promised investigation into whether intelligence data supported the administration's prewar public claims about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction. Roberts also structured the inquiry in ways that constrained the danger to Bush; most important, the committee did not compel senior administration officials to answer questions under oath.

Now Reid expects John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), who will head the Senate Intelligence Committee, to briskly conclude a comprehensive study. "I think not only as part of good government, but as part of history, that investigation should be completed," he says.

The biggest question facing the incoming Democratic majorities in both chambers is how hard to push Bush on Iraq. Almost all Democrats are comfortable with examining the administration's performance through tough oversight and exhorting Bush to change course.

Reid, for one, has a crisp set of preferences on Iraq. He wants Bush to personally convene a regional conference with Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Syria (the latter has been on the president's do-not-call list) to search for political solutions. Reid also wants to reexamine the reconstruction process — which, he says pointedly, has consisted of "throwing bundles of hundred-dollar bills to" Halliburton Co.

And he wants Bush to reduce the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and shift their focus from frontline fighting to training Iraqi forces. "We don't need our people patrolling the streets, walking down and being shot," Reid insists.

Reid, like almost all Democrats, hopes that the bipartisan commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) that is studying Iraq policy will push Bush in this direction when it reports this winter.

But if the commission doesn't recommend big change, or if Bush rejects it, congressional Democrats will face a momentous decision: whether to attempt to pass legislation compelling the president to begin withdrawing from Iraq.

It's already clear that Democratic activists are expecting more than kibitzing about Iraq from the party's new congressional majority. The message from Democratic voters about Iraq "wasn't just that it's a mess, it was 'We are hiring you ... to lead the country out of it,' " says Eli Pariser, executive director of the MoveOn.org political action committee. An election-eve poll for the group found that two-thirds of voters who supported Democrats expected them to reduce or withdraw troops from Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0092992

Reid hears the message, but he's cautious. An earlier generation of congressional critics who sought to cut off funding for the Vietnam War faced charges of undermining the troops. Reid says, "You have people being shot up, blown up [in Iraq], and we want to make sure that there is never a question that we aren't supportive totally of them."

Attempting to legislate an accelerated disengagement from Iraq clearly isn't Reid's first choice but, tellingly, he doesn't rule it out. "It may come to that," he says.

In other words, Reid isn't trading haymakers with Bush on the war, but he's taping his hands and edging closer to the ring.

Ascending To A National Platform (LAT)

By Faye Fiore, Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The phone rang at 7:15 the morning after Nancy Pelosi and the Democrats swept into power. It woke her up.

"Do we have a baby?" Pelosi asked without pausing for hello. Her youngest daughter, Alexandra, was pregnant and six days overdue. Who else would call so early?

It was the president of the United States, holding.

"Leader Pelosi?" a confused switchboard operator asked, as President Bush waited to congratulate the woman who helped engineer the election-day "thumping" of his party.

As a member of the Democratic House leadership for five years, Pelosi has been an important Washington player. But this week, she awoke to a celebrity of a whole other order.

Her near-certain ascension as the nation's first female speaker of the House had networks lining up for interviews and newspapers placing her picture on the front page. Blogs were abuzz.

Overnight, a woman who was scarcely known to the nation moved into a world of constant public attention. The morning after the election, she left her condo in Washington's Georgetown neighborhood without makeup on — she likes to apply it in the car — and walked into an ABC News stakeout.

Later last week, she lunched with Bush, shaking his hand at an Oval Office appearance where, in a postelection ritual familiar in Washington, the two leaders jointly vowed to end the partisan bickering. She met with Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming Senate majority leader, to map out the agenda for the first 100 hours of the Congress that convenes in January.

A Washington power shift would have been big news by any measure, but Pelosi's historic elevation handed her a larger megaphone to sound the themes her party hopes to build on. She began spelling out her agenda before the victory confetti was swept up: a new direction in Iraq, a higher federal minimum wage, lower prescription drug costs, more civility and improved ethics in Washington.

As the only daughter of late Maryland congressman and Baltimore Mayor Tommy D'Alesandro, Pelosi was nurtured in a political environment. There were always constituents in the living room, many of them looking for jobs or other help, their names kept in a "favor file" for consultation at election time.

Married and settled in San Francisco, she raised her five children in a similar atmosphere, enlisting them to stuff envelopes while she juggled laundry, meals and Democratic fundraising, ultimately as California party chairwoman and a major national fundraiser. Her efforts helped lure the party's presidential convention to San Francisco in 1984 and helped Democrats regain control of the Senate two years later.

She was 47 — her youngest child a senior in high school — before she sought elected office, winning a seat in Congress from San Francisco. It was a late start in a Capitol filled with people who had lusted for political power since running for student-body president.

Now 66, Pelosi both embraces her status as the nation's senior elected woman and bristles when pigeonholed as the first female this or that.

She demands to be regarded as a lawmaker who happens to be a woman, not the other way around.

Yet she never missed a chance to use gender to political advantage in the closing weeks of the bruising midterm campaign. "It will take a woman to clean up the House," she told audiences time and again.

DOJ_NMG_0092993

She likes to say that motherhood taught her to be organized, broker disputes and do a dozen things at once.

Family and colleagues speak of her inexhaustible energy, then and now. Pelosi's daughter Christine, 40, doesn't remember her mother sleeping much.

Pelosi does not exercise regularly and is a confessed chocoholic; there are bowls of it in her office. (The White House tactically served Chocolate Freedom, a souffle, for Thursday's luncheon dessert.)

In two months of campaigning, Pelosi made 37 visits to 18 states and raised millions for more than 70 candidates.

Even during the most hectic days, she balanced work with family. A stop in Arizona meant a visit with two of her five grandchildren in Phoenix. The same in Texas, where the other three live. She carries two cellphones, one for business and one for family members, who try not to call frivolously because, no matter what, she always answers.

The downside of that energy and organization is a tendency to micromanage, which sometimes stymies her staff and frustrates allies. She tinkers with stagecraft at news conferences, fussing over backdrops and the like.

She can be gracious and ruthless. She threw an ice cream social for Rep. Jane Harman when the Venice Democrat returned to Congress after a failed 1998 bid for governor. But more recently, Pelosi signaled she would pass over Harman for leadership of the House Intelligence Committee for allegedly being too conciliatory to Republicans.

Well known for harboring grudges, Pelosi makes no apologies. "I have a reptilian approach," she once said, describing how she determined which candidates were deserving of support. "You have to be very cold-blooded in how you allocate resources."

Tuesday's election bore out Pelosi's velvet-hammer approach. She whipped together Democrats and achieved a level of party unity that had not been seen in decades, all the while traveling virtually nonstop to raise record sums of money.

After lunch at the White House last week, Pelosi sat with Bush in the Oval Office for a brief media blitz. Cameras fired. The bitter rivals shook hands.

"There's a natural phenomenon to be pitted against the president," said Norman Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington think tank. "But the speakership of the House is not the presidency. She can't make decisions like the president. She leads a collective body. And the more it gets framed in personal terms, the more dangerous and difficult it's going to be."

Pelosi has to show she can unify the famously fractious Democrats in her charge, help lay the foundation for the party's 2008 presidential nominee, and give colleagues a record to tout when they fight to preserve their majority in the next election.

Only then, if she wins a second term as speaker, will Pelosi prove as successful in the House as she was in the home.

Speaker Clout Benefits District (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill secured down payments for Boston's Big Dig. Sam Rayburn sent gushers of cash back to Texas, along with tax breaks that helped its oil industry. Hospitals, schools and nonprofits in J. Dennis Hastert's hometown of Aurora, Ill., have seen millions roll in during his reign.

Now Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco is poised to follow them as speaker of the House -- a perch predecessors used to channel big cash to pet projects back home.

"There's a long tradition where, not only can you bring back your average pork as a member of Congress, but speaker pork gives you a lot of money, a lot of influence over the purse," said Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University.

Mrs. Pelosi, a Democrat, will be the first Californian to hold the post, and congressional watchdogs say they'll be observing her new spending clout with great interest.

There are "a lot of peeping chicks everywhere," said Tim Ransdell, executive director of the California Institute for Federal Policy Research in Washington.

Aides to Mrs. Pelosi don't dispute that the state will benefit from a changing of the guard at the Capitol.

"From the speaker's chair to committee chairs, Californians in Congress will have additional clout to help the home state," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Mrs. Pelosi. But less than a week after the election, Mrs. Pelosi has no specific wish list for her district, Miss Crider said.

DOJ_NMG_0092994

As she has moved up through the ranks of spending committees and the Democratic leadership, Mrs. Pelosi already has helped send millions of dollars home.

According to Citizens Against Government Waste, a federal spending watchdog, in the past two fiscal years Mrs. Pelosi has helped obtain:

•$6.7 million for the Presidio Dental Clinic.

•$2.1 million for the San Francisco Maritime National Historic Park.

•$388,000 to the Filipino Cultural Center in San Francisco for "rehabilitation."

Now, as she prepares to assume one of the most powerful posts in Congress, the pressure to funnel money to the San Francisco Bay Area is bound to increase, Mr. Ransdell said.

"The transportation crowd will want rebuilding of freeways or the Bay Bridge access, or else more money for a transit project here or there," he said. "The social-services community will want additional funding perhaps for a welfare program, or else maybe construction of additional low-income housing or homeless housing."

As she considers requests for hometown projects, Mrs. Pelosi has powerful partners: Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, also from the Bay Area.

With Democrats taking over the Senate, Mrs. Feinstein likely will assume leadership of an influential spending subcommittee. Mrs. Boxer will become chairwoman of a committee key on transportation projects and climate-change research.

In September, the House changed its rules to end secret pork-barrel projects. The resolution banned a practice in which lawmakers anonymously insert "earmarks" -- narrowly tailored spending that often helps a specific company or project in their district -- into bills.

The measure required lawmakers to identify the special projects they slip into legislation. Mrs. Pelosi voted against it. Miss Crider said Mrs. Pelosi wanted a more stringent package of rules, but that measure ultimately failed.

One of Mrs. Pelosi's first actions in January will be to try again to pass "a strong rules package" that would among other things renew and strengthen the ban on secret earmarks, Miss Crider said.

Bush's Bipartisan Experience In Texas May Not Translate (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush's rude awakening Wednesday morning to a newly elected Democratic-led Congress stirred up all kinds of nostalgia — and questionable impressions — about his days as Texas governor.

Bush told reporters he could easily manage the challenge of working with a majority in the other party; that after all, he did it in the 1990s with the state's Legislature.

"As governor of Texas, I had successfully worked with both Democrats and Republicans to find common-sense solutions to the problems facing our state," Bush said at his post-election news conference.

It was the prevailing White House line the day after Republicans lost the House and Senate. White House counselor Dan Bartlett did a round of morning news shows, saying the same thing.

"Well, he did talk about a record in Texas where he was able to work with Republicans and Democrats," Bartlett told CBS News.

One difference between the two eras: Bush did not spend six years bashing Democratic state lawmakers as bad for the state before taking over as governor. When he became president and was complemented by a Republican-controlled Congress, he often was on the attack against the opposing party for the next six years.

Also, some back in Texas are rolling their eyes at the White House's resurrected bit of myth-making, saying that the late Lt. Gov. Bob Bullock deserves the credit for forging bipartisan cooperation.

"Bullock didn't allow partisanship because he thought everyone should put the best interests of Texas first," said Claudia Stravato of Amarillo, a longtime aide to the legendary Texan.

DOJ_NMG_0092995

Noting that in Texas the lieutenant governor as chief of the Senate wields more power than the governor, Stravato said Bush and Bullock, a Democrat who died in 1999, got along in part because both were "Bubbas" of the old school.

"Bullock liked the kid, and was letting him take credit for stuff," she said. "And to get along with Bullock, everyone else had to do the same."

What Bush needs now, Stravato said, is a similar Democratic mentor to clear a path for him through Congress.

But it's not likely he will find one. Washington is a far more partisan atmosphere than Bush was used to back in Texas, and it's not in the interests of either party to work together. Both are already fixing their prospects for the 2008 presidential campaigns.

Even so, the motions are being observed. Bush invited Democratic congressional leaders to the White House and had lunch with presumptive House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California.

After the harsh partisan rhetoric of the campaign, Bartlett speculated about one likely item on the menu: "For the president," he said, "it's probably a little crow."

White House tries to explain about-faceAfter the abrupt resignation Wednesday of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the White House spent the rest of the week trying to explain away why Bush had insisted a week earlier that Rumsfeld was staying.

Bush first had said in an interview with wire service reporters that he wanted Rumsfeld to remain in place for the rest of his administration.

On Wednesday, he admitted that at the time, the decision for Rumsfeld to go essentially had been made already. But, he said, the choice of a replacement was not final.

"The reason why is I didn't want to inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign," Bush said at a news conference. "And so the only way to answer that question and to get you on to another question was to give you that answer."

In the same pre-election interview with wire service reporters, Bush also said he wanted Vice President Dick Cheney to stay on for the rest of his term.

Does this mean Cheney is definitely stepping down?

Evidently not.

Govern, Don't Gloat (NYT)

By Leon E. Panetta

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WE govern our democracy either by leadership or by crisis. Last Tuesday, the American people sent a clear message that they are sick and tired of government by crisis. They elected Democrats to the House and Senate not to prolong gridlock, but to govern.

There are those who believe that the best political strategy for 2008 is for the Democrats to continue to confront President Bush and seal his fate as a failed president. The danger, however, is that if the Democrats become nothing more than a party of obstruction, it will be only a matter of time before they too will lose the trust of the American people. The lesson of this election is that the public will no longer tolerate incompetence and gridlock, whether it comes from the Republicans or the Democrats.

Twelve years ago, President Clinton suffered a similar defeat when Republicans captured both houses of Congress. As chief of staff to the president at the time, I was asked to comment on the implications of that midterm election for the president and the future of the nation. My response was that the real question was whether a party that had been a minority in Congress was now prepared to work with the president to govern the nation.

Today it is fair to ask the same question of the Democrats.

In 1994, the Republicans decided they would directly challenge the president with their Contract With America. The result was the shutdown of the federal government. Badly damaged by the public outrage over such antics, Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich decided that Republicans had to work with the president if they were to survive. This led to a period of cooperation that produced, among other achievements, a balanced federal budget and welfare reform. The Republicans held their majority in 1996.

In the wake of this election, the Democrats and the president face the same choice: gridlock or cooperation?

DOJ_NMG_0092996

While both sides are speaking the words of reconciliation, nothing will really change until they can trust each other. After six years of partisan trench warfare, that will not be easy. It begins with a cease-fire on the rhetoric of cheap shots and ultimatums. Karl Rove and other political consultants need to take a long vacation. Both sides need to speak honestly with each other and be willing to compromise.

The legislative work can begin on areas where there is likely consensus: immigration reform, lobbying and ethics reform, and education with the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind.

If that works, Congress and the administration can move on to negotiate tougher issues like establishing long-term budget discipline, expanding energy alternatives, fixing the prescription drug benefit and increasing the minimum wage.

And, finally, on the war in Iraq, despite the bitter differences, both the Democrats and the president face the same brutal reality. We need a new strategy to stabilize Iraq so that our troops can begin to come home without leaving a disaster behind. The president took an important step by replacing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld with Robert Gates. The Iraq Study Group led by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, of which I am a member, will soon make its recommendations, which we hope will provide the beginning of a unified strategy.

Democracy needs the trust of the people. But that can only occur if our elected leaders can trust one another. That is not only good politics, it just happens to be good for the country.

Let The Investigations Begin (NYT)

By Stanley Brand

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

THE Democrats' victory has stoked the fire beneath an already brewing debate within the party regarding the need for investigations of the executive branch during the Bush administration's two remaining years. Some Democratic members of Congress are reluctant to pursue investigations into war profiteering, detainee interrogation or other controversial issues, fearing that such scrutiny of the administration will make Democrats appear petty and partisan and cost them electoral support in 2008.

A vigorous examination of the administration's conduct, however, is not only the appropriate action as a matter of constitutional prerogative, it is the politically necessary response to voters' overwhelming rejection of the current Congress's failure to assert itself in this area.

Nothing is better established in constitutional history and jurisprudence than Congress's power to investigate the executive. Centuries of precedents in Parliament, colonial legislatures and United States law endorse it. In 1742, William Pitt the Elder summarized the powers of Parliament: "We are called the grand inquest of the nation, and as such it is our duty to inquire into every step of public management, either at home or abroad, in order to see that nothing has been done amiss."

Indeed, the very first example of congressional oversight in our history was an inquiry into President George Washington's deployment of the military. In that case, a committee appointed by the House in 1792 was authorized to investigate the disastrous defeat the year before of Gen. Arthur St. Clair by Indians in the Ohio Territory, with the power to issue subpoenas for "persons, papers and records as may be necessary to assist their inquiries."

Congress is a coequal branch with explicit power to declare war, raise armies and navies and appropriate money for such activities. The Supreme Court has also repeatedly ratified Congressional authority to investigate executive departments. Congressional powers to probe "into departments of the federal government to expose corruption, inefficiency or waste," the court has stated, are "as penetrating and far reaching as the potential power to enact and appropriate under the Constitution."

For the past six years, Congress's oversight function has atrophied in a unitary Republican landscape. To be sure, investigative power should be exercised carefully, thoughtfully and with due regard for the rights of a coordinate branch. But Congress should not shrink from its duty to investigate a reluctant or recalcitrant executive, especially one that, while cloaking itself in secrecy, has boldly asserted unprecedented powers in the initiation and conduct of war — with disastrous consequences that the electorate has now repudiated.

By performing their constitutional obligations, the new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate will surely do right by the Constitution and the country. But they will also no doubt do very well for themselves.

Democrats Now Look To Sustain Majority (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0092997

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — It's the question Democrats would rather not ask in their moment of revelry: Are their new majorities in the House and Senate sustainable?

What if the war in Iraq is over by 2008? Or what if it is still being waged despite Democratic pledges to change the course? What if voter anti-pathy toward President Bush is irrelevant in two years? After all, he will be on his way out.

"Who knows whether these things are long-term trends or not," Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., said last week.

Voters gave Democrats control of Congress but did not undergo an ideological conversion. The Democrats' success had more to do with anger toward President Bush, weariness over the war and contempt for the corruption and scandal in Congress — a confluence of negatives that became a political force.

As some Democrats begin looking to 2008 and beyond, the challenge is how to turn anti-pathy toward Republicans into affection for Democrats.

"You can't count on that kind of a wave in every election by any means," Democratic pollster Mark Mellman said.

Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the chairman of the Senate Democratic campaign committee, acknowledged that the Democrats' 51-49 majority in the Senate was the result of the narrowest of victories in six race. "Had 10,000 votes flipped we would have four seats not six," he said.

Democrats do see opportunities ahead.

In 2008, there are 21 Republican Senate seats up for election and only 12 Democratic seats. Eight of the Republicans in those seats won their last election with 55% or less of the vote.

In the House, where Democrats held 230 seats and appeared to be in line to win two more, all 435 members face re-election in 2008.

"The good news for Democrats is that we don't need a wave to keep the seats we have," Mellman said.

Democrats came into power calling for a change in course in Iraq. They promised to clean up government, create better economic conditions for the middle class and ensure cheaper drugs for the elderly.

"People are open to a longer term Democratic majority," Schumer said, "but we have to seal the deal."

Schumer proposed a three-step plan for Democrats.

It would begin with modest plans to increase the minimum wage, provide more tax breaks on college tuition, encourage greater energy independence and require drug companies to negotiate for lower Medicare drug prices.

Democrats then must work in bipartisan fashion to confront the war in Iraq and government deficits, Schumer said.

"Thirdly, we have to try our best to come up with a full vision and platform that points toward '08," he said.

To some Democrats, the party's biggest task is maintaining credibility on national security.

Since the Vietnam War, Republicans have held an advantage with voters on defense and security issues. But the Iraq war soured many voters on Republicans. By early fall, polls showed the public trusted Democrats more on resolving Iraq and trusted them equally with Republicans in combating terrorism.

Susan Rice, a foreign policy expert who was a senior adviser to Democrat John Kerry's presidential campaign in 2004, said Democratic candidates improved in the polls when they directly challenged Bush's war policy with more pointed ads and public statements

"Somewhere along the line in the last few months, the Democrats got some spine and got the courage to say out loud what they had been saying behind closed doors, which is that the president's national security policy has been an utter failure, has made us less safe, and that Iraq is Exhibit A for that failure," she said after Tuesday's vote.

But Rice said the Democratic gains on national security "are very tenuous" and the party should proceed cautiously on Iraq.

She said Democrats "won an early scalp in the form of Donald Rumsfeld" that will help them claim an initial victory and keep them from taking positions that might hurt their standing on national security.

Some Republicans say the GOP did not simply lose ground on national security. Wes Anderson, a Republican strategist who consulted in some of the closest Senate races, said that before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, voters identified the GOP as the party of fiscal conservatism, middle-class economics, national security and ethical reform.

DOJ_NMG_0092998

"Our problem is our brand is broken," Anderson said. "Voters didn't walk away from the core principles of the brand. They just didn't think we represented them effectively."

A poll that Anderson's firm conducted in 12 of the most contested congressional races on Nov. 5-6, right before Election Day, showed the depth of voter anger. When voters were asked which party was "controlled by big corporations," 8% said Democrats, 51% said Republicans and 25% said both.

But the difficulties had been evident for weeks and the voters who were taking flight were independents. Indeed, exit poll surveys by the Associated Press and the networks found that 26% of voters who were with Bush in 2004 went for Democrats this election.

"In late September or early October we came to the rude conclusion that there was little we could do on the air or in the mail that would change people's minds," Anderson said.

While that could be good news for Democrats, Republicans take heart in the idea that voters still seem to adhere to conservative values.

"I don't think what you saw on Tuesday was a major political realignment," said Sen. John Thune, R-S.D. "A lot of people are saying Republicans stayed home. I think we really lost it among independents. The takeaway from it is you have to have a motivated base and you have to have a strategy to get to those independent voters."

How Rahm Emanuel Helped End An Era Of Republican Rule (CHIT)

By Naftali Bendavid

Chicago Tribune, November 12, 2006

Rahm Emanuel was seething.

He was hurtling down an asphalt road in upstate New York on the 47th trip of his ferocious campaign to win back the House. A lecture, even from his friend James Carville, was the last thing he needed.

In just 12 days, Emanuel's quest would end in a historic victory—a triumph that almost no one believed possible when he accepted the challenge nearly two years ago—or in colossal failure.

And here were Carville and pollster Stan Greenberg telling him he had to make each of his handpicked candidates shift from attack mode and strike a conciliatory note in their final campaign ads.

"James. No James, YOU LISTEN," Emanuel barked into a cell phone, about to release a string of profane invectives more intense than usual. "Can you listen for one [expletive] minute? I'm working these campaigns all the time. The campaigns all have different textures."

His wiry body tensed, his voice breaking with stress. Emanuel shouted, "If you don't like what you see, I highly recommend you pick up the … phone and do it yourself."

The moment captured Rahm in full, a portrait in power of a brutally effective taskmaster.

During the past year, the Tribune had exclusive access to the strategy sessions, private fundraisers and other moments that shaped this victory. The newspaper agreed not to print any of the details until after the election. Now that the votes have been counted, the story of how Emanuel helped end an era of Republican rule can be told.

He did it, in large measure, by remaking the Democratic Party in his own image.

Democrats had never raised enough money. Emanuel, a savvy fundraiser who shaped those skills under Richard M. Daley and Bill Clinton, yelled at colleagues and threatened his candidates into generating an unprecedented amount of campaign cash.

Democrats had a history of appeasing party constituencies. Emanuel tore up the old litmus tests on abortion and other issues. With techniques that would make a Big Ten football coach blush, he recruited candidates who could mount tough challenges in some of the reddest patches of America.

Democrats had blanched at hardball. Emanuel, jokingly called "Rahmbo" even by his mother, muscled weaker Democrats out of races in favor of stronger ones, and ridiculed the chairman of his own party.

DOJ_NMG_0092999

In January 2005, when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi asked Emanuel to head the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, or DCCC, experts predicted that the party would take perhaps three seats. On Tuesday, it picked up at least 28, changing the course of the Bush presidency.

In a world where congressmen refer to each other as "my distinguished colleague," Emanuel, 46, is sometimes unable to get through a single sentence without several obscenities. His politics are centrist, but his style is extremist. The top of his right middle finger was severed when he was a teenager, adding to his aura of toughness—especially when he extends that middle finger, which he does with some regularity.

For all his forcefulness, Emanuel was not responsible for the political climate, either the failing war or the sex and corruption scandals racking the Republican Party. But with creative recruiting, unremitting fundraising and a national message, he positioned the Democrats to exploit that collapse.

In doing so, Emanuel had to be familiar with roughly 50 individual races—the candidates, the interest groups, the voting blocs. It resembled a game of three-dimensional chess, in that what happened in one district could affect dozens of others.

From the outset, there could be only one measure of success: the number of seats the Democrats won. Bill Paxon, a former New York congressman who held Emanuel's job for the Republicans when they seized the House in 1994, explained the unforgiving math.

"Unlike a lot of things in government where there is compromise, there is only one result—you either win or you lose—and you are judged on that," Paxon said. "You can look at fundraising, candidate recruitment and other things, but they are meaningless. The only thing that matters is if you win or lose."

This is the story of how Rahm and the Democrats won.

KILLER INSTINCT

The Republicans always had killers on their side, ruthless closers like Karl Rove, Tom DeLay and Lee Atwater, the late mudslinging mastermind credited with getting the first President Bush elected.

In Emanuel, Democrats had their counterpart, a tactician of a caliber the party had not seen since the young Lyndon Johnson converted the DCCC into a power base.

Emanuel's thin, unimposing frame still hints at the teen and college years devoted to ballet; his voice sometimes screeches, and his words can get jumbled in public speeches.

But his political style—honed in Chicago and on the presidential campaign trail with Clinton—isn't gentle or uncertain. His reputation as a political street fighter inspires respect and more than a little fear.

Some Republicans coped by employing humor. Spotting Emanuel in the House gym last July, Rep. Christopher Shays of Connecticut told him he knew that he'd been targeted. Emanuel was planning to spend $3 million to defeat the popular moderate.

"I'll tell you what," Shays said. "Just give me the $3 million, and I'll retire voluntarily."

Emanuel's strategy was to keep the opposition uncomfortable. If a Republican congressman took a vote that he hoped no one in his district would notice, such as supporting a Bush budget cut, Emanuel immediately issued a press release and sent it to the Republican's hometown newspaper. He then sent it to the lawmaker's office to, as he said, "[mess] with their heads."

He had the DCCC designate one Republican as the "rubber stamp of the week" and another as the "crony of the week," a gimmick that generated a surprising amount of local coverage. Republicans who received money from drugmakers or oil companies were ridiculed as lackeys of special interests.

Last fall, a Democratic takeover of the House was laughable. Emanuel faced a merciless political map. Computer-assisted gerrymandering had made it possible for Republicans to draw congressional boundaries with increasing precision, ensuring a maximum number of GOP-leaning districts.

And yet Emanuel worried the GOP. "I think there is a lot of angst on our side," Rep. Tom Cole, an Oklahoma Republican, said late last year.

The popularity of the war in Iraq already was declining, and the president's poll numbers weren't good. If things got worse, GOP strategists sensed that Emanuel was someone who could take advantage of the opportunity. "If you are in a lead-pipe cinch Republican district, it's easier. But if you are in a marginal district, it's tough," Cole said. "The shark looks beautiful when you are outside the tank. But inside, it's a little different."

DOJ_NMG_0093000

One of Emanuel's top targets, Rep. E. Clay Shaw of Florida, was 67, had served in the House for a quarter-century and had no desire to end his career with an embarrassing loss. One day last summer, when Emanuel was walking from his office to the Capitol, he passed Shaw. He nodded, saying "Clay" by way of greeting. Shaw stared ahead icily and kept walking. "See how he didn't say hello?" Emanuel asked.

He knew he was despised. "Look, this is not for the fainthearted," Emanuel said. "Their job is important to them, and I am seen as a threat to their job security. And that's life. And I didn't come here to win a popularity contest with them."

He added, "I wake up some mornings hating me too."

None of Emanuel's relationships with Republicans was testier than the one with Rep. Tom Reynolds, the upstate New Yorker who was his Republican counterpart. A stocky 56-year-old, Reynolds sometimes flinched when Emanuel's name was mentioned. Reynolds tried to be sportsmanlike, even when Emanuel targeted him for defeat—breaking the usual gentlemen's deal not to go after whoever was running the other party's campaign.

"If this was a tennis game, I would say he's a good tennis player and he makes my game better," Reynolds said grudgingly late last year. "He's a good pol. He's from Chicago." Then Reynolds added that he was a good pol too, from New York.

INTENSE, EVEN IN TIGHTS

Central to Emanuel's ability to unnerve his political enemies is his fierce intensity, a quality that wasn't initially apparent as he grew up on the North Shore of Chicago. He played peacemaker between his older brother Ezekiel and his younger brother Ari, and he pirouetted around the house. "Ari would be wrestling, Zeke would be pondering deep thoughts, and Rahmmy would be leaping down the stairs and doing ballet dance twirls," his mother, Marsha, recalled.

Ari even got the top bunk bed when he and Rahm shared a room, even though Rahm was older and could have laid claim to it. "I was physically stronger," Ari Emanuel explained.

But when their parents sent Rahm to study ballet, his single-mindedness emerged. "Intense would be a word I would have used even then," said Kerry Hubata, his former ballet teacher. "I've seen kids with physical talent but didn't work as hard. Others, who weren't as gifted physically but had the desire and didn't mind the pain, succeeded more. He had the drive."

That drive only increased when Emanuel suffered an accident just before his 1977 graduation from New Trier West High School. Working at an Arby's, Emanuel badly cut the middle finger of his right hand. He insisted on going to prom festivities anyway, including a swim in Lake Michigan, and the finger became badly infected. Emanuel, his family recalled, lay near death in Children's Memorial Hospital with a fever of 106 degrees, as antibiotics were pumped into him. In the end, doctors removed half his finger.

"That was a big turning point in Rahm's life," said his mother, sitting in the kitchen of the Emanuels' modest two-story home in Wilmette. "It was touch-and-go, and finally when he came out of it he was more serious. … I honestly think that was his existential moment of near-death and realizing that you have to do something with life."

Emanuel was not the only brother with a drive to succeed. Ezekiel, the eldest, became an oncologist, joined the faculty at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute and Harvard University, and is now a prominent medical ethicist at the National Institutes of Health. Ari went to Hollywood and has become an enormously wealthy agent, not to mention the inspiration for the bombastic Ari Gold character on HBO's "Entourage." (Emanuel, too, partly inspired a TV character: Josh Lyman on "The West Wing.")

The accomplished brothers came from parents with strong personalities. Emanuel's father, Benjamin, worked for the Jewish underground in pre-state Israel—he was smashed on the head by a British officer's baton, which left a dent in his skull—and became a well-known pediatrician in Chicago. Emanuel's mother was a civil rights activist who sometimes did not come home at night because she had been arrested. The Emanuels also adopted a daughter, Shoshana, who had a difficult youth and has kept a low profile.

Ezekiel Emanuel attributes the congressman's drive to their father. "He was notorious for seeing twice as many patients as the next guy on this list," Ezekiel said. "He would be personable, but just 'Get to the meat of things and get it done.'

"That obviously is a trait that people can see in Rahm, and it's quite clear where it came from, in my opinion."

DOJ_NMG_0093001

Personable, however, is not a word many would use to describe Benjamin Emanuel's middle son. White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen once said of catcher A.J. Pierzynski: "If you play against him, you hate him. If you play with him, you hate him a little less." Though Emanuel has his die-hard loyalists, he could be the Democratic Party's A.J. Pierzynski.

PARTY CRASHER

On a late-spring day in 2006, Emanuel and Charles Schumer, the New Yorker in charge of winning the Senate for the Democrats, walked into the office of party Chairman Howard Dean.

Emanuel, once again, was ready for a fight.

For months, he and Schumer had been imploring the iconoclastic former presidential candidate to channel more money into congressional campaigns. Dean had been pushing a "50-state strategy" to build a Democratic operation in every part of the country.

The national party usually spent millions to help House candidates, but Dean was instead using the money to build this far-flung operation, to Emanuel's immense frustration. He felt Dean's strategy wasted money in unwinnable places.

According to Emanuel, the meeting devolved into a confrontation over resources. Emanuel said that the Republicans planned to heavily fund key races and that if Dean refused to do the same, it would amount to unilateral disarmament. Dean replied that he was fielding activists in every corner of every state.

Ridiculing the effort, Emanuel told Dean that he had seen no sign of it. "I know your field plan. It doesn't exist," he recalled saying. "I've gone around the country with these races. I've seen your people. There's no plan, Howard."

The tongue-lashing was another example of how Emanuel took a sledgehammer to intraparty niceties, making plenty of enemies along the way.

The gravitational center of Democratic antagonism toward Emanuel was the Congressional Black Caucus. Many of the caucus' 43 members complained that Emanuel had not hired enough African-American staffers. They also protested that when he harangued lawmakers to pay their DCCC dues, he did not recognize how hard it was for black politicians, many of whom represented poorer areas, to raise money. The protests often erupted into shouting matches. "If a person says, 'Danny Davis, where are your dues?' I may have a particular difficulty getting my dues that you don't know about or you don't relate to," Rep. Danny Davis, the West Side Democrat, said last summer. "Rahm don't take no prisoners."

Emanuel was privately contemptuous of such complaints. He saw the Black Caucus as one more party faction, like conservative Democrats, that would rather complain than work. Asked about the number of black staffers at the DCCC—two African-Americans were on his senior staff of about 10 people—he waved his hand dismissively. "You know that every [DCCC] chairman has faced the same criticism?" he said. "OK. So I don't give a [expletive]," he added, literally spitting.

Then he began ranting about his conservative party colleagues. "They hate me too, because I'm arrogant and pushy with them. … Because they've never, ever WORKED! NOBODY! NONE OF 'EM!"

Little enraged Emanuel as much as a fellow Democrat who didn't share his unrelenting drive to win. In January 2006, Rep. Alcee Hastings, a Florida Democrat, was quoted in a local newspaper speaking sympathetically of Republican Clay Shaw. Because of his longtime friendship with Shaw, Hastings pointedly declined to endorse Shaw's Democratic challenger.

Hastings was a colorful figure. A former federal judge, he was removed from the bench by Congress in 1989 for corruption and perjury, only the sixth U.S. judge in history to suffer this fate. He took revenge by winning a seat in Congress. A forceful speaker, Hastings chastised Emanuel in a closed meeting of House Democrats for not recruiting more candidates.

"He's great on lectures," Emanuel said later. "Phenomenal lecturer. I'm getting a lecture on recruitment when A, you haven't done a … damn thing, and B, we've got a [Republican] target and you're out there kissing his [behind] in the press?"

Hastings refused to back down, saying he was close to both Shaw and his Democratic rival, Ron Klein, and could not in good conscience take sides. "Ron Klein is my friend. I have known Clay Shaw for nearly 40 years," he said. "Far be it from me to insert myself in a race of that kind."

Hastings was hardly the only Democrat who Emanuel thought was not pulling his weight. Many of his colleagues were doing great work, he said, but dozens of others declined to help him take on their Republican friends.

DOJ_NMG_0093002

"You've got to have a thirst for winning," he said. "You know what our party thinks? 'We're good people with good ideas. That's just enough, isn't it?' Being tough enough, mean enough and vicious enough is just not what they want. … They just want to be patted on the back for the noble effort. No."

This no-holds-barred politics came naturally to Emanuel. In the 1980s he joined the campaigns of Sen. Paul Simon and Mayor Daley, proving adept at raising money. (Daley would later return the favor by fielding city patronage workers to help Emanuel win his first congressional election in 2002; that get-out-the-vote operation is now part of a federal investigation.)

Political consultant David Axelrod remembers Emanuel as a young Chicago political operative. "The first word that comes to mind is chutzpah," Axelrod said. "He redefined the term."

Emanuel brought that chutzpah to Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton's improbable presidential run. "He was then a little more brash and less polished than now, but he clearly had loads of ability and drive," the former president recalled in an e-mailed response to questions. "My first impression was, 'This guy is going to help us win.' And he did. I doubt we could have done it without him, especially in those critical early months."

When Clinton did win, Emanuel became his White House political director. But this time, his confrontational style failed him, as he clashed with other staffers and was quickly demoted to "director of special projects." The humiliation tempered his sharpest edges.

"He was devastated by what happened," said his mother, Marsha. "He told us that he had to sit back and rethink his methodology. And like with the finger, he took a deep breath and saw what direction he should go in."

Something of the relationship between the undisciplined president and his hard-hitting aide can be gleaned from an inscription on a photo Clinton gave Emanuel on his 38th birthday. Clinton signed it as though he were Emanuel: "Now Mr. President, how many times do I have to tell you, say it this way?" Clinton wrote. "And, by the way, wish me a happy birthday. Always gently, Rahm 11/29/97."

Emanuel's passion and loyalty won him the allegiance of others as well. Stan Greenberg's daughter Anna, a friend of Emanuel's as well as his pollster, asked him to officiate at her wedding earlier this year. Emanuel studied hard, read sacred texts and consulted a rabbi.

He could not resist cracking a few political jokes at the ceremony. But the wedding highlighted Emanuel's attachment to Judaism. "It's not as much about going to synagogue," Greenberg said. "But having ritual and tradition and teaching Jewish values are really, really important to him."

It was a side of Emanuel not seen by many people, including many of his fellow Democratic congressmen.

On a warm night last May, Emanuel summoned them to a colorless conference room at Democratic headquarters. He had walked a fine line for a year and a half, hoping to excite Democrats without unduly raising expectations. But now he felt the time had come to convince them that they could actually win.

As several dozen House members settled into hard chairs, Emanuel cited polls suggesting that voters were ready for change. He also showed a video that included a quote from Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio confessing, "These numbers are scary." Images of Tom DeLay and other Republicans felled by scandal flashed on the screen to the pumping rhythm of the Queen song "Another One Bites the Dust."

Demoralized by defeat, many Democrats had begun to think that they would lose no matter how favorable the political winds. Al Gore and John Kerry appeared to have the momentum in their races, only to suffer crushing losses. The GOP had more money, armies of social conservatives and an entire region of the country, the South, almost uniformly in its camp.

But with his mastery of details, Emanuel gradually convinced even his most jaded colleagues that the Democrats could reach more than the 15-seat net gain they needed to seize the House for the first time since 1992.

Emanuel was constantly on the phone to candidates—coaching, reassuring, tormenting. In an August call to candidate Joe Sestak of Pennsylvania, Emanuel promised that Bill Clinton would help him raise money. "Joe Sestak, this is your rabbi, Rahm," he intoned playfully. "Clinton. I'm close to having him do an event for you in Philly. … Clinton will put his arm around you and say, 'He's my man.'"

In a fairly typical sign-off, he concluded another call to Sestak: "Don't [mess] it up or … I'll kill you. All right, I love you. Bye."

DOJ_NMG_0093003

He warned another Pennsylvania hopeful, Chris Carney, about negative ads the GOP was about to unleash. "They're going to come after you," Emanuel said. "You haven't said anything stupid on the hustings, have you?

"Well, don't waste your time with me. Go raise some more money."

A MACHO MAKEOVER

All of Emanuel's scolding and cajoling would have meant nothing if he fielded weak candidates. After yet another devastating loss in 2004, he and other Democratic leaders quickly determined that the party needed a machismo implant. Emanuel looked for candidates with strong backgrounds, from sheriffs to soldiers, to counteract a Democratic image of softness.

This is why he badly wanted Heath Shuler, a former football star, to run for Congress as a Democrat in North Carolina. An evangelical Christian who opposes abortion, Shuler couldn't easily have his views caricatured by the GOP.

But Shuler was worried that if he ran and won, he would never see his two young children. To prove that congressmen do spend time with their children, Emanuel started calling Shuler in early 2005 whenever he was with his own family.

Shuler would pick up the phone and hear, "It's Rahm. I'm at a soccer game with my kids. Just wanted you to know that." Or "It's Rahm. I'm at a kindergarten play now. Talk to you soon." Shuler received perhaps 10 such calls. Of course, this also illustrated that whenever Emanuel was with his family, he was working.

In any case, Shuler agreed to jump in the race, challenging a 16-year incumbent and becoming one of the Democrats' hottest candidates. "I was recruited from high school to play college football, I was recruited by almost every college in the country, and then I was recruited into the NFL," said Shuler, a former Washington Redskins quarterback.

"I know all the angles that people use to recruit you," he added. "Nobody does it as well as Rahm Emanuel."

Emanuel believed in being tough. In September 2005, he described a Vietnam veteran he was trying to recruit this way: "I don't know if he's going to win, but I'll tell you this: I don't want to cross [him]. I think he would take out a knife and kill you. I think he would kill you." Emanuel viewed this as an asset.

His goal was to recruit 50 credible challengers. He had one criterion: people who could win. That may sound obvious, but it's not. Many Democrats did not believe in recruiting overly conservative candidates, no matter how promising. In the past, those like Shuler who opposed abortion were not welcome in the party.

"We don't have an ideological purity test," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen of Maryland, Emanuel's top lieutenant for recruiting. "If you believe in the basic gut principles of the Democratic Party—opportunity, fairness for all—we're not going to hold people to a litmus test."

Emanuel's recruiting effort had its share of failures; his top two candidates to challenge Rep. Richard Pombo, a vulnerable California Republican, turned him down, and his third candidate lost in the primary. (Pombo lost anyway, reflecting the magnitude of the Democratic victory.) Republicans mocked many of his recruits as "B-list."

But in the election's aftermath, it is clear that Democrats won several races, including Shuler's, that they would have lost if not for Emanuel's tireless recruiting. He had put enough legitimate challengers in place to exploit the unexpected opportunity.

Eclipsed by the election night euphoria was the fact that one of Emanuel's few disappointments came in his own back yard. Tammy Duckworth, a captain in the Illinois Army National Guard, lost to state Sen. Peter Roskam despite being one of the Democrats' highest-profile candidates.

Initially recruited by Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), Duckworth was the only wounded Iraq war veteran running for Congress. And she proved an irresistible news story, as Emanuel knew she would: A brave woman volunteers to serve in Iraq, loses both legs in combat and returns to seek office.

Her candidacy also showed Emanuel's sometimes-callous pragmatism. When Duckworth entered the race, another Democrat, Christine Cegelis, was already running for the same seat. Cegelis had run two years earlier, done surprisingly well and built a loyal following. But Emanuel and Durbin did not believe she was working hard enough or raising sufficient money, and they settled on Duckworth as better-suited to the centrist district.

Between the appeal of her story and the power of her patrons, Duckworth won the backing of nearly every influential institution in Illinois. The state AFL-CIO announced its support for Duckworth — even though Cegelis, not Duckworth, was a former union member.

DOJ_NMG_0093004

Emanuel used his connections to get Duckworth an appearance on the Sunday talk show hosted by George Stephanopoulos, his friend and former colleague in the Clinton White House. Another Emanuel ally, Axelrod, became Duckworth's media consultant. Cegelis could not compete with this, losing 44 percent to 40 percent to Duckworth in the March primary, with a third candidate getting the rest.

In the general election campaign, Roskam cast Duckworth as a puppet of Emanuel. "My opponent, in her name-calling, has called me a rubber stamp," Roskam said during one debate. "But I challenge my opponent to come up with one issue on which she differs from Congressman Rahm Emanuel."

Days before the election, Roskam's campaign gave Emanuel and the Duckworth camp a little of their own business. Just as organized labor had supported her in the primary even though Cegelis was the former card-carrying union member, the VFW endorsed Roskam even though Duckworth was the wounded war veteran.

Ultimately the district was too Republican, and Duckworth was too green, to pull off a win.

'DIG DEEP DOWN'

Emanuel walked into the offices of Prince, Lobel, Glovsky & Tye, a top Boston law firm, early one morning last August. The mission: extract as much money as possible from the 20 lawyers chewing bagels around a 30-foot conference table.

"I've been in politics for 20 years. This is the first time I've seen the stars aligned like this," Emanuel told them. "People know the party in power has messed things up."

Despite his phrasemaking, Emanuel was not a great speaker; he could lapse into a confusing shorthand on politics or legislation. But his message on this day was clear. He held up a $12,000 check he had just written to New Hampshire Democratic candidate Jim Craig. "I'm in for 12, folks," Emanuel said. "I want you to dig deep down. … For the first time, this is within our grasp."

Several listeners pulled out checkbooks on the spot, and the event raised $20,000. Someone asked Emanuel how he planned to spend the money he was raising nationally. He would not distribute funds based on which candidates he liked, he said, nor on who were the most loyal Democrats.

"I'm cutthroat about this," he said. "I don't give a crap where I pick up seats. I plan on winning. There is no emotional attachment."

Emanuel had arrived at the DCCC with a reputation as a world-class fundraiser. As finance director for Bill Clinton's first presidential run, Emanuel jumped on a table to exhort his staff to work harder. He yelled at donors, refusing to accept checks he considered too small. He probably saved Clinton's candidacy by keeping the cash flowing even after embarrassing reports of Clinton's affair with Gennifer Flowers.

Democrats always trail Republicans in fundraising, but in his fight for the House, Emanuel was determined to keep the money race close. No matter how good candidates were, it meant little if they did not have cash to advertise and pay campaign workers. Emanuel's first goal, as he traveled the country asking for money, was to raise $95 million. But as the Democrats gained momentum, contributions surged and Emanuel raised his target to $105 million. By the campaign's end, the Democrats had brought in close to $120 million, easily surpassing all previous records.

Emanuel and his staff judged a candidate almost entirely by how much money he or she brought in. If the candidate proved a good fundraiser, the DCCC would provide support, advertising and strategic advice. If not, the committee would shut him or her out.

Emanuel's demands were specific. Democratic challengers, for instance, had to raise $320,000 by March 31. At a staff meeting a year ago, talk turned to a Pennsylvania Democrat named Andy Warren who had raised a meager $38,662 in the previous three months.

Emanuel ordered the staff to drop Warren and back his Democratic opponent. "Eliminate him," Emanuel said curtly.

As for other candidates who had not met their goals, Emanuel said, "We'll just take three hours tomorrow, and I'll call the idiots who need to be pushed."

THE FINAL SPRINT

The story of the 2006 campaign was ultimately that of an overreaching Republican coalition that imploded over sex and corruption scandals as well as Iraq's descent into chaos. With astounding speed, Republicans found themselves out of sync with the voters, falling from grace in nearly unprecedented fashion. Emanuel did not know that would happen any more than anyone else did. His goal at the outset had been simply to win more seats than expected.

DOJ_NMG_0093005

The effort exacted a toll on Emanuel, a father of two girls and a boy. After he voted for himself in the Illinois Democratic primary in March, his 8-year-old daughter Ilana had said she hoped he would lose so he would not travel so much. She could imitate Emanuel's conversations with people such as Schumer, New York's senior senator.

"Chuck," she would say. A pause, and then, louder, "CHUCK!" Emanuel's son, Zach, 9, stopped talking to him when he called from the road. When Emanuel was home, Zach implored him to stop talking on his cell phone while they were tossing a football.

Emanuel called his wife, Amy Rule, several times a day from the road. They had met on a blind date in 1990 and married four years later. An MBA from Wharton, Rule worked at the Art Institute of Chicago but is now a stay-at-home mom, raising their children on the North Side.

In the car after an August fundraiser in Boston, Emanuel told her that he hadn't slept much the night before, kept awake by all the details of the campaign.

"How are the kids?" he asked.

After listening to her response, he said wistfully, "I'm so sorry I'm missing two little girls in the bathtub. Sounds peaceful."

His hair turned whiter during the campaign and he lost 14 pounds, his clothes hanging on a scarecrow frame. As Election Day neared, he awoke every morning at 3, agitating and strategizing. By day's end, his fingers would be trembling and his nose running from fatigue.

Most stressful for Emanuel was his lack of control over certain decisions. Campaign finance laws required him to create an "independent expenditures" group to oversee the vast majority of Democratic TV ads. Its independence was limited because it was run by John Lapp, who had spent much of the campaign as Emanuel's top aide. But Emanuel had to dump half the $120 million he had raised into the group's coffers, with no say over how it was spent.

As the campaign drew to a close, Lapp and his deputy, Ali Wade, were signing off on dozens of advertisements each day in an office across the street from the DCCC. The office was filled with chaotic activity—phones ringing, staffers charging in, ads playing on computers. A board on the wall listed districts where the DCCC was airing TV spots. One day in October, another call from James Carville prompted Wade to say in exasperation: "Can we change our number so he doesn't keep calling?"

This was a fast-moving game, especially for Emanuel. He took his 48th and final campaign trip to Las Vegas five days before the election. This visit to Nevada candidate Tessa Hafen was symbolic of how the landscape had shifted; just weeks earlier, her cause was thought to be hopeless, but now she had a chance, albeit a slim one.

Emanuel careened between overwhelming anxiety and giddiness. At a fundraiser for Hafen that night, Emanuel seemed tense. But by the next morning, preparing for his final news conference, he was in an expansive, almost joyful, mood as he gulped two cups of black coffee in the lobby of Las Vegas' monstrous Mandalay Bay hotel and casino.

"We have a seat in New Hampshire we are going to … steal," he chortled.

And in a final spurt of generosity, Emanuel ordered a gift sent to all the Democratic candidates he had been coaching for nearly two years. Back in early 2005, when he was recruiting candidates, Emanuel sent cheesecakes to particularly desirable prospects. So on the eve of the election, 70 cakes went out from Eli's Cheesecake in Chicago to Democratic challengers from Nevada to Connecticut.

BIG NIGHT

A large erasable board, divided into some 80 squares for various House districts, dominated one wall in the DCCC offices on election night. Interns rushed to update results, prompting cheers or moans from the assembled staffers.

When a winner was declared in a race, the interns outlined the square in red marker. As the number of red squares grew, the magnitude of the Democratic gains became clear and an unfamiliar mood of jubilation overtook the staffers.

For Emanuel—ensconced in an office with friends and family—the board represented the culmination of two years' work. Every number reported the fate of a candidate he had helped recruit, cultivate and had come to know.

Televisions were scattered throughout the DCCC offices and common areas. At 11:08, CNN's Wolf Blitzer intoned, "We can now project that the Democrats will be in the majority in the House of Representatives."

DOJ_NMG_0093006

Emanuel seemed momentarily dazed, hugging his brother Zeke and kissing Amy. Six minutes later, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, looking jittery and happy, walked from the room where she had been watching the returns into Emanuel's office.

He roared, "Fellas—Madame speaker!" Pelosi and Emanuel hugged, rocking gently together for a few seconds. Brian Wolff, a staffer who worked for both Emanuel and Pelosi, called out, "Mission accomplished!"

At that moment, Sen. Barack Obama, who had campaigned relentlessly for House candidates, called to offer congratulations. "Barack," Pelosi said. "Thank you, thank you, thank you for all that you did." She walked back to her office muttering, "I gotta call my brother."

As Pelosi made her way through the DCCC staffers, some applauded, then more joined in and everyone rose in a whooping standing ovation. "This is so much better than losing," a staffer said to no one in particular.

Emanuel walked out of his office into the ecstatic throng and hopped on a desk.

In a few minutes, in front of the cameras, he would strike a conciliatory note about his opponents, and in the days that followed he would stress how both parties needed to work together for what was best for the country.

But at that moment, Emanuel would not, could not censor his glee, or restrain his distaste for the defeated Republicans.

For weeks they had been boasting that their program for turning out voters in the campaign's final 72 hours would swamp all his work. The voters had made those statements look ridiculous.

"I'll tell you this," Emanuel shouted out to his staff. "The Republicans may have the 72-hour program. But they have not seen the 22-month program!

"Since my kids are gone, I can say it: They can go ---- themselves!"

Maybe You Did Vote Your Pocketbook (NYT)

By Daniel Altman

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SOMEWHERE, deep in the consciousness of American voters, is the idea that the representatives they send to Washington can affect their economic well-being. Candidates surely share this conviction. Otherwise, why would they bother to make promises about jobs, incomes and taxes?

It follows that if those representatives fail to bring economic benefits, they risk losing their own jobs. So politics affects economics, and vice versa — at least that's the widely held theory. But what was the reality in last week's election?

To paraphrase a Clinton-era mantra, it really might have been the economy, stupid. More than 80 percent of voters in an exit poll, conducted for The Associated Press and television networks by Edison Media Research/Mitofsky International, said the economy was a very important or extremely important issue. That percentage was the highest for any issue, including Iraq and terrorism.

Furthermore, electoral data and government economic statistics suggest that the economy played a role in the outcome: if your state wasn't among the best economic performers in the last six years, judged by the growth of personal income, it appears that you were three times as likely to vote to throw the bums out.

That's the conclusion from an early look at the figures, and it may even be true. But the actual relationships between politics and economics are hard to pin down empirically, and some experts may even theorize that they don't exist.

Plenty of economists would argue, for example, that your local representative doesn't really have much control over your economic well-being. In the long run, the nation's capacity to produce is controlled by factors like educational attainment and the development of new technologies — factors that are difficult to change in a short period.

Moreover, your representative can't do much, as an individual, to sway the world economy. The amount of your state's exports demanded by Europe, Japan and other economic giants relies on millions of other dynamics, even though your representative may take the occasional rainmaking trip abroad.

Then there is pork-barreling. As a member of the ruling party in Congress — the Republicans, in recent times — your representative might have been able to funnel federal construction money your way, or perhaps to add a few pet projects in your district to assorted spending bills. In addition, your representative might have contributed to writing big legislation, like tax cuts, so that it favored people like you.

DOJ_NMG_0093007

Yet something like pork-barreling could have a measurable economic impact at the local level, even if its effects are dwarfed by those of globalization. And the data suggest that voting for Republicans in 2000 did help some states economically. In general, personal income rose faster from the end of 2000 through the second quarter this year in states that elected a higher share of Republicans to their House delegations. On average, states that elected no Republicans to the House could have expected nine percentage points less growth in personal income than states that elected all Republicans. The average state's income grew by 29 percent, so an additional nine points wouldn't have been anything to sneeze at. During that same six-year period, the states' economic experiences were hardly uniform. In rural states like Wyoming and South Dakota, for example, personal income rose by well over a third. In other states, like Michigan and Ohio, it grew less than a fifth. So there is a logical next question: Did voters hold their agenda-setting Republican representatives responsible for poor performance by voting them out?

It's easier to answer this question if you leave out the six states that didn't elect any Republicans in 2000; after all, they didn't have any to throw out. If you also remove New Hampshire and South Dakota, where the percentage of Republicans elected dropped to 0 from 100 — each state only has one seat in the House — a pattern starts to appear.

It suggests that differences in economic performance could have had a big political impact, even though the overall changes to the delegations were small. In the 10 states where personal income grew the most, the Republican share of the states' House delegations dropped only 2 percent, on average. In the other 32 states, the Republican share fell an average of 7 percent.

None of this proves a correlation between economics and politics, or, for that matter, any causality. To be sure of any of these statistical relationships, you would have to adjust for anything else that might have affected the economy differentially across states from 2000 to 2006: things as diverse as changes in tax policy or demographic shifts. Then you could tell whether the correlations were robust. And it's by no means certain that they would be: looking at unemployment rates instead of personal income, it's tough to pick out any patterns in the raw data.

Still, both parties have a clear incentive to learn whether these relationships exist. Winners who figure out why they won stand a better chance of winning again; losers who know why they lost won't repeat the same mistakes.

Statistics or no, the Democrats already seem to be convinced. They have promised a raft of economic legislation during their first weeks in power, proposing to raise the minimum wage to $7.25, to cut the interest rate on student loans in half and to require any new spending to be paid for by cuts to other spending or new tax revenue.

Without a Democratic president, of course, it will be much harder to turn these bills into law. For that reason, voters might not hold the Democrats responsible for economic performance the way they apparently did with the Republicans. Then again, if personal income doesn't rise, they might blame the Democrats — and the statistics might just tell the tale.

How The Hammer Fell On His Own Party (HC)

By Bennett Roth, Michael Hedges

Houston Chronicle, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - The legacy of the once powerful Republican Tom DeLay of Sugar Land cast a long shadow over last week's elections, in which voters shrank the ranks of a party accused of being too partisan, too cozy with special interests and too fond of big spending.

As majority whip and later majority leader of the House, DeLay helped build a Republican political empire that he tried to make immune from erosion by pushing the 2003 Texas redistricting plan that threw several veteran House Democrats out of office.

For years the former pest exterminator ruled with an iron hand that brought his party legislative victories but also intensified the poisonous partisan mood in Washington.

DeLay's combative style indeed was one of the factors in turning the electorate away from the GOP, said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University.

DOJ_NMG_0093008

"I don't think Tom DeLay as an individual was in the minds of many voters. But the election was very much a reaction to the kind of bare-knuckles politics he practiced," Baker said. "People thought this extreme, destructive partisanship had gone on long enough."

Conservatives, independent political observers and officials from both parties also said last week that the close ties between lobbyists and lawmakers that DeLay nurtured, and which led to the political scandal involving convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, cost Republicans some seats as Democrats took over the majority in the House and Senate.

Party principles

The decision by DeLay and others in the GOP leadership to boost federal funds for programs, thereby helping lawmakers get re-elected by benefiting many of their constituents, alienated fiscal conservatives. They felt the party had betrayed its principles of smaller government.

"When Tom and his bunch first ran, they campaigned against the cesspool in Washington. After a while they looked around and said, 'Hey, this isn't a cesspool, it's a hot tub,' " said seasoned conservative activist Richard Viguerie. (As a state lawmaker, DeLay was nicknamed "hot tub Tom" because of his penchant for enjoying the good life).

A CNN poll conducted Tuesday found that 42 percent of voters nationwide said that ethics was an extremely important factor in their vote.

DeLay did not return calls for comment for this article. In television appearances after the election last week, DeLay conceded that corruption had been an issue but dismissed the idea that voters had just rejected the type of government he advocated.

"I think the corruption issue was really important in about nine or ten different seats," he said on CNN. "Those of us and those Americans that want to win the war on terror, want fundamental tax reform, want to stop the culture of death, want to stop judicial activism, we're going to have to wait now until '08.

"This country is still right of center," he said. "There are more conservatives in this country than liberals."

But Viguerie said DeLay was a symbol of the GOP abandoning its core principles, leaving some conservatives sitting out last week's election.

DeLay's leading role in lining up Republican votes for Bush's Medicare prescription-drug plan, a major new entitlement program, was a prime example of his betraying conservatives, Viguerie said.

District goes to Dems

Adding irony to injury, DeLay's Houston-area 22nd Congressional District seat was won Tuesday by a Democrat, Nick Lampson, who was turned out of office two years ago essentially because of the new DeLay-inspired election map that made more Texas districts lean Republican.

A major factor in Lampson's victory was that DeLay won the Republican primary this year, then quit Congress and declined to run in last week's general election, leaving the Republican Party unsuccessfully going to court to get a replacement candidate on the ballot. GOP write-in candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs' spirited campaign to become the first write-in contender in Texas history to win a congressional seat fell short.

Marshall Wittmann, a former Republican who works for the Democratic Leadership Council, a centrist Democratic group, said the election served as a referendum on DeLay's methods as a congressional leader.

"It was complete rejection of DeLay, from cronyism to corruption to ideological polarization," Wittmann said.

DeLay resigned last spring in part because of his indictment by a Texas grand jury on charges of violating state election law on campaign financing.

Even the Wall Street Journal's conservative editorial page said Friday that DeLay had undercut the 1994 Republican revolution spearheaded by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, whose stated goals were to make "government smaller and smarter."

"Somehow, over the years, that conviction was replaced by Tom DeLay and the quest for permanent incumbency," the editorial stated.

Ties to lobbyists

DOJ_NMG_0093009

Viguerie criticized the so-called K Street Project, in which DeLay demanded Washington's big-business lobbyists, who have offices along that street, hire GOP staffers and contribute to Republican candidates in return for access to Congress.

"DeLay tied the Republican Party to the interests of corporate lobbyists," Viguerie said. "He changed the concept of small-government conservativism. He turned the focus from the interests of small businesses to big business."

DeLay, who has never been charged with wrongdoing over Abramoff, accompanied the lobbyist on several trips, including an expensive golf outing to Scotland.

Two former aides, Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon, were convicted for their roles in helping Abramoff, who lavished gifts and trips on lawmakers in return for legislative favors.

The federal probe of Abramoff's activities resulted in the conviction of GOP Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, whose seat was won by a Democrat. Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana, who had received major contributions from Abramoff and his clients, also lost his election. He was defeated by Democrat Jon Tester, who made ethics an issue in the campaign.

New strategy

In dissecting reasons for his party's losses, Ken Mehlman, outgoing Republican National Committee chairman, pointed to Congress' failure to adopt tougher rules on ethics and earmarks, the funding for special projects often inserted into spending bills by lawmakers at the behest of lobbyists.

"I think reform ought to be a big focus. Obviously you need to raise money to win in politics, but you should never, in exchange for raising money, change your principles or your policies," Mehlman said.

G.O.P. Collapse In Indiana Emblematic Of Larger Loss (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

EVANSVILLE, Ind., Nov. 10 — As he campaigned for re-election, the Republican who lost his seat in the House of Representatives here on Tuesday threw several incendiary barbs suggesting that the opposition was beyond the mainstream of these placid southern Indiana environs: “Homosexual agenda”; “San Francisco liberal Nancy Pelosi”; “New York liberal Charlie Rangel”; “Detroit liberal John Conyers.”

The attack backfired, and the Republican incumbent, John Hostettler, lost, as did two other incumbent Indiana Republicans in what proved to be a crucial state for Democrats in winning the House.

The mechanics of those defeats offer insights into the larger loss, and point to traps that Republican candidates appeared to have unwittingly entered: In all three cases, to demonstrate being a Washington insider was to court doom, no matter how much the incumbents railed against the ways of the capital.

Nowhere was that dynamic more striking than in Evansville, an old industrial city on the Ohio River, with its stolid manufacturing plants at the edges and its seasoned red-brick neighborhoods downtown. Mr. Hostettler had fashioned a determinedly unconventional image for himself over 12 years, from his contrarian vote against the Iraq war to his claim that abortion and breast cancer were linked.

Mr. Hostettler was a principled “citizen legislator,” a “Mr. Smith,” his press secretary said, and when it came time to run for re-election in a district that President Bush won by 24 points in 2004, the congressman tried associating his Democrat opponent with the worst of Washington’s taint, at least in conservative eyes.

“Eighth District voters are concerned about the homosexual agenda,” Mr. Hostettler was quoted as saying. Ms. Pelosi was certain to “put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda,” a Hostettler radio advertisement said.

The flaw in that strategy was that Nancy Pelosi was hardly the household name on the banks of the Ohio that she was on the banks of the Potomac. Mr. Hostettler knew who she was, of course, but in Evansville and the little towns stretching up to Indianapolis, that was less of a sure bet, said Brad Ellsworth, the Democrat who beat Mr. Hostettler.

“The question I get the most is, ‘Who is Nancy Pelosi?’ ” Mr. Ellsworth said. “People to this day don’t know who Pelosi is.”

In any case, he said, attacks on Ms. Pelosi “offended a lot of women in this area.”

DOJ_NMG_0093010

In the end, Mr. Hostettler ended up tarring only himself by demonstrating his superior knowledge of and close association with Washington. Mr. Ellsworth, by contrast, came across as the ultimate outsider: he appeared to struggle to remember whom he voted for in the 2004 presidential election, or whether he voted at all.

Mr. Ellsworth, 48, the easygoing sheriff of Vanderburgh County, was also nearly as conservative as his Republican opponent. He said he became a Democrat only because Republicans on the County Council voted against paying for bulletproof vests for sheriff's deputies in the early 1980s.

A similar chain of events unfolded elsewhere in Indiana.

East along the Ohio in the neighboring Ninth District, supporters of Representative Mike Sodrel, the freshman Republican who lost his race for re-election, routinely described him as a nonpolitician inured to Washington's ways.

"For most of us, we don't look at Mike as a politician, we look at him as a patriot," said Jan Whittenberg, the outreach director at Graceland Baptist Church in New Albany.

Yet the wealthy but down-home Mr. Sodrel, a self-made trucking magnate, was among the most assiduous of all House candidates in enlisting campaign support from Republican power brokers. President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Laura Bush and various cabinet members made repeated visits to Indiana on Mr. Sodrel's behalf — "essentially the entire Republican establishment," said Abby Curran, the campaign manager for the Democratic candidate, Baron Hill.

Mr. Sodrel's campaign came out with the usual Republican talking points, jabbing at Mr. Hill on gay rights, flag-burning and "Hoosier values." A billboard on Interstate 65 in southern Indiana proclaimed Mr. Hill's support for abortion, though Mr. Sodrel's campaign said it was paid for by a third-party group.

But as in the other race, Mr. Sodrel found it virtually impossible to outflank his conservative Democrat. Outside Graceland Baptist two days before the election, Stephen Baldwin, a Sodrel supporter, said of his candidate: "He's a member. He's no politician."

Yet the message conveyed by the cavalcade of Republican stars through southeastern Indiana was exactly the opposite.

"I think there was a perception out there, Who's going to be the Washington insider?" Mr. Hill said. "He created an impression that he was going to be beholden to all these people."

In the Second Congressional District, which contains northern industrial precincts, Representative Chris Chocola, a two-term Republican, saw his re-election bid fail under similar tactics. Mr. Bush made the district his first stop in a House race this election season, in February, and candidate and president formed a tight bond from the start.

"Chocola followed the Rovean line early on, to stick as close as possible to Bush," said Peri E. Arnold, a political science professor at Notre Dame, which is in the Second District, in a reference to Mr. Bush's adviser Karl Rove. "There was no effort to separate himself from Bush, and in this district he paid a significant price for that."

Katie Nee, the campaign manager for the winning Democrat, Joe Donnelly, put it this way: "There was just a general feeling that Washington was not working for the people in this district."

Days after the election, Republican operatives here continued to express bitterness and bewilderment at Tuesday's outcomes, insisting that the best men — the experienced ones — had not won. Yet of Indiana's three Democratic winners, the candidate with easily the biggest margin, Mr. Ellsworth, had the weakest ties to politics. Both of the other Democrats had run for elected office before (Mr. Hill, in fact, had served two terms in the House before he was defeated in 2004 by Mr. Sodrel).

But Mr. Ellsworth was such a novice that when Steny H. Hoyer, the House minority whip, called to recruit him to run, Mr. Ellsworth said he called Washington back and asked to speak with "Congressman Steny."

Though national Democrats may have nudged Mr. Ellsworth into running, he insisted on a grass-roots, on-the-ground campaign up and down the district. "That's the only way I knew how to run this thing," he said. "Get out and meet people."

His new constituents took note. Rick Wahl, a technician for Terminix pest control, finishing up a job at the First Avenue Diner here, did not vote for the incumbent and expressed gratitude at his demise.

"We're the people who do the electing," Mr. Wahl said. "He's a servant of the people. And he seems to have forgotten who the people are."

Rove Remains Steadfast In The Face Of Criticism (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0093011

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

For a man still climbing out of the rubble, Karl Rove seemed in his usual unflappable mood. He roamed around his windowless West Wing office decorated with four Abraham Lincoln portraits, joking with his staff, stuffing copies of "The Iliad" and "The Odyssey" into his bag and signing the last paperwork of the day.

The Architect, as President Bush once called him, has a theory for why the building fell down. "Get me the one-pager!" he cried out to an aide, who promptly delivered a single sheet of paper that had been updated almost hourly since the midterm elections with a series of statistics explaining that the "thumping" Bush took was not such a thumping after all.

The theory is this: The building's infrastructure was actually quite sound. It was bad luck and seasonal shifts in the winds that blew out the walls -- complacent candidates, an ill-timed Mark Foley page scandal and the predictable cycles of history. But the foundation is fine: "The Republican philosophy is alive and well and likely to reemerge in the majority in 2008."

The rest of Washington might think Tuesday's elections were a repudiation of Rove's brand of politics, but Rove does not. For years, he has been the center of hyperbolic attention -- called the genius, the electoral mastermind, the most powerful presidential adviser in a century, Bush's brain, the master of the dark arts of wedge politics, the Republican Moses leading conservatives out of the desert.

The mythology grew to such an outsized degree that when Rove insisted again and again during the campaign that Republicans would win despite the odds, fearful Democrats convinced themselves that he must have known something they did not and waited for an October surprise to spring. Rove encouraged that with supreme confidence. "You are entitled to your math, and I'm entitled to the math," he told a National Public Radio interviewer who suggested Democrats might win.

It turns out that Rove is mortal after all, and not always so good at math. And his critics are crowing. If he tuned in to CNN or NPR last week, here's a sampling of what he would have heard about himself.

Richard Viguerie, the conservative direct-mail pioneer: "Clearly a loss for George Bush, Karl Rove."

Andrew Sullivan, the conservative writer: "Shows him not to be a genius, but to be a real failure as a political strategist."

Bill Maher, the political satirist: "Karl Rove has led this Republican Party down a hole."

David Gergen, ex-presidential adviser: "He went off to hardliners, and that left an awful lot of moderates . . . feeling alienated."

Even Bush seemed to be jabbing at Rove in the aftermath of the elections, which handed Congress back to the Democrats. At a news conference Wednesday, Bush was asked about his ongoing book-reading contest with Rove. "I'm losing," Bush said tartly. "I obviously was working harder in the campaign that he was."

But those who interpret that as anything more than an affectionate, if edgy, dig misunderstand the president's sense of humor and his relationship with his chief strategist, according to officials. Bush likes to needle Rove, even nicknaming him "Turd Blossom," but aides said he does not blame his adviser for the loss, and few believe Rove will lose his job. Instead, he will turn to figuring out a policy and political agenda that can salvage the last two years of the Bush presidency.

"From everything that I've heard, Karl will be around till the end," said Michael J. Gerson, a former White House adviser. "The reason is simple: People who view him as a campaign operative whose usefulness ends when the last vote is counted are wrong."

Asked about his plans, Rove fell back on his standard line: "I serve at the pleasure of the president with the agreement of my wife."

Allies argued that without Rove, the losses would have been worse. "He deserves a good bit of credit for victories and probably he would admit he should take a little blame for the failure," said Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.). "That does not make him any less of a strategic thinker because he had a loss. If I was taking advice outside of the box from anyone, he would probably be the first person I call."

Mary Matalin, an adviser to Vice President Cheney, said Rove is still "the Zen master of movement politics" but envious rivals are eager to gloat over a single defeat. "Karl has done a lot of things that he had to do that were necessary, and if you've been around that long you make enemies," she said. "They used to call it the green-eyed monster. It's the nature of the town."

DOJ_NMG_0093012

Rove's brand of politics aims to sharpen differences with the opposition, energize the conservative base and micro-target voters to pick off selected parts of the other side's constituency. As he has in past elections, Rove designed a strategy to paint Democrats as weak on national security and terrorism, the "party of cut and run."

In an expansive interview last week, Rove said that strategy was working until the House page sex scandal involving ex-representative Foley (R-Fla.) put the Republican campaign "back on its heels," as he put it. "We were on a roll, and it stopped it," he said. "It revived all the stuff about Abramoff and added to it."

The various scandals surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and other ethics allegations, Rove said, had as much, if not more, to do with the defeat than the Iraq war. In Rove's analysis, 10 of the 28 House seats Republicans lost were sacrificed because of various scandals. Another six, he said, were lost because incumbents did not recognize and react quickly enough to the threat. That leaves 12 other seats lost, fewer than the 15 that Democrats needed to capture the House. So without corruption and complacency, he argued, Republicans could have kept control regardless of Bush's troubles and the war.

"It plays some role, but if Iraq is the determining factor and it is a dominant opinion, then in a blue state like Connecticut you should not have 60 percent of the voters vote for one of the candidates who said, 'Stay, fight and win,' " Rove said, referring to Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman's victory as an independent. "I don't deny that it's a factor, but it is hard to declare" that it is the overriding factor.

The "one-pager" outlines why, in his view, the losses were not particularly extraordinary and therefore not a repudiation of Bush: The loss of 28 House seats and six Senate seats is roughly comparable to losses suffered by the party in the White House in the sixth year of other presidencies and the same as the average wartime midterm. Moreover, it says, 23 races were decided by two percentage points or less, and it credits the "GOP Ground Game," the Rove-devised turnout machine. Overall, a shift of 77,611 votes would have kept the House in Republican hands.

Others point to different statistics -- voters nearly 2 to 1 casting ballots to express opposition to Bush; one in five conservatives voting for Democrats; fewer Hispanics, Catholics and evangelicals supporting Republicans; most voters favoring withdrawal of some or all U.S. troops from Iraq. Some dismiss Rove's historical comparisons as a rationalization for failure, especially since the gerrymandering of House districts has made it harder to oust incumbents than in past midterms.

Without referencing Rove specifically, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman called it a mistake to compare last week's defeat to past trends. "If we simply say there were historical problems we could not overcome, and that we did not have a chance to win, then we have a real problem," said Mehlman, a Rove protege. If Republicans recommit themselves to reform and smaller government, this election will be a "brief interruption in a generational effort to build a center-right majority.

Rove seconds that last thought and believes his turnout campaign actually beat the odds of history, ticking off a dozen races that were supposed to be closer. "What happened in all those? It may have been that the tactical work done by the White House, the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee had a big impact."

The lesson, he added, is that "if you're not complacent and you're prepared and you are driving and have a good game," you can win even in a tough political year. And so now it's back to the drawing board for the Architect.

Holding To The Center, Losing My Seat (NYT)

By Lincoln D. Chafee

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

LAST Tuesday, I was one of the many moderate Republican casualties of the anti-Bush virulence that swept the country. Despite my having voted against the Iraq war resolution, my reputation for independence, the editorial endorsement of virtually every newspaper in my state, and a job approval rating of 63 percent, I did not win. Why?

Back in December 2000, after one of the closest elections in our nation's history, Vice President-elect Dick Cheney was the guest at a weekly lunch meeting of a small group of centrist Republicans. Senators Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine, Senator Jim Jeffords of Vermont, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and I were honored to have the opportunity to visit with him on the eve of a session of Congress in which, because of Republican defeats, the Senate would be evenly divided at 50-50.

DOJ_NMG_0093013

As we sat in Senator Specter's cozy hideaway office and discussed the coming session, I was startled to hear the vice president dismiss suggestions of compromise and instead emphasize an aggressively partisan agenda that included significant tax cuts, the abandonment of international agreements and a muscular, unilateral foreign policy.

I was incredulous. Instead of a new atmosphere of cooperation and civility which, after all, had been the promise of the Bush-Cheney campaign, we seemed ready to return to the poisonous partisanship that marked the Republican-Congress — Clinton White House years.

In response to the vice president's comments I quickly sent him a letter to reinforce the views I expressed at the lunch. Excerpts follow:

As a follow-up to our meeting, I would like to pose a few thoughts.

In my view, one of the most popular refrains expressed by Governor Bush during the presidential campaign was, "I am a uniter, not a divider." I believe moderate Republicans can help the new administration develop a unifying agenda in the next session of Congress.

We are on an encouraging course toward reducing the national debt, and I believe we must maintain discipline both in discretionary spending and in proposals for significant tax cuts. This time of continued relative prosperity and peace is an extremely important opportunity for our country to stay on a firm pathway toward elimination of the debt.

Majorities from both parties in Congress expressed support in the past year for reform of the estate tax and repeal of the so-called marriage tax penalty. This appears to be an area of great promise for early bipartisan cooperation.

Progress on environmental issues could do much to enhance the new administration's program. I hope the new administration will be open to proposals to reduce the country's reliance on foreign oil through energy conservation and greater investments in mass transit.

I hope we can work together to resolve some of the controversial subjects that Democrats exploited during the campaign. If we could take such issues off the table in the early part of the new administration, I believe it would strengthen public support for the work ahead.

Obviously, my suggestions were not heeded. Our country faces daunting challenges. I believe my letter of six years ago is worth reviewing as the administration prepares for its last two years in office and as Republicans contemplate the direction our party will head in the future.

Do I have any regrets about Tuesday's outcome? Yes. I regret that I will not be able to participate in the difficult, but critical, healing process that must take place in our government if Democrats and Republicans are going to solve the serious problems facing this great nation.

I hope the new Congress and the administration that received, in the president's words, "a thumping," can find common ground for the common good.

Webb May Be Senate Maverick (WP)

By Tim Craig, Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

James Webb walked into the Fish Market restaurant in Alexandria in December and wanted longtime Democratic strategist Steve Jarding to answer just one question: What were his chances of defeating Sen. George Allen (R), one of Virginia's most popular politicians?

"Give me a number. What are my odds?" Webb, who had never run for elective office, asked.

"I said, 'Jim, they are really low,' " Jarding recalled. Webb shot back, "Give me a number."

After Jarding said "15 percent," Webb confidently said, "If I have that much of a chance, I will take it and win."

Webb's long shot paid off last week as he unseated Allen after a bruising campaign, giving Democrats control of the Senate.

With the campaign having centered on Allen's gaffes as much as it did on Webb's views on issues, few know what to expect when the former Marine and novelist enters the nation's most exclusive club, where the art of the deal rules the day.

DOJ_NMG_0093014

But Webb, a former Republican and Reagan administration official, said he might be a bit of a maverick in the Senate, which could frustrate Democratic leaders who poured more than $6 million into his campaign.

"I have my own views, and I have a lot of experiences, and I think I can bring the experiences I had to issues rather than having to read off a party briefing sheet," Webb said Friday in an interview.

Webb said he will model himself after former New York senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D), whom he described as someone "who had government experience that was shaped by the intellectual world."

But being a senator can be as much about politics as policy, and Webb on the campaign trail was almost the antithesis of the typical politician.

Webb was nervous in front of large crowds, couldn't understand why people wanted to shake his hand and hated asking people for money. He even turned down checks from people he didn't think could afford to give up, as he called it, "their gas money."

Until a few months ago, he would walk down the center of the street during a parade instead of zigzagging the route to shake hands. When he got tired, he refused to make fundraising calls or he took time off. That's what he did when he decided not to visit churches the Sunday before the election.

But for at least the next six years, Webb will have to be the politician and deal-maker that he never was during the campaign.

His life might become filled with ribbon-cuttings, Rotary Club dinners and town hall meetings. In Washington, the lobbyists and corporate executives he railed against during the campaign will be vying for his attention around the clock.

"He was the ultimate outside candidate," said Mark Rozell, a politics professor at George Mason University. "The trouble is, an outsider can run successful campaigns running against Washington, running against incumbents, but once elected they have to learn the task of government and taking responsibility of governing."

"Not only does he lack legislative experience, he lacks any electoral experience," Rozell said. "I think everyone will say his victory is an anti-Allen vote."

Webb's record in Washington was mixed, and he developed a reputation for being abrasive and difficult to get along with. He quit as secretary of the Navy during the Reagan administration because he objected to congressional efforts to cut the Navy's budget.

But those who know him say Webb should fit in well on Capitol Hill, where he worked as a staffer during the 1970s.

"My perspective is Jim will be a much better and happier senator than senatorial candidate," said former Virginia lieutenant governor Donald S. Beyer Jr. (D). "I don't think he is a natural candidate, but he is very bright, strong-principled and apparently fearless. I think he can be a very strong voice in the Senate. He will be very comfortable working with 99 other senators to solve problems."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said Webb has "a keen intellect" and will do fine in the Senate, once he understands its frustrations.

"It will test his patience, as it does all of us," said Davis, who has known Webb since the two coached Little League games together in Fairfax County.

Webb, an early opponent of the war in Iraq, might make his mark in the Senate in foreign and military affairs. Current and former politicians said they expect him to become the face of the Democratic Party's antiwar movement.

"It will make him a very important person," said former Nebraska senator Bob Kerrey (D), who had urged Webb to run. "If the question is how you structure our military for the future, he is going to come with a lot of knowledge."

Kerrey said Webb will become a magnet for senators who want him to co-sponsor their foreign-policy bills to give them credibility.

A Vietnam War hero, Webb can also be expected to take the lead on veterans issues. He will be representing a state that has among the highest percentage of veterans in the nation.

He said he immediately wants to introduce bills to give tax breaks to soldiers and educational assistance to veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, similar to the World War II-era GI Bill.

DOJ_NMG_0093015

As a former Republican, Webb will become a swing voter and play a role similar to that of his Senate buddies Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.). Webb, Hagel and McCain, as well as Virginia Sen. John W. Warner (R), could form an important voting bloc on issues related to foreign policy, political analysts say.

Webb, however, said it would be unfair to cast him as solely a foreign policy wonk. Despite conventional wisdom that he abandoned the Republican Party because of the Iraq war, Webb said economic issues are what drove him to the Democrats.

On the campaign trail, Webb talked about the "three Americas" -- rich, poor and middle-class -- and how society was breaking down over "class lines." Webb, who vows to never change what he believes for a "dollar or a vote," said he wants to close corporate tax loopholes and pay closer attention to escalating salaries for chief executives.

Webb also has an affinity for the labor movement, even though Virginia is a right-to-work state. He plans to push to raise the minimum wage and said that "organized labor is very important because everyone needs an agent."

Webb might also try to steer federal dollars into southwest Virginia, where his ancestors settled. Speaking to coal miners last weekend in Grundy, Webb said, "You have given your loyalty, and you will have my loyalty, and I will work to bring fairness back to the economic system."

Voters also should prepare for Webb's libertarian views on such issues as his support for abortion and gun rights and concern about some of President Bush's tactics in the war on terrorism, including the domestic wiretapping program.

"Government does not belong in people's private lives unless there is a compelling reason," Webb said.

Despite a desire to be portrayed as independent, Webb plans to become engaged with the state's Democratic Party. He said he plans to start helping Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) with his effort to elect more Democrats to the General Assembly next year.

"I want to do what I can to bring people back into the party," Webb said.

Del. L. Scott Lingamfelter (R-Prince William) said it would be a mistake for Webb to conclude that his victory Tuesday was a mandate.

"If he goes in tooting in there and jumps on the Hillary Clinton agenda, he'll be a one-term senator," Lingamfelter said. "Virginians won't take it."

Webb said he understands that he beat Allen by less than 10,000 votes and that, in fact, he might not have won if Allen had not made a last-minute attack on sex-laced passages in his novels.

Allen's attack, 10 days before the election, appeared to take a toll on Webb's staffers, who began doing yoga in the hallways of his campaign headquarters to calm their nerves. But Webb said the accusations, which appeared on the Drudge Report Web site and then in newspapers and on television, backfired.

"I got 170,000 hits on my Web site in 24 hours," Webb said. "That is when I said, 'I think I am going to win.' "

I Am Macaca (WP)

By S.R. Sidarth

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

This past summer, between my third and fourth year of college, I decided to volunteer for the campaign of Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb in my home state of Virginia. For most of the summer, I worked behind the scenes at the campaign headquarters in Arlington, helping set up field offices statewide and performing other odd jobs. In the second week of August, I was dispatched by the campaign to serve as Republican Sen. George Allen's tracker on a "listening tour" across the state. Tracking was a rather solitary pursuit; I videotaped Allen's public appearances whenever I was admitted into an event and killed time between stops in places I had never been to before.

Then, on Aug. 11, my experience took a strange -- and now famous -- turn. On that day in Breaks Interstate Park, located on the Kentucky border, Allen acknowledged my presence for the first time in one of his stump speeches. I was singled out at a GOP picnic, identified as "macaca or whatever his name is" -- despite the fact that Allen knew my name, as we had been traveling the same route for five days -- and then "welcome[d] to America and the real world of Virginia."

Allen's actions that day stood out because they were not representative of how I was treated while traveling around the state. Everywhere I went, though I was identifiably working on behalf of Allen's opponent, people treated me with dignity, respect and kindness. I cannot recall one event where food was served and I was not invited to join in the meal. In southwest Virginia, hospitality toward me was at a high point.

DOJ_NMG_0093016

The night before the incident in Breaks, I stayed at the home of Jewel Jones, Webb's aunt, in Gate City on the Tennessee border. I was treated like family even though I was a guest for only half a day, and I received a grand tour of the area where Webb's ancestors have lived for more than a century. The following day, at the picnic in Breaks, even after Allen's comments highlighted my outsider status, I was not allowed to depart without eating, because as one woman put it, "Political differences are set aside at the dinner table." In the same spirit, I was given accurate directions to Allen's next event, held in Bluefield the following morning.

After Allen's remarks, my heritage suddenly became a matter of widespread interest. I am proud to be a second-generation Indian American and a practicing Hindu. My parents were born and raised in India and immigrated here more than 25 years ago; I have known no home other than Northern Virginia. The hairstyle inflicted upon me by two friends late one night also became newsworthy; for the record, it was intended to be a mullet and has since grown out to nearly the appropriate length.

The larger question that this experience brings up is: How far has society progressed on the issues of race and openness? By 2050, according to most projections, the United States will be a minority-majority nation. But the fact that Allen believed I was an immigrant, when in fact I am a native Virginian, underlines the problems our society still faces.

Then again, Webb's victory last week gives me hope that Virginia will not tolerate playing the race card. It is still hard for me to accept that I could have had a pivotal role in the election results; I would not wish the scrutiny I received on anyone. But I am also glad to have helped Webb. Every little bit counted, especially in an election decided by about 9,000 votes out of nearly 2.4 million cast.

The politics of division just don't work anymore. Nothing made me happier on election night than finding out the results from Dickenson County, where Allen and I had our encounter. Webb won there, in what I can only hope was a vote to deal the race card out of American politics once and for all.

A Survivor Reflects On Political Casualties, And Real Ones (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

Bridgeport, Conn.

Sitting in the sun on the balcony of his house overlooking the Long Island Sound on Thursday, Representative Christopher Shays rubbed his eyes, rubbed his temples, jumped up to take a congratulatory call from Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, and plopped back wearily into a white plastic chair.

Like the only survivor of a hotel fire, he was a little hesitant to draw too many conclusions but glad he was alive.

“I’m only two days into this,” said Mr. Shays, after narrowly beating Diane G. Farrell to keep the seat in Congress he has held since 1987. “The first day you try to get your sleep. The second day you try to think about what happened to your friends.”

Many of them were the Republicans who were washed out to sea in the Democratic tide. Mr. Shays was one of the few Republicans among perhaps two dozen seen as vulnerable back in September who managed to survive. He was the only one of the three Republican incumbents from Connecticut who won re-election. When he went to Congress, he was one of nine Republican representatives from the six New England states. In the next Congress, he will be the only one.

And he won the race the hard way. He had a highly regarded, well-funded opponent. He supported the war in Iraq, if not the way it was executed. He agreed to take part in 11 debates. He did not run negative ads. He lost most of the key newspaper endorsements. His district, the Fourth, was solidly antiwar.

Some things you can learn from a guy who bucked the tide and won. Some you can’t. Mr. Shays no doubt benefited from his reputation for being an effective congressman and for a maverick’s image going back to the State Legislature in the mid-1980s. He has burnished that image in Congress ever since he got there.

He showed up at every campaign event with a 54-page booklet of positions, votes, achievements and federal spending in the district — not sexy but informative. He was able to convince people, in a way that the state’s two other Republicans, Nancy L. Johnson and Rob Simmons, were not, that if they wanted change, he was still enough of an outsider to offer it. He ran without apology on the war, saying it was a noble effort that had been botched but could still be saved. And he rejected the notion of a consultant-driven, cookie-cutter campaign with the requisite attack ads. He ran the campaign his way, and he made it work.

DOJ_NMG_0093017

"By being willing to lose the election, I won the election," Mr. Shays said. "Because from the start I was willing to lose rather than to win the wrong way. And I think of some of my colleagues that have lost around the country, and I think, boy, I would never want to go out that way."

Of course, one voter's maverick may be one colleague's grandstanding egotist. It's likely that some of Mr. Shays's fellow party members were more eager to keep his seat Republican than to see the guy sitting in it be re-elected. But he figures that if ever the party needs in-house critics, it's now.

"We lost our moral authority to lead," he said. "Power in and of itself does not justify holding power."

He said that when the party looked the other way at its ethical failings over the years, it was ambling toward disaster that finally arrived in the House page scandal.

"As soon as Foley came up, I knew it. You could feel it. I said, 'We're dead.' "

BUT, of course, there were casualties that mattered a lot more than the election ones.

"I don't know how you'll react to this, but I also want to say this," he said on Tuesday night in his victory speech, interrupting the election night ritualistic hoopla with a jolt of reality. He read four names: "Wilfredo Perez. Tyanna Avery-Felder. Jack Dempsey. Nicholas Maderas. I sent them to Iraq, and they came home draped in American flags.

"I think about them almost every day of my life. And when the press talked about how tormented I must feel," he said, referring to the possibility of losing the election, "they just didn't get it. They just didn't get it. The only torment I feel is for those families. And I pray that we can make it right for these families, and that we will find a way to have our men and women come home from success not failure, but that we find a way to bring them home."

No one who knows him doubts his sincerity. But no one knows better than Mr. Shays that good intentions can be trumped by bad results. He knows in the end he will be judged more on what happens in the war fought by Specialist Perez, Specialist Avery-Felder, Corporal Dempsey and Private Maderas than on whether he ran a perfect race and held off Ms. Farrell, withstood the raging tides and kept his seat two more years.

New Democratic Majority Throws Bush's Judicial Nominations Into Uncertainty (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 — The impending Democratic takeover of the Senate, lawmakers and administration officials agree, will produce a vast change in an area that has produced some of the sharpest partisan battles in recent years: President Bush's effort to shape the federal bench with conservative judicial nominees.

There is a strong consensus that the four most conservative of Mr. Bush's nominations to the federal appeals courts are doomed. Republicans and Democrats say the four have no chance of confirmation in the next several weeks of the lame-duck Congressional session or in the final two years of Mr. Bush's term.

The nominees are William J. Haynes II, the Pentagon's chief lawyer who was responsible for the much-criticized military interrogation policies; William G. Myers III, a longtime lobbyist for the mining and ranching industries and a critic of environmental regulations; Terrence W. Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina; and Michael B. Wallace of Mississippi, a lawyer who was rated unqualified for the court by the American Bar Association.

For the past six years, the relationship between Senate Democrats and Mr. Bush has been marked by unremitting rancor and suspicion. The Constitution gives the Senate the power to confirm or decline a president's judicial choices; although Senate Democrats were in the minority for much of Mr. Bush's term, they took the unusual step of waging filibusters to block several of the president's nominees who they said were too conservative.

With that foundation of hostility, there is deep uncertainty now as to how Mr. Bush and the Democratic Senate will deal with each other come January.

Some Democrats say that how Mr. Bush handles judicial nominations will provide an early test of his pledge to compromise and de-emphasize partisanship. It will be significant, they say, whether he chooses to renominate his four most conservative choices in the next Congress, hoping for political reasons to paint Democrats as obstructionist, or instead drops them as hopeless and tries to reach compromises.

DOJ_NMG_0093018

Ronald A. Klain, a former Democratic chief counsel for the Judiciary Committee and the White House counsel in charge of judicial nominations for President Bill Clinton, said Mr. Bush and the Republicans faced a decision with important implications.

"The Bush administration has played the game of judicial selection very hard and very far to the right for the past six years with little moderation," Mr. Klain said. "They have to make a fundamental decision now as to how they want to deal with this. Do they move to the center or stay true to the right?"

A senior Democratic strategist in the Senate said his party was eager to see which direction Mr. Bush chose on judicial nominations.

"Those guys in the White House have governed unilaterally for six years," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity as is customary among Congressional staff. "It's been their way or no way, show no quarter."

"Does he pivot and become like he was as Texas governor and work with both sides of the aisle," the official said, "or does he send up these guys again and set us up for hard votes and call the Democrats obstructionist?"

That had been a political tenet of the White House. The administration had a no-lose situation in naming staunch conservatives to the bench: their choices would either be confirmed or their defeat would provide a strong campaign issue.

The chief Republican proponent of underlining Democratic opposition to Mr. Bush's judicial choices was Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania. Mr. Santorum, as a Republican leader, once staged a round-the-clock "anti-filibuster" in 2003 in which the Senate was kept in continual session for 40 hours over two nights. Mr. Santorum was defeated in his re-election bid this week.

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said this week that he thought Democrats were overreaching in viewing Mr. Bush's actions as a test.

"The last time I read the Constitution, the president has the power to nominate whomever he wants," Mr. Specter said. "The Democrats don't have to vote for those people, but I don't see it as a sign of truculence or defiance if he nominates people they won't vote for."

Mr. Specter said he hoped to move forward on other Bush nominees who were less controversial than those four. He said Peter M. Keisler, a senior Justice Department lawyer nominated to a seat on the appeals court in Washington, should be considered quickly.

"I don't know of any substantive objection to his nomination," Mr. Specter said. "It's not good public policy to hold someone up without cause."

David A. Yalof, a political science professor at the University of Connecticut and an authority on judicial selection, said the larger political objective for the Democrats might have little to do with individual assessments of the Bush nominees.

In the last two years of a presidency, Professor Yalof said, "The priority for the party not in control of the White House is not so much in stopping candidates based on their ideologies, but keeping as many vacancies open as possible on the theory that the next president may be someone of your party and will be able to fill those slots."

If the Democrats follow that model, he said, they will be following the playbook of the Republicans, who blocked most of Mr. Clinton's appeals court nominees in his last two years in office.

Carmakers' Agenda For Bush: Hear Our Pain (FREEP)

By Justin Hyde

Detroit Free Press, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- When the heads of Detroit's automakers finally take their seats at the White House on Tuesday across from President George W. Bush, their concerns will boil down to the old Aretha Franklin song: R-E-S-P-E-C-T.

From the rising cost of retiree health care to the advantages a weak yen gives the Japanese, the Detroit automakers will press for more recognition for their issues, something industry executives say has been lacking from the president. They'll also attempt to draw distinctions between themselves and the foreign automakers whose U.S. branches generate record profits.

But they will make clear that their concerns do not add up to another seven-letter word: B-A-I-L-O-U-T.

DOJ_NMG_0093019

The meeting should "enhance the president's understanding of the importance of the domestic auto industry to the economic health of the United States," General Motors Vice Chairman Bob Lutz said in a recent interview, emphasizing the word "domestic."

Foreign automakers that build cars in the United States help the economy, "but it's not the same as a fully integrated American auto company that retains the intellectual property in the United States, has primarily American shareholders," he said, so "the wealth gets reinvested in the U.S."

Ford Chief Executive Alan Mulally said Friday of the meeting with Bush: "What I'm looking forward to is just sharing with him the state of our industry and also talking about competitiveness going forward."

All sides expect no firm commitments from the scheduled 45-minute session in the Roosevelt Room, which will include Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that Bush planned to use the meeting to "reaffirm his support for the American auto industry, and his support for its growth and success." Snow said Bush also will thank them for their progress on flexible-fuel and hybrid vehicles.

Whether or not GM Chairman Rick Wagoner, Mulally and Chrysler Group Chief Executive Tom LaSorda can get their points across to Bush, the industry does have a louder voice in Washington thanks to the rise of its most ardent backers in a Congress that, after Tuesday's election, will be controlled by Democrats.

"I hope this meeting produces some evidence that this administration finally understands the needs of the American auto industry to be treated fairly in the world marketplace," said U.S. Rep. John Dingell, a Dearborn Democrat who is pegged to reclaim the chairmanship of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which handles many issues important to the auto industry.

Added Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich.: "We need a government that's a partner with the auto industry and manufacturing sector. Our companies do not compete with foreign companies. They compete with foreign governments."

While congressional Democrats had pushed several pieces of legislation that would help the industry, their prospects are questionable, as the party's leaders and Bush have yet to discuss their priorities in depth.

Here are the three topics that will dominate Tuesday's meeting, and the outlook for each.

Health care: Perhaps the single greatest threat to the automakers' finances, health care adds $900 to $1,400 to the cost of every vehicle GM, Ford and Chrysler make. All three spend more on health care than on steel, and GM's estimated costs for future retiree health-care benefits could wipe out the shareholder equity on its balance sheet later this year because of an accounting rule change.

Despite the gravity of the health-care issue, there's been little movement in Washington toward major health-care reform. The health-care bill closest to passing Congress aims to lower costs by setting standards for computer systems, benefits that would mainly control the rate of inflation years from now.

Democratic leaders have pledged to rework part of the Medicare drug plan benefit to allow the government to negotiate drug prices and close the so-called doughnut hole, the gap in coverage when seniors spend between $2,250 and $5,100 a year on prescription drugs.

Sean McAlinden, chief economist for the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, said such a move could save GM alone "hundreds of millions of dollars a year" by providing drugs that GM pays for today. But most observers expect Bush would veto major alterations to the Medicare plan, and closing the hole would require $200 billion over 10 years -- more than might be saved through price negotiations.

Dingell said that while broad reforms would be difficult, even changes that worked around the edges of the problem could benefit metro Detroit.

Trade and currency: A chronic complaint of the domestic automakers -- the unfair advantage of a weak Japanese yen -- has grown in Detroit's executive suites as Toyota, Honda and Nissan rack up impressive profits.

The automakers contend that Japan artificially suppresses the value of its yen, making imported goods from Japan cheaper and boosting the profits exported from American customers. The automakers might press hard on currency issues because Bush is scheduled to meet with Japan Prime Minister Shinzo Abe on Saturday during his visit to Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0093020

Energy: "Energy independence" was the one Washington buzz phrase shared across party lines before the election, and will only gain momentum with the Democrats' elevation in Congress.

The Detroit automakers pledged earlier this year to double the number of vehicles they build annually that can run on 85% ethanol fuel, and have pushed for more incentives to spread E85 fueling stations.

Bush has proposed revising fuel economy standards for passenger cars, which the industry hasn't opposed, but has not supported the kind of higher standards many Democrats back.

One type of proposal that could gain momentum would be some sort of industry Marshall Plan, which would give Detroit automakers help with their benefit costs in return for increased spending on new fuel-efficient technologies such as plug-in hybrids.

Some lawmakers also have called for large boosts in the federal research spending on new vehicle technology such as fuel cells, which could allow automakers to do less of the heavy lifting in that type of research themselves.

"That money they must spend on these things now comes from the bottom line," McAlinden said. "The money not used from the bottom line could be released for more prosaic product development."

The trouble for Detroit in pushing for these issues is that the automakers' concerns contradict Bush's portrayal of a vigorous U.S. manufacturing sector and a healthy national economy.

Those concerns might fall on deaf ears in Washington, where many see the domestic companies' troubles as self-inflicted rather than structural. Bush himself said last month that the automakers' accumulated health-care and retirement promises to their workers were their burden, not the government's.

"The U.S. remains a competitive place to make cars and many components, but GM and Ford labor under a $2,500 cost disadvantage thanks to clumsy management and unrealistic labor contracts," said Peter Morici, a business professor at the University of Maryland.

Consider last month's jobs report. While most measures of manufacturing output have remained strong, manufacturing jobs shrank again, accounting for the lowest share of employed workers in modern times. Part of that decline came from lost jobs in auto factories, where employment hit a 14-year-low as thousands of workers took buyouts or early retirement from GM and Delphi Corp.

Ed Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, said the decline in manufacturing jobs over the past couple of years was a result of more productive factories and that jobs lost in manufacturing were being replaced with higher-wage work in other industries.

"One of the things this economy seems to be best at is figuring out ways to produce more output with fewer resources," Lazear said. "That's a good thing because what it means is that we can release labor to work in other sectors and to be more productive in other sectors."

Bush last met with the heads of Detroit's automakers in Dearborn in 2003, as he canvassed the country to build support for his tax-cut package, which all three of the companies' then-CEOs pledged to support.

The last White House meeting with Detroit's Big Three was in 1997, when auto and union executives warned President Bill Clinton that the Kyoto greenhouse gas reduction treaty could hurt their business. Clinton also chatted with CEOs during a 2000 visit to the Detroit auto show.

None of those events carried the anticipation of this meeting, because most of the automakers were healthy at those earlier meetings. But with roughly 70,000 jobs being cut by GM and Ford, and the German-owned Chrysler Group losing money, the political pressures have risen exponentially.

With Dems In Power, Part D Could Get A Makeover (PPG)

By Bruce Japsen, Chicago Tribune

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 12, 2006

CHICAGO -- The Democratic landslide in last week's midterm elections raises the specter of federal regulation of drug prices via changes to Medicare's new prescription drug benefit -- a move that could lower costs for seniors and squeeze pharmaceutical and health insurance industry profits.

DOJ_NMG_0093021

With Democrats in control of both houses of Congress, they are almost certain to seek passage of price control measures in that legislative body. And there are enough Republicans who supported price-control measures in the past that bills will gain momentum next year, analysts say, meaning members of Congress who vote against them will feel the wrath of seniors in the 2008 election.

Shares of most major drug makers and health insurers fell last week on concerns over tougher regulations on prescriptions. Democrats have said many of these firms have reaped huge sales and profits from the new drug benefit -- money that could have been passed on to taxpayers in terms of savings or seniors in terms of richer drug benefits.

The law creating the Medicare Part D drug benefit, added in 2003, did not allow the Medicare program to negotiate prices directly with manufacturers, as the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs does. The VA is known for winning price concessions from drug companies from direct negotiations.

Not only did Democrats favor such direct negotiations, but some influential Republican senators such as presidential aspirant John McCain of Arizona also supported the idea. Mr. McCain could be a critical vote for the new but ultraslim Democratic majority in the Senate.

A nonpartisan study has shown costs are more than 10 percent higher by having private insurers involved in the benefit coverage rather than having the government administer the program on its own.

"The Democratic Party's takeover ... shifts the policy landscape for health-care providers," Kemp Dolliver, analyst with investment bank Cowen & Co., wrote in a report Wednesday. "The Democrats will put Medicare Part D 'in play' by proposing removal of the clause of the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003 that prohibits the federal government from negotiating drug prices directly with manufacturers."

Not to be underestimated, however, is the clout of the pharmaceutical industry, which contributes heavily to campaigns of both parties. And President Bush, a Republican, would have the authority to veto any legislation while his appointees, who run the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, can "drag their heels" on implementing provisions for negotiating directly with drug makers, Mr. Dolliver said.

At the very least, however, Democrats have won power to hold hearings about the profits that drug makers, health insurers and pharmacy benefit firms have made since the Medicare benefit became widely available to seniors this year, analysts predict.

These Democrats say insurers, pharmacy benefit managers and drugstores have the ability to pass along more savings, and bills already are being pushed to foster more transparency in price negotiations. Analysts also have mentioned Walgreen Co. as a potential congressional probe target because generics are popular with seniors and drugstores mark up prices of generics.

But the health-care industry argues that the private sector does get good prices because dozens of health plans and pharmacy benefit firms are able to play the drug makers off of one another in a free market system for better prices. These companies also say consumers have more choices because dozens of private health plans offer the drug benefit, which allows for more choice and creates price competition among the various benefit plans.

"This is the first time in history of passage of any government program where the actual costs were less than the estimates at the time of passage," said Karen Ignagni, chief executive officer of America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade group and lobby. "The government is benefiting because the costs are lower and beneficiaries are benefiting because [monthly] premiums were projected to be $38 a month and now they are $24 on average."

The drug industry also argues that regulating drug prices would hurt consumers and patients because it would harm drug makers' budgets for research and development. Pharmaceutical companies also say price controls could lead to supply shortages.

"We believe that Congress and the administration should carefully consider the impact that any legislation or regulation might have on pharmaceutical innovation," said Billy Tauzin, chief executive of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, which includes Pfizer Inc., Merck & Co. and Abbott Laboratories among its powerful membership.

"America's pharmaceutical research companies lead the world in discovering new cures and treatments for patients," Mr. Tauzin added. "The new drugs that save patient lives today are a result of the billions of dollars and years of research and development that pharmaceutical companies invest."

DOJ_NMG_0093022

White House Eyes Dollars From Nevada Land Sale (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 12, 2006

The Bush administration is trying to get its hands on millions of dollars generated from sales of federally owned land in Nevada in order to help pay down the deficit.

As part of the Southern Nevada Public Land Management Act, which passed in 1998, Congress agreed to sell 13 million acres of land in Nevada. The key backers of thelaw -- Nevada Sens. John Ensign, a Republican, and Harry Reid, a Democrat -- estimated the sales would provide $350 million to improve federal landholdings, preserve endangered species, fund state education and encourage construction of affordable housing for low-income residents.

But a real estate boom in the growing city of Las Vegas has helped the Bureau of Land Management, which is in charge of auctioning the land, bring in nearly $3 billion.

"It's like the Nevada delegation pulled a lever on the slot machine, and the coins keep dumping out," a Republican Senate staffer said. "The Nevada delegation has hit the jackpot."

Money generated from the land sales has been used in Clark County -- which includes Las Vegas -- to help pay for a $52 million public golf course, $25 million in outdoor toilets, a $38 million park and to provide a safe habitat for the endangered Moapa dace, a fish that is a member of the carp family.

The administration now wants some of the money transferred to the Treasury Department to help pay down the federal deficit, which hit a four-year low of $247.7 billion for the budget year that ended in September.

The administration submitted a proposal to Congress earlier this year to modify the act in order to specify who should benefit from the land sales, but that proposal is being ignored, the Republican staffer said.

"We've seen a lot of good come out of this, but when the price of property suddenly went up, we were looking at a whole bunch of money," an Interior Department official said. "And that's when those who do budgeting for deficit reduction said they needed a cut."

Nevada's two senators are against the administration -- or anyone else -- taking a cut of the money.

Jack Finn, spokesman for Mr. Ensign, said the land act is "one of his proudest accomplishments" and that revenues from the land sales "exceeded our expectations."

"It's not just the administration that wants to get their hands on the money. Other senators would like to get their hands on it, but it is Nevada legislation that should remain in Nevada," Mr. Finn said. "It is landmark legislation and Ensign strongly believes, and is making it clear to the administration, that funds generated should remain in Nevada as intended."

Jon Summers, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, said the Senate minority leader -- who is expected to become majority leader in January, as a result of last week's elections -- also opposes diverting the money out of Nevada.

"Just because the administration, with the help of a Republican rubber-stamp Congress, runs a record debt, doesn't mean we have to reopen the act," Mr. Summers said.

OTHER NEWS:

Liberal Groups Expect Postelection Results (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — After toppling the long-dominant Republicans in a hard-fought election, the Democratic Party's incoming congressional leaders have immediately found themselves in another difficult struggle — with their own supporters.

Some of the very activists who helped propel the Democrats to a majority in the House and Senate last week are claiming credit for the victories and demanding what they consider their due: a set of ambitious — and politically provocative — actions on gun control, abortion, national security and other issues that party leaders fear could alienate moderate voters and leave Democrats vulnerable to GOP attacks as big spenders or soft on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0093023

The conflict underscores the challenge facing the Democrats in line to lead Congress — Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco in the House and Harry Reid of Nevada in the Senate. Each has pledged in recent days to "govern from the center," after a campaign in which anger over the Iraq war and GOP scandals helped their party attract some unusually conservative candidates and a large share of independent voters.

Turning off those new voters could undermine Democrats' hopes of solidifying their new majorities and taking the White House in 2008. But to the leaders of interest groups who are core supporters of the Democratic Party, and who had been barred under Republican rule from the inner sanctums of power, the new Congress means a time for action, not compromise.

Lobbyists for the American Civil Liberties Union, for example, are all but counting on Democrats to repeal the most controversial provisions of the Patriot Act, the anti-terrorist law pushed by the White House that some critics call unconstitutional. They also want to end President Bush's domestic wiretapping program.

"We are not going to let them off the hook," said Caroline Fredrickson, the ACLU's legislative director, of the newly empowered Democratic leaders in Congress.

"We will hold their feet to the fire and use all the tools we can to mobilize our members."

Similar vows are coming from lobbyists for abortion rights, who want to expand family-planning options for poor women and scale back Bush's focus on abstinence education, and from gun-control advocates, who hope to revive a lapsed ban on assault weapons. Labor unions, a core Democratic constituency, are demanding universal healthcare and laws discouraging corporations from seeking inexpensive labor overseas.

"It's been kind of a drought for 12 years, and there is some pent-up energy," said Bill Samuel, legislative director for the AFL-CIO, the labor federation that has long been a Democratic Party stalwart and spent millions of dollars on get-out-the-vote activities.

Several of the labor movement's less-controversial goals, such as raising the minimum wage and allowing Medicare to seek discounts on drug prices, are found both in the AFL-CIO's brochures and on a Democratic leadership wish list designed to appeal across ideological lines.

But labor officials said they expected Pelosi, Reid and others to go further.

The day after the election, labor leaders declared a mandate for their causes and called on the new Congress to immediately reverse anti-union policies enacted by the Bush administration and promote affordable healthcare "for all."

"We're realistic about the congressional timetable, but we have our own view about why people went to the polls," said Samuel. "We think it had to do with their unhappiness with Republican inaction on the economy.... They're expecting Congress to tackle these issues, not play short ball."

Eli Pariser, executive director of the political action committee associated with the liberal activist group MoveOn.org, warned that Democratic leaders would be ill-advised to ignore the party's base.

"A huge number of people were involved in putting them over the top," Pariser said. "There's a huge group of people engaged and energized and ready to support Pelosi and company when they boldly lead — and to hold them to account if they stray."

Pressure on Democrats is especially acute to redirect U.S. policy in Iraq. Many Democrats say the issue was the most important one driving the party's victory.

Democratic lawmakers have not unified behind a single Iraq policy. If they could find common ground with Bush on a continued troop presence, they might fend off GOP efforts to label them as weak on national security — but they would probably infuriate a growing antiwar movement that helped propel the party back into power.

"American voters have done their job; now it's time for Congress to do theirs," said former Rep. Tom Andrews (D-Maine), national director of the antiwar group Win Without War. "The message couldn't be clearer. It's time to start the orderly withdrawal of American troops from Iraq. Our eyes are on the new Congress."

Other interest groups are pointing to Tuesday's results as vindication of their particular causes, and as proof that Democrats should embrace their issues rather than shun them as too liberal.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America, which advocates abortion rights, pointed to victories by like-minded candidates in conservative states and a rejection by South Dakota voters of an abortion ban. The result, the group says, should be that Democrats view their causes as mainstream, rather than part of a liberal agenda, and should devote more money to contraception and other family-planning options opposed by religious conservatives and scaled back by the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0093024

"I honestly believe there was no bigger winner in this election than Planned Parenthood Action Fund and women's health," said Planned Parenthood President Cecile Richards, referring to the group's political arm.

At the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, the leading gun-control advocacy group, President Paul Helmke has high hopes for the assault weapons ban — and he can list races where candidates backed by his group defeated those supported by the National Rifle Assn.

But Helmke, a former Republican mayor of Fort Wayne, Ind., acknowledged that his challenge was to convince Democrats that his cause was not "radioactive." Many Democratic strategists have come to believe that supporting gun-control laws alienates rural voters and many independents.

"Guns are a tricky issue," Helmke said. "But the elections show there's nothing to be afraid of."

Still, the issues of abortion and guns underscore the tough decisions facing Reid and Pelosi as they try to please the party's core supporters while appealing to centrist voters.

The party's winning formula this year, after all, required candidacies from cultural conservatives such as Rep.-elect Heath Shuler in western North Carolina and Sens.-elect Jon Tester in Montana and Jim Webb in Virginia.

A preview of the tussle that awaits Reid and Pelosi has been playing out on the Internet since election day, with liberal bloggers decrying party centrists as out of touch with the Democratic majority. The complaints have been serious enough to draw Reid's attention, prompting him to host a conference call after the election with more than a dozen of the country's most prominent liberal bloggers.

Reid himself has learned to navigate these issues in order to win election in largely rural Nevada. He calls himself pro-gun and, according to a spokesman, opposes abortion except in cases of rape and incest and when the woman's life is endangered.

In the Senate, matters are further complicated by the fact that at least five Democrats — nearly 10% of the caucus — are considering presidential bids in which they may need to win the liberal base to gain the nomination but then campaign to the center in a general election.

Republicans have already said they intend to take back power in 2008 by portraying Democrats as big-government tax raisers who would rather safeguard civil liberties than interrogate terrorists.

Conservatives, though splintered over Iraq, immigration and other issues, had succeeded in keeping power since 1994 in part by forging a coalition built on compromise and shared goals — a practice that Democrats have yet to perfect.

Senior Democrats say they will figure out a way to bridge the divide.

"Tension is inherent in politics, and maybe a little bit of tension is good," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley. "But on the core, fundamental issues, everyone's in line."

Wary that the interest groups' demands may turn off the centrist voters who put them in the majority, some Democratic pragmatists are preparing to press for greater independence.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the committee that designed the party's Senate campaign strategy, is publishing a book in January that is expected to lay out a plan for long-term Democratic dominance. He is expected to embrace a philosophy somewhere between the Democrats' old New Deal reliance on government and conservatives' outright disdain for government.

Schumer signaled as much after the election when he called on the party to "push aside the special interests and always keep our eye on the average American family."

An Uneasy Alliance (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

AMID all the post-election bliss evident within the constellation of bloggers and online Democratic activists known as the “netroots” last week, there was a note of anger and disappointment. Ned Lamont, the antiwar Connecticut businessman who defeated Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the August Democratic primary with strong support from the netroots, lost to the newly independent Mr. Lieberman on Tuesday, even as antiwar Democrats across the nation romped to upset victories.

DOJ_NMG_0093025

It was the fall campaign's signal clash between the Internet grass roots, which have become a growing political force since the 2004 presidential race, and the Democratic establishment, where big-money donors and incumbency rule. In Connecticut, the establishment won. Some bloggers fumed that Beltway Democrats had abandoned Mr. Lamont.

"The D.C. Senate Democrats and D.C. lobbyists are not on our side," wrote the Lamont backer Matt Stoller on the liberal Web site MyDD, a major node for the netroots' self-organizing multitudes. "They have their own side, a side that is out of touch, immoral, and dishonest." The establishment, he wrote a few days before the election, had stuck a "knife in our back."

It was the latest round in the long battle between leading netroots activists and their critics, real and perceived, among Washington's Democratic elite. But such disagreements may soon be on the wane. As the smoke began to clear after Election Day, two things seemed clear. Though the netroots have forever changed how campaigns raise money and find votes, the results demonstrated that they cannot yet win elections on their own. But the Democratic Party cannot win major national elections without the netroots.

"The establishment needs them, and they need the establishment," said Carol C. Darr, director of the Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet at George Washington University.

Like the music obsessives who plunked down $500 for first-generation iPods, Web-based activists served as the party's early adopters in 2006, just as they provided much of the early money and vigor behind Howard Dean's 2004 presidential campaign. This year, they coalesced around dozens of House and Senate candidates in highly unfavorable states or Congressional districts, showering them with seed donations and praise while softening up G.O.P. incumbents with amateur opposition research, campaign stunts and homemade Web advertising.

Answerable to no one in particular, they could sometimes go off-key: During the Democratic primary, a blog supporting Mr. Lamont put up an altered photograph of Mr. Lieberman showing the senator in blackface, much to Mr. Lamont's embarrassment.

They were also sometimes poor judges of what will sell in the larger political marketplace; most of the 19 netroots-supported candidates listed on ActBlue, an online clearinghouse for donations to Democrats, lost on Tuesday. But the online activists also gave some once-underrated candidates — like the Senate candidates Jon Tester and Jim Webb, in Montana and Virginia, respectively, and the House candidates Paul Hodes in New Hampshire and Joe Sestak in Pennsylvania — a chance to be taken seriously. All ended up winning on Tuesday.

"It was the early support, the attention — the ability to create opportunities for candidates to break out with energy and passion," said Jonah Seiger, a Democratic Internet strategist.

Thanks in part to the netroots, said Mr. Seiger, the more promising candidates got a second or third look from the mainstream news media, major donors and party officials, especially as the political environment became increasingly unfavorable to Republicans.

Mr. Webb, for example, was essentially drafted last winter by a network of national and Virginia-based netroots activists, who later helped him gather 10,000 signatures in three weeks to get on the Democratic primary ballot.

"They're a group of people who put their money where their mouth is," said Jessica Vanden Berg, Mr. Webb's campaign manager. "They gave Jim — who didn't have a campaign staff in the beginning or a financial base — they gave him a political base to jump from."

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee would go on to endorse Mr. Webb in the primary, and later poured nearly $7 million into his race against Republican George Allen, who conceded on Thursday, cementing the Democrats' new Senate majority.

In some cases, the party even got behind some netroots-favored candidates that it had previously ignored or discouraged. In California's 11th district, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee initially backed Steve Filson, a Navy veteran, over Gerald McNerney, the chief executive of a wind-turbine company who had the support of the Internet grass roots. But after Mr. McNerney won the primary, the committee spent half a million dollars on the general election. He won.

DOJ_NMG_0093026

Of course, it's difficult to say what particular factor provided the edge in a close race. But last week, onetime antagonists seemed willing to share credit for the Democratic sweep. Shortly before 9 a.m. on Election Day, Harry Reid, the Senate minority leader — and soon to be majority leader — posted an entry on the popular liberal blog Daily Kos, titled "You got us here." Without the netroots, Mr. Reid wrote, "Democrats would not be in the position we are in today."

Markos Moulitsas Zúniga, the combative founder of Daily Kos, returned the favor. "I'm ready to get beyond the 'who gets credit' conversation, because we all do," Mr. Moulitsas wrote last week.

All told, the Democratic netroots and the party's traditional establishment managed to form an uneasy — and in many cases unintended — collaboration. What happens next is less clear, especially as the Democratic leadership moves from campaigning to governing.

"It's in part the job of the netroots to challenge the establishment," said Simon Rosenberg, the president of New Democrat Network, who has served as a bridge between party officials and leading netroots organizers. "It's their job to not be satisfied. That's why this is a complicated relationship. But through this healthy tension — this dialogue and debate — I think we'll end up with a stronger party."

Core Values Still Valid, GOP Says (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, November 12, 2006

Voters did not reject core Republican principles of lower taxes, smaller government and family values when they put the Democrats in charge of Congress, Republican officials across the country said last week in their post-mortems on the midterm elections.

If anything, these officials told The Washington Times, Republicans blundered by abandoning or de-emphasizing signature issues that had fueled the party's meteoric rise since the 1990s. The party must champion these issues again if it hopes to win back the voters' trust in the 2008 presidential election, the officials said.

"In the tight races where we had candidates who articulated the core issues like low taxes, less government and strong family values, those are the candidates that prevailed in our competitive races," Minnesota Republican Chairman Ron Carey said. "They did better than candidates that didn't stand firm on those conservative Republican issues."

As an example, Mr. Carey cited Republican Michele Bachmann, who ran as a staunch conservative with strong evangelical support in Minnesota's open 6th District race, easily defeating Patty Wetterling, a liberal Democrat, 50 percent to 42 percent.

"The candidates who tried to finesse the GOP's positions fared poorly," Mr. Carey said. "Those who ran on core Republican issues were able to better withstand the Democratic onslaught."

An example, some Republican strategists said, was Rep. Gil Gutknecht of Minnesota, who lost his 1st District seat to Democrat Tim Walz, a teacher and National Guard veteran, 53 percent to 47 percent.

But Republican critics strongly rejected the premise of these Republican post-mortems, saying taxes were virtually nonexistent as an election issue, as was limited government.

"The fact of the matter is that these were non-issues," said pollster and demographic analyst David Bositis of the National Center for Political and Economic Studies.

"And how could Republicans run on smaller government? They've been in charge for the last five years, and government spending has exploded. They can't claim the Democrats are responsible for that," he said.

Mr. Carey argued that voters remain just as conservative as they were in earlier elections when Republicans won increasing majorities in Congress. But Republicans failed to sharpen the differences between themselves and Democrats, many of whom portrayed themselves as centrists despite their liberal views and voting records, other Republicans said in a survey of state party leaders by The Times.

"I think people still agree with Republicans on lowering taxes, on fiscal policy and trying to keep the government in check. I don't buy the argument that everybody has become a liberal," Kansas Republican Chairman Tim Shallenburger said.

DOJ_NMG_0093027

He and other state party officials said they had no doubt the Iraq war and congressional scandals were the overriding issues that produced a wave of Democratic victories in more than 30 Republican congressional districts and a half-dozen Senate races.

Exit surveys of 13,208 voters by the Associated Press and the major television news networks found that more than half of the voters surveyed, 55 percent, opposed the war in Iraq and said that opposition would make them more likely to vote for Democratic House candidates.

The exit polls also showed that six in 10 rejected President Bush's chief justification for the war: to make America more secure at home. Notably, seven out of 10 independents -- a pivotal voting bloc that led to Republican losses -- felt that way.

Some party chairmen said that without the Iraq war, a number of Republicans would have won.

"It would have been a completely different outcome," Michigan Republican Chairman Saul Anuzis said. "The Iraq war was clearly one of the major reasons for Bush's unpopularity," which Democrats turned into a referendum on his presidency.

There was also a belief among many party officials that the war -- when combined with a number of other issues, such as excessive spending and the lobbying and congressional-page scandals -- produced a "critical mass" that angered and frustrated Republicans and hurt turnout among party members. Exit polls showed that nearly 30 percent of voters were "angry" with Mr. Bush.

But it was the Republican Party's abandonment of its core principles on spending and limited government that these and other Republicans outside the Beltway said was the biggest complaint among the party's grass roots. They blamed Republican leaders and members of Congress who, as one party chairman said, "forgot why we sent them there."

"I heard a lot of Republicans say, 'We gave you a chance, and you spent more money than before. Why should we send you back to Washington?' " Mr. Carey said.

"Some said we became the people we ran against in 1994. Whether it is true or not, that was the perception in our party. It was in the minds of many voters Tuesday," he said. "We need to get back to our basic core principles and talk about the issues that draw a sharp distinction between Republicans and Democrats."

These complaints after the election were picked up by some Republican presidential hopefuls, including Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who saw them as an opportunity to make the party strong again.

"Americans have not become less conservative, but they believe some Republicans have. As a party, we need to remember who we are and the principles that have always led our party and our country to success," Mr. Romney said last week.

"We must return to the common-sense Reagan Republican ideals of fighting for hard-working Americans, lowering taxes, shrinking government, curbing out-of-control spending," he said.

Mr. McCain called for a return to the conservative principles he said make up the foundations of the Republican Party.

"We came to Washington to change government, and government changed us," he said. "We departed rather tragically from our conservative principles."

Though Democratic leaders repeatedly denounced Mr. Bush's across-the-board tax cuts as "tax cuts for the wealthy," polls showed that most Americans sided with Mr. Bush and the Republicans on this core issue. A Gallup poll late last month showed that 74 percent were against Democratic proposals to raise federal income taxes.

Though Mr. Bush and Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, who is in line to become the next House speaker, have buried the hatchet for now, some Republicans question whether party members can or even should compromise with Democrats on taxes and spending.

"I think there is going to be a split in Republican circles between the faction that says let's compromise and try to get along and another faction that says we need to get back to our core principles and beliefs," Mr. Carey said.

Republicans are not the only ones who are divided over postelection strategies. The elections also have reopened old ideological divisions between the Democratic Party's liberal and centrist wings. Centrists fear the middle-of-the-road voters who returned them to power will be turned off if the party's left wing designs the legislative agenda for next year.

"This is a victory for the vital center of American politics over the extremes," said Al From, the founder of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council (DLC), "and, while Democrats benefited from an energized party base, the key to the victory was in the contested center of the electorate, among moderates."

DOJ_NMG_0093028

Mr. From said his point "was underscored by [Sen.] Joe Lieberman's re-election victory in Connecticut."

Mr. Lieberman, a hero among DLC members, was defeated in the primary by the party's liberal, anti-war activists because of his support for the Iraq war. He won re-election Tuesday as an independent, largely with Republican votes.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, a potential presidential candidate and a DLC leader, similarly warned his party last week in an interview with USA Today that "if we serve up a highly partisan, ideologically extreme, Democratic version of what they just voted against, we're not going to do very well."

But that view was flatly rejected by party liberals who oppose the DLC's centrist approach on domestic and national-security policy issues.

"If Democrats had campaigned like Lieberman on the war, they might have won in Connecticut, but they would have lost in most places," said Roger Hickey, co-director of the liberal Campaign for America's Future. "This election was a referendum on the war, and the Democrats were smart to reject the DLC position on the war."

Reactionary Moderates (NYT)

By Ramesh Ponnuru

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SOCIAL conservatives had a bad election night on Tuesday. A slew of pro-life senators and House members lost their races. Missouri voted to amend its Constitution to protect a right to clone human embryos for research. Every pro-life initiative on a state ballot failed.

But before we declare this election proof that social conservatism is doomed, consider that Republicans as a whole had a worse night. Pro-lifers lost four seats in the Senate and, depending on some unresolved races, appear to have lost 20 in the House. But the Republican Party lost six in the Senate and 29 in the House. The discrepancy stems from the fact that some pro-choice Democrats are replacing pro-choice Republicans, and even a few pro-life Democrats are replacing pro-life Republicans.

Meanwhile, ballot initiatives as a whole went better for the social right than for other conservative factions. Almost all of the initiatives against same-sex marriage won. Even most Western states, where the Republicans' social conservatism is said to be dooming the party, voted for those initiatives — which typically ran well ahead of local party candidates. Colorado and Nevada rejected legal marijuana. Economic conservatives, on the other hand, lost every fight over the minimum wage.

That's something to remember the next time you hear that after their defeat, the Republicans need to "move to the center." Maybe they should: but which center? When editorialists talk about the "sensible center," they usually have in mind free-trading, budget-balancing social liberals. It is a political profile often found in the business world, and on the coasts. But there is another center — one that's liberal on economic measures but conservative on social mores.

In several high-profile races, the winning candidates played to this "center." For example, Senator-elect Claire McCaskill pounded the Republican incumbent, Jim Talent, in Missouri on economic issues like veterans' benefits, but she came out against partial-birth abortion weeks before the election. Representative Harold Ford, a Democrat who nearly pulled off an upset in the Tennessee Senate race, went so far as to endorse a constitutional amendment on marriage and to call himself pro-life.

Senator-elect Robert Casey Jr. of Pennsylvania, a Democrat, vowed to fight free trade, but also to oppose abortion. If we take Mr. Casey at his word about his intentions in the Senate, then his defeat of Rick Santorum is simply a move to a less abrasive style of social conservatism, not a repudiation of it.

Something similar happened in the last presidential campaign. President Bush was on the defensive when he talked about outsourcing jobs and the cost of health care, while John Kerry was on the defensive on most of the social issues — and Mr. Kerry eventually said his position on marriage was basically the same as the president's.

The real message of the last few elections is that, for the most part, social issues help the Republicans and economic ones the Democrats. Did talking about energy policy, and keeping quiet about gay marriage, help Senator George Allen of Virginia survive Jim Webb's challenge?

The lesson for the Democrats, meanwhile, is not that they all need to move right on social issues. It is that they can be a lasting majority if they are an economically liberal party with socially conservative and socially liberal wings. Because if they choose to be a socially liberal party with economically liberal and economically conservative wings, they will soon find themselves back in minority status.

DOJ_NMG_0093029

The Republicans, meanwhile, can prosper if they can find ways to address the economic concerns of working-class cultural conservatives — many of them unmoved by free-market bromides — without doing violence to their own limited-government principles.

I agree with the economic conservatives on most issues, and disagree with the social conservatives on some, so I'm not entirely happy about the electoral reality I'm describing. (I wish Colorado and Nevada had voted the other way on marijuana, for instance.) But there it is nonetheless. While both social conservatives and Republicans need to make some changes, a divorce isn't on the table, and there's no political reason one should be.

2006: The Year Of The "Macaca" (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

OF course, the "thumpin' " was all about Iraq. But let us not forget Katrina. It was the collision of the twin White House calamities in August 2005 that foretold the collapse of the presidency of George W. Bush.

Back then, the full measure of the man finally snapped into focus for most Americans, sending his poll numbers into the 30s for the first time. The country saw that the president who had spurned a grieving wartime mother camping out in the sweltering heat of Crawford was the same guy who had been unable to recognize the depth of the suffering in New Orleans's fetid Superdome. This brand of leadership was not the "compassionate conservatism" that had been sold in all those photo ops with African-American schoolchildren. This was callous conservatism, if not just plain mean.

It's the kind of conservatism that remains silent when Rush Limbaugh does a mocking impersonation of Michael J. Fox's Parkinson's symptoms to score partisan points. It's the kind of conservatism that talks of humane immigration reform but looks the other way when candidates demonize foreigners as predatory animals. It's the kind of conservatism that pays lip service to "tolerance" but stalls for days before taking down a campaign ad caricaturing an African-American candidate as a sexual magnet for white women.

This kind of politics is now officially out of fashion. Harold Ford did lose his race in Tennessee, but by less than three points in a region that has not sent a black man to the Senate since Reconstruction. Only 36 years old and hugely talented, he will rise again even as the last vestiges of Jim Crow tactics continue to fade and Willie Horton ads countenanced by a national political party join the Bush dynasty in history's dustbin.

Elsewhere, the 2006 returns more often than not confirmed that Americans, Republicans and Democrats alike, are far better people than this cynical White House takes them for. This election was not a rebuke merely of the reckless fiasco in Iraq but also of the divisive ideology that had come to define the Bush-Rove-DeLay era. This was the year that Americans said a decisive no to the politics of "macaca" just as firmly as they did to pre-emptive war and Congressional corruption.

For all of Mr. Limbaugh's supposed clout, his nasty efforts did not defeat the ballot measure supporting stem-cell research in his native state, Missouri. The measure squeaked through, helping the Democratic senatorial candidate knock out the Republican incumbent. (The other stem-cell advocates endorsed by Mr. Fox in campaign ads, in Maryland and Wisconsin, also won.) Arizona voters, despite their proximity to the Mexican border, defeated two of the crudest immigrant-bashing demagogues running for Congress, including one who ran an ad depicting immigrants menacing a JonBenet Ramsey look-alike. (Reasserting its Goldwater conservative roots, Arizona also appears to be the first state to reject an amendment banning same-sex marriage.) Nationwide, the Republican share of the Hispanic vote fell from 44 percent in 2004 to 29 percent this year. Hispanics aren't buying Mr. Bush's broken-Spanish shtick anymore; they saw that the president, despite his nuanced take on immigration, never stood up forcefully to the nativists in his own camp when it counted most, in an election year.

But for those who've been sickened by the Bush-Rove brand of politics, surely the happiest result of 2006 was saved for last: Jim Webb's ousting of Senator George Allen in Virginia. It is all too fitting that this race would be the one that put the Democrats over the top in the Senate. Mr. Allen was the slickest form of Bush-Rove conservative, complete with a strategist who'd helped orchestrate the Swift Boating of John Kerry. Mr. Allen was on a fast track to carry that banner into the White House once Mr. Bush was gone. His demise was so sudden and so unlikely that it seems like a fairy tale come true.

DOJ_NMG_0093030

As recently as April 2005, hard as it is to believe now, Mr. Allen was chosen in a National Journal survey of Beltway insiders as the most likely Republican presidential nominee in 2008. Political pros saw him as a cross between Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush whose "affable" conservatism and (contrived) good-old-boy persona were catnip to voters. His Senate campaign this year was a mere formality; he began with a double-digit lead.

That all ended famously on Aug. 11, when Mr. Allen, appearing before a crowd of white supporters in rural Virginia, insulted a 20-year-old Webb campaign worker of Indian descent who was tracking him with a video camera. After belittling the dark-skinned man as "macaca, or whatever his name is," Mr. Allen added, "Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia."

The moment became a signature cultural event of the political year because the Webb campaign posted the video clip on YouTube.com, the wildly popular site that most politicians, to their peril, had not yet heard about from their children. Unlike unedited bloggorhea, which can take longer to slog through than Old Media print, YouTube is all video snippets all the time; the one-minute macaca clip spread through the national body politic like a rabid virus. Nonetheless it took more than a week for Mr. Allen to recognize the magnitude of the problem and apologize to the object of his ridicule. Then he compounded the damage by making a fool of himself on camera once more, this time angrily denying what proved to be accurate speculation that his mother was a closeted Jew. It was a Mel Gibson meltdown that couldn't be blamed on the bottle.

Mr. Allen has a history of racial insensitivity. He used to display a Confederate flag in his living room and, bizarrely enough, a noose in his office for sentimental reasons that he could never satisfactorily explain. His defense in the macaca incident was that he had no idea that the word, the term for a genus of monkey, had any racial connotation. But even if he were telling the truth — even if Mr. Allen were not a racist — his non-macaca words were just as damning. "Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia" was unmistakably meant to demean the young man as an unwashed immigrant, whatever his race. It was a typical example of the us-versus-them stridency that has defined the truculent Bush-Rove fearmongering: you're either with us or you're a traitor, possibly with the terrorists.

As it happened, the "macaca" who provoked the senator's self-destruction, S. R. Sidarth, was not an immigrant but the son of immigrants. He was born in Washington's Virginia suburbs to well-off parents (his father is a mortgage broker) and is the high-achieving graduate of a magnet high school, a tournament chess player, a former intern for Joe Lieberman, a devoted member of his faith (Hindu) and, currently, a senior at the University of Virginia. He is even a football jock like Mr. Allen. In other words, he is an exemplary young American who didn't need to be "welcomed" to his native country by anyone. The Sidarths are typical of the families who have abetted the rapid growth of northern Virginia in recent years, much as immigrants have always built and renewed our nation. They, not Mr. Allen with his nostalgia for the Confederate "heritage," are America's future. It is indeed just such northern Virginians who have been tinting the once reliably red commonwealth purple.

Though the senator's behavior was toxic, the Bush-Rove establishment rewarded it. Its auxiliaries from talk radio, the blogosphere and the Wall Street Journal opinion page echoed the Allen campaign's complaint that the incident was inflated by the news media, especially The Washington Post. Once it became clear that Mr. Allen was in serious trouble, conservative pundits mainly faulted him for running an "awful campaign," not for being an awful person.

The macaca incident had resonance beyond Virginia not just because it was a hit on YouTube. It came to stand for 2006 as a whole because it was synergistic with a national Republican campaign that made a fetish of warning that a Congress run by Democrats would have committee chairmen who are black (Charles Rangel) or gay (Barney Frank), and a middle-aged woman not in the Stepford mold of Laura Bush as speaker. In this context, Mr. Allen's defeat was poetic justice: the perfect epitaph for an era in which Mr. Rove systematically exploited the narrowest prejudices of the Republican base, pitting Americans of differing identities in cockfights for power and profit, all in the name of "faith."

Perhaps the most interesting finding in the exit polls Tuesday was that the base did turn out for Mr. Rove: white evangelicals voted in roughly the same numbers as in 2004, and 71 percent of them voted Republican, hardly a mass desertion from the 78 percent of last time. But his party was routed anyway. It was the end of the road for the boy genius and his can't-miss strategy that Washington sycophants predicted could lead to a permanent Republican majority.

DOJ_NMG_0093031

What a week this was! Here's to the voters of both parties who drove a stake into the heart of our political darkness. If you'll forgive me for paraphrasing George Allen: Welcome back, everyone, to the world of real America.

A True Blue Libertarian (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

BOZEMAN, Mont. -- Stan Jones, a Montana libertarian widely known for his peculiar blue skin, can arguably be said to have recast the political complexion of the U.S. Senate, turning it from Republican red to the same color as his face.

That face, it should be noted, is not the dark blue of TV graphics that show where the Democratic Party increasingly holds sway. Nor is it the pale blue of the big Montana sky as autumn turns to winter. It is an ashen blue-gray, a flesh tone more suited to the undertaker's slab than the politician's stump.

In any case, this is what the 67-year-old candidate accomplished last Tuesday: He won 10,324 votes in the make-or-break Senate race in Montana, a contest that Democrat Jon Tester won by just 2,565 votes over three-term Republican incumbent Conrad Burns.

Jones is a quirkily conservative kind of libertarian -- opposed to abortion and same-sex marriage. So it can be argued that he took the bulk of his votes from the conservative Burns, which tipped the election to Tester, which tipped the Senate to the Democrats, which tipped the scales of U.S. political history.

"I'm tickled about that," said Jones. After some reflection, he added, "There is excitement for you to be talking to the guy who changed the country."

In the past, elections have given Jones little to be tickled about.

He is a perennial loser in Montana politics, a kind of Harold Stassen of the interior West, a fringe candidate who sometimes has to sue to get invited to television debates. He is also a man who accidentally turned his skin blue by drinking a homemade antibiotic laced with silver.

He first took the medicine in 1999, he said, fearing that the year 2000 would wreck computers, spread terrorism and disease, and make prescribed antibiotics unavailable. He concedes now that he miscalculated.

Jones granted an interview at the Leaf & Bean coffeehouse on Main Street in Bozeman and later at the nearby Academy of Cosmetology, where he sometimes gets cheap haircuts and where the fluorescent lighting brings out the blue in his face.

One of the students at the academy, Jessica Wagner, recalled that the first time she approached Jones to cut his hair, she caught a glimpse of him in a barber's chair and thought: "Oh, my God, he's dead." Over time, she said, she grew accustomed to his face and found him to be "really a neat guy."

Jones's excitement over the outcome of this election is substantially constrained by his contempt for Democrats and Republicans, for Tester and for Burns, and for the American political system, which he says has been ruined by big money.

Jones, it is safe to say, has not been ruined by big money.

He said he spent $1,652 on his campaign (the filing fee as Senate candidate), plus a few hundred dollars to buy gas to drive to the few campaign events that would allow him to speak.

"Republicans spend and borrow, Democrats tax and spend," said Jones, who said he quit being a Republican during the 1970s. "Whoever is in there -- the government grows and grows."

The one ray of light that Jones sees in the Democratic Party's takeover of the Senate and the House is a chance for increased scrutiny of President Bush, whom he fears. "This president is closer to a dictator than any we have had in history," said Jones, adding that the only president who could compare was Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Jones is pleased that Tester, the president of the Montana Senate and an organic farmer, beat Burns, but not because he likes anything about Tester. "I believes Burns is a pawn of Bush," Jones said.

There are Stan Jones skeptics in Montana who say that the eccentric libertarian may not have swung the election for the Democrats. Craig Wilson, a polling expert at Montana State University in Billings, said Jones was "really invisible" in the campaign and probably hurt Burns no more than Tester.

DOJ_NMG_0093032

But another longtime expert on Montana elections, Jerry W. Calvert, a professor of political science at Montana State University in Bozeman, said there is "no question" that Jones took votes from the incumbent. "The rule of thumb in Montana is that libertarians take votes disproportionately from Republicans," Calvert said.

Jones was born near Bozeman, the son of a poor dirt farmer, and graduated with a degree in general science from Montana State. He spent 28 years in the Air Force and Air Force Reserve, retiring as a lieutenant colonel.

During many of those years, he said, he was an administrative contracting officer, based in Seattle and buying aircraft and other hardware for the Air Force. He said he purchased several 747s from Boeing, three of which ended up in the Air Force One fleet.

Jones was married for 18 years to a Seattle woman. They had no children.

"When I retired and told my wife I wanted to go back to Bozeman and fight political corruption and get involved in politics, she decided to stay in Seattle," he said. "We split the sheets. It was an easy divorce. I gave her the house and the time-share in Hawaii."

It was the move back to Bozeman, Jones said, that caused his skin to turn blue. Using tap water in Seattle, he said, he had been making a "colloidal silver" antibiotic by charging two silver wires in a glass of water with an electric current.

But using the same technique in Bozeman, where the mineral content of tap water is much higher, the silver bonded with other elements in the water, and the resulting mixture gave Jones argyria. It is an extremely rare but relatively harmless condition that can permanently stain skin a bluish gray.

Jones said he was not aware that he had argyria until he participated in a televised debate as part of his failed 2002 campaign against Montana Sen. Max Baucus, a Democrat.

"After the debate," Jones recalled, "a reporter came up and asked me: 'Are you okay? Your face is really blue.' "

He sought medical advice, learned that his condition was not life-threatening and resumed his hopeless biennial campaigns against Montana big shots. Since 2000, he has run twice for governor and twice for the Senate.

Until the next Senate race rolls around in 2008, Jones said, he and some libertarian buddies are planning to place a series of initiatives on the state ballot to enforce the literal meaning of the U.S. Constitution.

"We plan to organize the constitution police," Jones said, breaking into a broad, bluish smile. "We are going to drive the secretary of state crazy."

Revolving Doors Spin Once Again (NYT)

By Aron Pilhofer

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

So it's the day after the election, and you've lost your seat in Congress.

What to do?

You might consider becoming a lobbyist. It is a well-traveled career path.

Last year, a study by the advocacy group Public Citizen found that 43 percent of the members of Congress who left office between 1998 and 2004 became lobbyists. That included half of the departing senators and 42 percent of the departing House members.

In a possible worrisome sign for Republicans who lost on Tuesday, the study found that the ex-lawmakers most likely to end up as lobbyists were those whose party held power.

Almost 52 percent of the Republicans who left Congress since 1998 registered to lobby, compared with 33 percent of the departing Democrats.

"This could reflect the fact that after George W. Bush became president, Washington became a hostile place for lobbyists whose contacts were Democratic," Public Citizen said.

Of course, Mr. Bush is still president, but control of Congress has now shifted to the Democrats for the first time since 1994.

Ex-lawmakers are prohibited from personally lobbying their former colleagues in the year after they have left office, the time span known as the "cooling off period."

But the Public Citizen study found that many were able to sidestep the restriction by supervising other lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0093033

In all, more than 280 former members of Congress registered as lobbyists at some point between 1998 and 2006, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, which monitors money, politics and influence in Washington.

And over all, about 12,000 registered lobbyists ply their trade there.

"The beltway here, it's like a magnetic field," said James A. Thurber, a professor of government at American University in Washington.

"After spending time in Washington," he said, former members of Congress "find it's hard to peddle their wares in Topeka, Kan."

The lobbying and trade associations that line K Street and its environs are girding for an avalanche of résumés. Some firms are already recruiting.

"We'll be looking for the best and the brightest," said Jennifer Dunn, a former Republican member of Congress from Washington State.

She retired in 2005, after 12 years in Congress, and joined DLA Piper, one of Washington's biggest lobbying firms.

Spitzer Buries His Cares For Weekend On The Sand (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SAN JUAN, P.R., Nov. 11 — Famous for his intensity, even his ferocity, Eliot Spitzer, the attorney general-turned-governor-elect of New York, is trying out a new persona: beach bum.

At a press briefing Saturday morning, Mr. Spitzer confessed to having taken a two-hour nap on the beach at a resort here on Friday and stated his intention of returning to the ocean in the afternoon.

As for the "enormous pile of memos on the budget" that he said he had brought with him, Mr. Spitzer said he planned "to bury them in the sand and read a B-level novel."

But no one would mistake Mr. Spitzer, a Democrat who won Tuesday's election by a landslide, for Jimmy Buffett.

As is his wont, Mr. Spitzer arrived at 9 a.m. on the dot for a breakfast meeting with Aníbal Acevedo Vilá, the governor of Puerto Rico, at La Fortaleza, the governor's residence. And though he did not wear a tie, his shirt was a decidedly nontropical blue check, under a navy blazer.

While the two men chatted about their days at law school and the spectacular views from the governor's windows, Mr. Spitzer said, they also discussed economic development and the implications of last week's Democratic sweep in Washington.

Mr. Spitzer's wife, Silda Wall Spitzer, and Luisa Gándara, the first lady of Puerto Rico, also attended.

Mr. Spitzer tackled some major issues at a brief news conference afterward. He referred to the war in Iraq as "an unfortunate quagmire," but said he had supported eliminating Saddam Hussein's threat to the international community.

He pledged to appoint Latinos to important posts in his administration but sidestepped a question about Puerto Rico's status. There is a longstanding debate in Puerto Rico, now a commonwealth, about seeking independence or statehood.

Asked about his inauguration, Mr. Spitzer he said he was not sure if he would seek private donations to pay for a celebration, as Gov. George E. Pataki did for his first swearing-in, in 1995. That practice has raised ethical questions in the past, Mr. Spitzer said, "and we're going to handle it in a very, very different way."

After the press conference, Mr. Spitzer acknowledged that his campaign for governor had not been as emotionally draining as it might have been. Polls had him far in the lead from the beginning, and he won by a 40-point margin on Tuesday.

Still, candidates can never really relax, he added, because problems can crop up unexpectedly.

"Look at Alan," he said, referring to Alan G. Hevesi, the state comptroller, who is under criminal investigation for his use of a government employee to chauffeur his wife. Mr. Hevesi was re-elected, but Mr. Spitzer may have to decide whether to try to remove him from office if the issue is not resolved by Jan. 1.

Before returning to New York, Mr. Spitzer appeared Saturday evening at a conference of the New York State Assembly Puerto Rican/Hispanic Task Force. In brief remarks that were mostly an opportunity for cheering and photographs, he thanked many people, saying, "The work is ahead of us."

Ehrlich Run Again "Unlikely" (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0093034

By Brian Witte

AP, November 11, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. said yesterday he does not plan to run for office again, after losing the gubernatorial election to Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley.

Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, said on WBAL's "Stateline with the Governor" radio show that the results of the election Tuesday indicated Maryland has moved "pretty hard left."

"Who's to say what's going to happen tomorrow or next week -- in four years -- but at this point, I have to say that a return to public life would be unlikely," he said.

Mr. O'Malley, a Democrat, defeated Mr. Ehrlich on Tuesday, winning about 53 percent of the vote to 46 percent for the incumbent.

Asked if he thought the loss of support for Republicans nationally hurt him, Mr. Ehrlich, 48, said when an incumbent is on the ballot "it's generally a referendum on the incumbent."

"For me, it was either rehire me or fire me, and we got fired," the governor said. "The bottom line here is that I think that the majority of folks in Maryland want Martin O'Malley as governor rather than Bob Ehrlich."

Mr. Ehrlich pointed to Democratic victories in other key offices in Maryland. Democrats held on to the U.S. Senate seat that's being vacated by retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin defeated Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele 55 percent to 44 percent.

Democrats also won the attorney general's race, with Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler defeating Frederick County State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle.

"If you look at the statewide elected officials today -- the folks coming into office -- you're compelled to the conclusion that the state is moving pretty hard left," Mr. Ehrlich said.

Mr. Ehrlich, who was the first Republican governor to be elected in Maryland since 1966, said his party still has significant support in Western and Southern Maryland, "but clearly, statewide, the direction in this state is pretty hard left, and it's going to be a very, very difficult thing for a right-of-center Republican Party to overcome."

Mr. Ehrlich said he was proud of his political career in Maryland, which spans about 20 years.

Feingold Rules Out 2008 Run For President (MJS)

By Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Russ Feingold will not seek his party's presidential nomination in 2008, the Wisconsin Democrat told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel on Saturday.

"I never got to that point where I'd rather be running around the country, running for president, than being a senator from Wisconsin," Feingold said in a phone interview from Madison.

Feingold, 53, conceded that he faced long odds of winning the nomination.

"It would have required the craziest combination of things in the history of American politics to make it work," he said.

But Feingold said waging an underdog campaign appealed to him. What didn't appeal to him, he said, was "the way in which this effort would dismantle both my professional life (in the Senate) and my personal life. I'm very happy right now."

Feingold had been publicly weighing a presidential bid since early 2005, forming a political action committee, traveling to key states such as New Hampshire and Iowa, and cultivating a more national constituency as an early and outspoken opponent of the Iraq war, the Patriot Act and other Bush administration policies.

The senator said Saturday that he went into that process with more of a predisposition against running than the other way around. Although Feingold's political activity pointed in many ways toward a run, he was not traveling, fund raising or organizing with quite the same intensity as some potential candidates.

"I began with the feeling I didn't really want to do this but was open to the possibility that getting around the country would make me want to do it. That never happened," he said.

"People have always portrayed me as ambitious. I'm not ashamed of that.

DOJ_NMG_0093035

"But I have never had a craving to be president of the United States. I used to say it when I was 5 or 7 years old. But I haven't really been saying it as an adult," said Feingold, who said he didn't rule out running in the future.

Feingold's thinking about the race crystallized in the last few weeks, he said. The Democratic takeover of Congress on Tuesday was a final factor because it added to the appeal of focusing entirely on his position in the Senate, he said.

Feingold is the second Democrat to seriously explore a campaign before opting out. Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced last month that he would not run.

Both went into the process as dark horses but showed signs of stirring interest among Democratic activists: Warner because of his centrist politics and success in a "red" state; Feingold because of his distinctive opposition in the Senate to a whole series of Bush policies highly unpopular with grass-roots Democrats, from the war to trade to wiretapping.

But Feingold confronted obvious obstacles. The potential field includes New York Sen. Hillary Clinton_the financial and political colossus in the party_former vice presidential candidate John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who has rapidly emerged as the Democrats' most celebrated political "fresh face."

At least four other Senate Democrats are considering a run. Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack declared last week.

Feingold said winning the party nomination would have been "very difficult," but he viewed himself as someone who could win a general election and his decision wasn't based on who else might run.

"This may sound immodest, but I thought, `I can do this. I can be the candidate, that rational, effective, presentable candidate for Democrats that would not be threatening, yet very progressive,' " Feingold said.

Feingold said he was not concerned about the personal scrutiny that comes with a presidential candidacy.

"I've been through three U.S. Senate campaigns. The people I've run against have not been pansies," said Feingold, referring to the aggressiveness of his opponents. "I feel like my life is an open book."

Feingold is single and twice divorced. He has two grown daughters. He said his family and friends were "mixed" in their reaction about his possible candidacy.

The third-term senator, whose best-known legislative accomplishment is the campaign reform law he wrote with Senate Republican John McCain of Arizona, said he wasn't bothered by the idea of being outspent.

"I know how to win those races_your weakness is your strength," he said. "I like to turn that around. `I'm the guy with no money.' . . . I'm not saying I think I would have been likely to win. But I saw a way to make this happen."

Asked about the Democratic field, Feingold made it clear he preferred a nominee who shared his views on the war.

"The first choice would be somebody who voted against this unfortunate Iraq war. That may not be available," said Feingold, who was the only Senate Democrat considering a run who voted against authorizing the use of force in Iraq.

"Second choice is somebody who at least said it was a bad idea. . . . I would be happy if Obama or (Al) Gore ran," said Feingold, who said he was not offering an endorsement.

Clinton, the presumed party front-runner, voted in 2002 to authorize force in Iraq. "Those who were there and came to the judgment the Iraq war was a good idea have to answer for some concerns I have about their judgment. That was a really bad judgment. I'm prepared to support a Democrat who voted for that war, but I think the American people would prefer a president who had the judgment to see it was not a good idea," he said.

Feingold sent an e-mail to supporters Saturday night announcing his decision.

In it, he said, "I'm sure a campaign for president would have been a great adventure and helpful in advancing a progressive agenda. . . .

"However, to put my family and all of my friends and supporters through such a process without having a very strong desire to run, seems inappropriate to me."

"I began with the feeling I didn't really want to do this but was open to the possibility that getting around the country would make me want to do it. That never happened."

Sen. Feingold Rules Out Run For President In 2008 (AP)

AP, November 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093036

MILWAUKEE, Wisconsin (AP) -- Sen. Russ Feingold has decided against seeking the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, saying he wants to focus on his work in the Senate.

In a letter posted on his political action committee's Web site, Feingold said he was excited that Tuesday's elections gave Democrats control of both chambers of Congress, giving them the chance to "undo much of the damage that one-party rule has done to America."

"We can actually advance progressive solutions to such major issues as guaranteed health care, dependence on oil and our unbalanced trade policies," he wrote.

Feingold, 53, told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel he realized he would be a long-shot candidate in a bid for the presidency.

He said running as an underdog appealed to him, but not the way it would "dismantle" his work in the Senate and his personal life.

An outspoken opponent of the Iraq war, the Patriot Act and other Bush administration policies, Feingold had formed his PAC, the Progressive Patriots Fund, and visited key presidential primary states such as Iowa and New Hampshire.

Still, he said he started the process more predisposed against a run than for it.

"I began with the feeling I didn't really want to do this but was open to the possibility that getting around the country would make me want to do it. That never happened," he told the newspaper in a story posted on its Web site late Saturday.

Feingold leaves a crowded field of possible Democratic candidates, including Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who announced his candidacy last week.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is widely considered the front-runner for the nomination.

Others considering or positioning themselves for a run include Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic nominee; former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the vice presidential nominee two years ago; Sens. Evan Bayh of Indiana, Joe Biden of Delaware and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced last month that he was bowing out of the race.

Feingold said he had come closer to making his decision in the past few weeks, and the final factor came when Democrats won both chambers of Congress because it provided added appeal to focus on work in the Senate.

Feingold spokesman Zach Lowe did not immediately return a telephone message from The Associated Press early Sunday seeking comment.

Now, The Tape Measure For Those Other Drapes (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SENATOR GEORGE ALLEN of Virginia had yet to hand back the Senate to the Democrats when Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa announced bright and early Thursday morning that he was running for president. Back in Washington, Senator John McCain of Arizona moved to set up his own presidential exploratory committee and prepared what aides promised would be two major speeches this Thursday about 2008, based on last Tuesday's vote. And Hillary Rodham Clinton scored the election-week cover of New York magazine; the subject was not her easy return to the Senate.

In some ways, the midterm election of 2006 was the first big event of the 2008 race — much like an early debate or an Iowa straw poll. It helped shake out and shake up the field. Some lessons were instantly apparent: you probably won't hear more talk of Republican candidates wrestling for the mantle of President Bush, and Democrats are looking hungrily at Ohio and Colorado, states that went Republican in 2004 and 2000. Here are some of the less obvious consequences for 2008, courtesy of 2006.

The Swing-Vote Math The White House won in 2002 and 2004 with a simple strategy pressed by Karl Rove: use hot-button issues and sophisticated organizational tools to turn out voters from the Republican base, calculating that there are enough of them to win. Well, maybe not. Swing independent voters — 26 percent of the electorate this year — voted 2-to-1 for Democrats last Tuesday, a big reason the Democrats will control the House next year.

Steve Schmidt, a Republican strategist who used to work for Mr. Rove and managed the re-election campaign of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, said Mr. Schwarzenegger's victory demonstrated the limits of a pump-up-the-base strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0093037

"People should look at what Schwarzenegger did," Mr. Schmidt said. "Candidates that have the ability to reach out and not be dividers are the ones who are going to be successful."

If true, this could complicate the early maneuverings of Mr. McCain and another Republican contender, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, both of whom have aggressively courted the party's conservative base as they follow a variation of Mr. Rove's politics.

Mr. Romney, eager to shed the baggage of being governor of one of the more liberal states in the nation, said he would press ahead in trumpeting his support for tax cuts and opposition to gay marriage.

"There will be people who will try to cast a thumping as supporting their agenda," Mr. Romney said in an interview. "I don't give that a lot of credence."

But Mr. McCain has embarked on a more complicated task, trying to appeal to conservative voters wary of his credentials while not scaring off independent voters who have been part of his own base.

"We have always felt you can appeal to your base and appeal to the broad center of the country at the same time," said John Weaver, a senior political adviser to Mr. McCain. In truth, Mr. McCain's efforts at appeasing both sides have not always been successful, so his speeches to conservatives about the lessons of 2008 should be interesting. He has faced the difficult challenge of trying to appeal at once to conservative voters who are powerful in Republican primary races without alienating independent voters who come into play in the general election.

A Redoubled Senate Curse Trying to run for the White House from the Senate has never been easy, because voting records are big fat targets for the opposition to research and exploit. Here's a new problem: the 51-49 split. Senators who are running for president are going to find themselves chained to their desks whenever a close vote comes up, ceding the advantage to the class of non-senators, like Mr. Romney, Mr. Vilsack and John Edwards, the Democratic former senator from North Carolina, not to mention leaving the door open to a surprise outsider.

"If you are a Democrat, are you going to explain to organized labor that the minimum wage lost by a single vote in the Senate because you were at the Polk County Fish Fry?" said Ron Klain, who worked as a senior adviser to Vice President Al Gore when he ran for president. "And if you are a Republican," Mr. Klain continued, "are you going to explain to the pro-life groups that federal funding for Medicaid abortions passed by a single vote because you were busy at the Greenville Chamber of Commerce? When I worked for Gore, we had a number of times we had to pull him off the campaign trail because of the risk of a tie vote on a key issue."

There are a lot of senators likely to run for president: Mrs. Clinton, Mr. McCain and Mr. Kerry, along with Evan Bayh of Indiana, Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware. Democrats at least have the advantage, albeit a small one, of heading committees or being able to pass legislation they can run on. Then again, the advantage vanishes if the new Congress, like the current one, is viewed as a failed one.

The War Albatross

If the war bedeviled the Democrats in 2004, it will be a problem for both sides this time — assuming, of course, that James Baker hasn't found a way to end it by the time the race is fully engaged. Mrs. Clinton has become more critical of the conflict than she was at its start, but Democratic primary voters have their litmus tests, and this is one of them. That is encouraging for Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, whose aides are now preparing a campaign plan should he run, given his antiwar credentials. It also presents an opening for Mr. Gore, who has been at the leading edge in opposing the war.

On the Republican side, Mr. McCain is in a unique position. He supports increasing troop strength in Iraq, a position shared by a scant 16 percent of the electorate, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll. The world might well be a very different place two years from now, but if the general election were being held today, Mr. McCain would certainly have a lot of straight talking to do, as he might put it.

A Flight From Washington Americans don't like Washington.

O.K., we knew that. But the intensity of that feeling is going to influence contributors and campaign workers as they try to figure out who the strongest candidates are. And it is influencing emerging candidates as they develop their image. "There's a growing sense that Washington can't get anything done," said Mark Warner, a Democrat and former Virginia governor who had considered running for president in 2008. "I think people's patience with elected officials is very thin at this point."

DOJ_NMG_0093038

This could provide an opening for outsiders like Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York. More intriguing, this anti-Washington, anti-partisan wave could provide the perfect environment for a renegade third-party candidate — say, Michael R. Bloomberg, Mr. Giuliani's successor in City Hall. Bloomberg associates have been pressing him to do precisely that.

It certainly does complicate things for anyone from Washington who is trying to run for president.

"They voted against Washington on Tuesday night," said Mr. Bayh, the Indiana senator. That explains why Mr. Bayh on the campaign trail is as likely to emphasize his years as governor as his years in the Senate, and why Mr. Edwards's decision to move out of Georgetown and back to North Carolina seems particularly well-advised this weekend.

Voted Most Likely Not to Succeed This is the most open presidential contest in at least 50 years, and as a result it has already drawn a rather large cast of aspirants. But the campaign of 2006 has, to put it mildly, clearly diminished the prospects of three once-big-name prospective candidates.

Mr. Allen leads the list. He ran a campaign that was marked by missteps, and he may well be remembered as the man who cost Republicans control of the Senate this year. That is not going to endear him to Republican activists or contributors.

Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, his party's contender in 2004, underlined doubts about his political skills when he told what he described as a botched joke, which President Bush pounced on and tried to portray as an insult to American troops. Mr. Kerry's associates said they were resigned to the fact that he would have headed the Democrats' blame list had they lost this time; at least he avoided that designation.

Finally, there's Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader who is retiring but who just last spring won a Republican straw poll in Memphis that he portrayed as a sign of his strength as a presidential contender. No more. A contentious Senate session that failed to produce much major legislation — followed by this loss — has led many Republicans to cross Mr. Frist off their 2008 list.

The Democrats: Is Winning Winning? (WP)

By Joe Trippi

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Wham! The 2006 midterm elections are over, and the modern conservative era has come to an end.

For the Democrats, a party so long on the outs, it feels good to be back in power. But we can't just revel in yesterday. Democrats have to start looking now to maximize our mandate for the 2008 presidential election.

Because what the voters have done is to kick open the door to a new era in American politics, and their hunger for a new direction didn't end last Tuesday. That's the problem for Arizona Sen. John McCain and what's left of the field vying for the GOP nomination. The Republican nominee will have a hard time trying to chart a new course for the nation while defending an unpopular lame-duck president and trying to breathe life into a conservative ideology that has run out of gas.

No, the real opportunity belongs to Democrats. The voters want change, and they will make it happen. I'm going to make one bold prediction about 2008: Thanks to changes in communications and technology, one of the candidates on my list will raise $500 million, almost all of it from ordinary citizens contributing less than $100 each. Don't believe it? Wait and see. It'll happen, and we'll witness the birth of a new progressive era that could last a generation or more.

So the party's presidential hopefuls won't be fighting just for the nomination, but for the historic chance to help launch that era. As they stand on the threshold of the presidential cycle, here's my assessment of the individual prospects of the many would-be presidents from a resurgent Democratic Party.

Front-runner: Hillary Rodham Clinton

She has it all -- the ability to raise the money; a political team that's among the best, if not the best, in the party; a strong base of support; and an uncanny ability to avoid political mistakes. And I don't care what anyone says -- her husband is one of two rock stars in the Democratic Party and a huge asset.

Ironically, the problem with Clinton's candidacy arises from her strength. Front-runners have something to lose, so they almost always run cautious, safe campaigns. This almost cost John Kerry the nomination in 2004, and could cost the senator from New York the nomination in 2008. Her strength also creates the certainty that a campaign of bold new ideas will emerge to oppose her. She is so strong within the party that, with so many contemplating a run against her, the only viable option for a serious challenger is to put forth innovative ideas in hopes of breaking out of the pack. And there are plenty in the Democratic Party who are capable of doing that.

DOJ_NMG_0093039

The "Other" Rock Star: Barack Obama

He's the one candidate who can wrestle Bill Clinton for support in the black community and win. All the others are both thrilled about and terrified of this guy. They're thrilled that he might take black votes from Hillary. They're terrified because he might take a lot more votes from them and become a co-front-runner the day he enters the race, if he does. Obama's obvious downside is inexperience. Three years ago, he was an Illinois state senator; in 2008, he will not have completed his first U.S. Senate term. So he had better have some ideas -- or wait till next time.

The Oxygen Taker: Al Gore

Talk about setting a progressive agenda with bold new ideas. The man is doing it and he doesn't even have a job. In a party that tends to treat its past nominees like lepers, Gore has done an amazing job of reemerging as an important thought leader on issues such as the Iraq war and global warming. If he throws his hat into the ring, he will immediately suck all the oxygen out of the room for most of the other candidates. The media won't be able to stop doing the Hillary vs. Al 800-pound-gorillas-go-at-it stories. Everyone but Obama will be reduced to begging for attention. But entering the race means he suddenly would have something to lose. Could candidate Gore stop himself from playing it safe?

The Champion of 2006: John Edwards

Hands down the guy who improved his position the most this year. Edwards leads the field in early polls in Iowa, which is more important than ever, because the 2008 nominating process is more front-loaded than in prior years. The former North Carolina senator has a bevy of ideas, and is the only Southerner, important to a party that has elected only two presidents in the past 30 years -- both from the South. All of which earns him a down arrow -- because once you take the lead in Iowa, the entire field tries to destroy you. Good luck.

Down but Not Out: John Kerry

The former presidential nominee was doing quite well until the "botched joke." Democratic losses in the House or Senate would have made a comeback impossible, so no one was happier than Kerry last Tuesday. The senator from Massachusetts is going to need to present some bold ideas to regain relevance in this field; I'd start with Iraq. And for those who want to count this guy out: He has come back from the dead before. Trust me, I speak from experience. Handicaps? It's all up from here or he's out.

Chairman of Foreign Relations: Joe Biden

The senator from Delaware is doing what Kerry should do: taking the lead on the Iraq war and staking out ideas for bringing our troops home safely. But the down arrow stays until someone gets this guy to shut up and listen.

Running to the Right: Evan Bayh

A senator who has actually run a government, the former governor of Indiana also hails from the region that may be most critical to a Democratic electoral victory -- the Midwest. In 2004, Democrats lost Missouri and Ohio, electoral votes that would have put Kerry over the top. Bayh could be the best bet for picking up three or four Midwestern states. He seems to be running to Clinton's right, which will prove to be either pure genius (he has a lane all to himself) or a disaster -- ask President Joe Lieberman.

The One to Watch: Russ Feingold

Perhaps the most authentic candidate, the senator from Wisconsin has a deep connection to the grass roots and is a favorite of the party's progressive wing. If President Bush stays stubborn on Iraq and the rest of the field plays it safe, Feingold could get very hot.

AR?sum? to Die For: Bill Richardson

He'd be the first Hispanic to make a presidential run, and his r?sum? covers nearly every issue, foreign or domestic. Need bold ideas on immigration? New Mexico Gov. Richardson has grappled with that. Ideas on energy? Ask former energy secretary Richardson. How to deal with a nuclear North Korea? Former U.N. ambassador Richardson knows the turf. But can he raise the money, and earn enough early support to get his ideas into the mix?

The General: Wesley Clark

DOJ_NMG_0093040

He still has a strong following among progressives and the netroots and could get traction if there's no consensus on a new Iraq strategy soon.

More Than a Cameo: Tom Vilsack

I thought the Iowa governor's candidacy was a cameo until I saw him speak at Renaissance Weekend last year. He clearly gets that this will be an election about ideas. Vilsack will have a tough fight -- but I'm the last guy to bet against a governor from a small rural state.

So there they are, the leading contenders (and there'll surely be more). To get the chance to lead the nation in meeting the challenges of the next decade -- globalization, energy, health care, terrorism -- the winner will need to break out of the ideological box and stop defending the ideas of the past. Gore or Bayh could run a campaign like that and possibly pass a cautious Clinton to win. But if Clinton or Obama runs such a campaign, the 2008 election could be even more historic than the wave of change we witnessed last Tuesday.

Is America Too Racist For Barack? Too Sexist For Hillary? (WP)

By Benjamin Wallace-Wells

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

The 2006 elections were for the technocrats and the operatives, pitting the Democratic tacticians against the Karl Rove machine. But the next election is already beginning to look quite different: 2008 may be one for the novelists.

Viewers of the election returns late on Tuesday, after all, got an early start on the iconography of the next presidential race. The cable networks' cameras cut between Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, thanking her supporters for an overwhelming victory in the New York Senate race, her husband standing pointedly behind, and a smiling Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, giving cautious, professorial analysis to the television viewers. Nobody noted the significance, but it stared us all in the face: The two presumed leading contenders for the Democratic presidential nomination are a woman and an African American.

Their candidacies -- coming after elections resulting in the presumed first female speaker of the House and the second black governor since Reconstruction -- suggest that the next elections may play in ways that are more cultural and symbolic than tactical and political. Are Americans ready to put a black man or a woman in charge of the country? And does the hefty symbolism that Obama and Clinton would bring help one of them more than the other -- in other words, is the country more racist or more sexist?

Democracies are awkward like this. Despite incessant polling, we really get only one moment every two years, at best, to measure how Americans feel about things, and these elections must stand as imperfect proxies for a mess of subjects: what we think about religion, whether we like being included in the international conversation, whether Northeast bluebloods would tolerate a Texan as their leader.

But when it comes to race and sex, this seems a slightly more legitimate game: The question that remains for black Americans and women isn't whether prejudice has diffused to the point that they can participate in the United States, it's whether they can legitimately hope to lead it.

Today, they may have reasons to be optimistic. Poll numbers for Clinton and Obama are among the strongest of any presidential hopefuls. It now seems nearly as common for political leaders in television shows and movies to be women or racial minorities as white men. Recent polls have found that the percentages of Americans who say they would not vote for a hypothetical black or female presidential candidate, long formidable, have dwindled into the single digits. And last Tuesday's elections put House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on the brink of becoming speaker and Democrat Deval Patrick, who is black, in the Massachusetts governorship.

But as the two would-be presidential candidates grapple with how to manage the legacies of their own identities, Obama seems engaged with a more problematic political feeling. Even if race is more socially crippling than gender -- even if it was less likely that Obama would make it to Harvard Law than that Clinton would make it to Yale Law -- the symbolism of race can also be awfully empowering to individual politicians who learn to harness it. Most Americans want to believe that the culture has moved past its racial problems, and that the symbol of that progress would be widely cheered. Compared with Clinton, says George Lakoff, a linguistics professor and Democratic message guru, "Obama clearly has it better."

DOJ_NMG_0093041

Whatever racism remains in this country, it coexists with a galloping desire to put that old race stuff behind us, to have a national Goodbye to All That moment. The most recent such occasion was Obama's much-publicized tour to promote his book of policy prescriptions, "The Audacity of Hope." The Denver Post called him a "rock star," the Seattle Times found him "electrifying," and even the Deseret News in Salt Lake City described the "raucous greeting" he received in Utah. This rapture wasn't only because of what Obama has said; most of his audiences had not heard much from him or read much of his book. It was because he symbolizes the possibility of a more modern America.

Clinton had a best-selling autobiography and a media-heavy book tour, too, but the coverage had less to do with the symbolism she carried as a woman than with her history as Bill Clinton's wife, and with the way she was positioning herself for the future. There are many reasons for this difference, but one critical one has to do with the legacies of oppression that each inherits. While many Americans have a sincere sense of sentimentality and nostalgia for what Clinton may consider outdated gender roles, a much smaller number have that kind of feeling for racial segregation. There is the sense that, by electing a female president, the nation would be meeting a standard set by other liberal democracies; the election of a black man, by contrast, would be a particularly American achievement, an affirmation of American ideals and a celebration of American circumstances.

Obama's mixed-race heritage is rarely far from his political conversation. He writes of having a Kansan mother "as white as milk," and a Kenyan father "as black as pitch." He has used his race explicitly while speaking in Africa and urging politicians there to move beyond tribalism, and implicitly while speaking in southern Illinois to punctuate an address about the challenges of globalization. In his speeches, Obama uses his simple presence as an establishment national political figure who is black to serve as a metaphorical exclamation point -- a visual assurance that the country can work for everyone.

This is how he used it in his most famous speech, at the 2004 Democratic National Convention: "I stand here today, grateful for the diversity of my heritage, aware that my parents' dreams live on in my two precious daughters. I stand here knowing that my story is part of the larger American story, that I owe a debt to all of those who came before me, and that, in no other country on Earth, is my story even possible."

When Clinton gives a speech, her gender is just as evident, but she doesn't give it nearly the same kind of rhetorical prominence. She is as likely to talk about handing out buttons for Republican Barry Goldwater as a child as about what her presence as a political woman means for the country. Her most famous speech during the current political cycle dealt with a topic close to her own identity: In January 2005, she gave a widely praised talk to a group of New York state family-planning providers, telling them that the pro-choice movement had failed to acknowledge the great emotional cost involved in having an abortion. For Clinton, a hero to many women who support abortion rights, this was regarded as a particularly brave stance.

But in a speech about such a personal topic, what is most noteworthy is its impersonality. Clinton didn't mention her own experiences as a wife or a mother, but seized upon a trip she took to Romania as first lady, where she learned about the policies of the dictatorship of Nicolae Ceausescu, who tried to force every woman to have five children for the glory of the state, subjecting them to monthly roundups and reproductive exams attended by the secret police. It's a striking story, but what's even more striking is the way Clinton introduced it: "My own views of family planning and reproductive rights are heavily influenced by my travels as first lady," she said. This is not only the kind of thing that Sen. Joe Biden might say, but it also sounds suspicious: Were Clinton's views on these issues not fully formed before she began traveling as first lady?

The contrast is vivid in the two senators' autobiographies. Obama's, "Dreams From My Father," is an attempt to explain his evolving political awareness as a direct articulation of his roots. Here is the way Clinton begins her life story, "Living History": "I wasn't born a first lady or a senator. I wasn't born a Democrat. I wasn't born a lawyer or an advocate for women's rights and human rights. I wasn't born a wife or a mother."

Part of this difference is simple personal style. And there's also the matter of learned political behavior: Clinton has spent a decade and a half being beaten up, often personally and viciously, for the intersection of her gender and her politics, and it would make sense if she were trying to disconnect the two. But there is something else here.

The political progress of women and African Americans has long been intertwined; the suffragette movement gained huge momentum from the complaint that black men had received the right to vote before women of any race. But when it comes to modern political leadership, women have become more present. In January, the Senate will have 16 women and one African American, while eight women and one African American will be governors. Geraldine Ferraro was a vice presidential running mate more than 20 years ago, and still no black politician has reached that plateau.

DOJ_NMG_0093042

Gender, meanwhile, may have become part of the political wallpaper. When Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. and Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele ran for Senate this fall, their race was mentioned in virtually every story; when Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Claire McCaskill ran, their gender was barely noted. The ferocity of national feelings about race can still be threatening; this election cycle saw the widely condemned race-baiting ads run against Ford in Tennessee. But if the nation feels its racial sins more clearly, it also has a more urgent desire to get past them. "I think gender has become more normal in leadership," said Marie Wilson, president of the White House Project, a New York nonprofit that works to develop female leaders with the goal of having a woman in the White House. "Race is a much more troubling, sadder, unresolved part of our history than the issue of gender, so it certainly looms larger."

Of course, the civil rights and women's rights movements of the 1960s have left vastly different legacies. No political figure would dare deny the saintliness of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.; Betty Friedan's name is a political dirty word. Repression of blacks was the stuff of massive state-leveraged cruelty -- the police dogs and fire hoses -- while repression of women in this country was made of quieter stuff: bras, aprons and constitutional amendments.

Obama is frequently called post-racial, the suggestion being that because he has an exotic background, Americans are looking at a newer model of a human. The metaphor works for Obama politically, because it contains the idea that his youth lets him create a more modern and inclusive brand of politics than the rhetoric of civil rights-era politicians such as Jesse Jackson. Clinton's Jesse Jacksons are Ferraro, who bombed, and Pelosi, who is still hanging around.

This is the ultimate imbalance between the would-be presidential contenders, and it's both rough on Clinton and helps explain why Obama's public presentation is so much more closely linked to his identity: There's a model for being post-racial, but there's no easy way to be post-gender.

Fredrick Harris, a political scientist at the University of Rochester, sees a post-gender future out there, and its name is Condoleezza Rice. The secretary of state, he notes, "is unmarried, has no children, is completely dedicated to her job, for pleasure she plays the piano and works and that's about it."

Clinton has made different choices, but they have their limits. Politically, she has done everything that Obama has done: She has become a serious policy professional, moved toward the center and renounced the excesses of 1960s-style identity politics. And yet these moves are received as the tacks of a smart politician. For Obama, they are received as the arrival of his race.

Benjamin Wallace-Wells writes on national affairs for Rolling Stone.

Life Expectancy Increases For H.I.V. Patients (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

ATLANTA, Nov. 11 (AP) — An American found to have the virus that causes AIDS can expect to live for about 24 years on average, and the cost of health care over that time is more than $600,000, new research indicates.

Both life expectancy and the cost of care have risen from earlier estimates, mainly because of expensive and effective drug therapies, said Dr. Bruce Schackman, an assistant professor of public health at the Weill Medical College of Cornell University in New York and the study's lead author.

The research found the average annual cost of care was $25,200, about 40 percent higher than a commonly cited estimate from the late 1990s. A 1993 estimate of life expectancy for a symptomless person infected with H.I.V. was less than seven years.

The new study appears in the November edition of the peer-reviewed journal Medical Care.

Since the mid-1990s, about two dozen H.I.V.-fighting antiretroviral drugs have come onto the market that have essentially turned the virus from a death sentence into a chronic disease.

Physicians now understand life expectancy after H.I.V. diagnosis to be two decades or more, and the new study supports that belief.

DOJ_NMG_0093043

The researchers drew most of their data from 18 medical practices across the United States that provide care for 14,000 patients. The researchers looked at the records of about 7,000 of those patients.

They used a computer simulation model to project H.I.V. medical care costs and concluded that the average lifetime cost of care was $618,000 per person. The researchers estimated the monthly cost of care at $2,100, with about two-thirds of that spent on medications. That equates to $25,200 a year.

A typical regimen for an H.I.V. patient beginning treatment includes the drug efavirenz, which blocks a certain protein that H.I.V. needs to make copies of itself. It also includes tenofovir and emtricitabine or some similar drug that helps keep the virus from reproducing.

The monthly cost just for that regimen was about $1,140 in 2004, Dr. Schackman and the other researchers said. If that treatment does not work or stops working, the patient is switched to more expensive arrays of drugs.

In their cost estimates, the researchers aimed high, basing their numbers on the best available drugs and the best standards of care. But that is not always what is provided, some H.I.V. policy experts noted.

For example, a 2003 federal study concluded that only 55 percent of H.I.V. patients who should have been on virus-fighting medications were actually getting them.

“This is really an optimistic scenario” in the study, and the true cost is probably lower, said Jennifer Kates, director of H.I.V. policy for the Kaiser Family Foundation.

However, Ms. Kates added that since people living with H.I.V. should be getting optimal care from doctors experienced in treating the virus, the study’s expectations were reasonable.

Memorial Planners Have A Dream, Too (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Ground will be broken in many ways tomorrow morning with a ceremony heralding construction of the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial on the Mall.

The memorial, scheduled to be completed in 2008, will mark a change in the very character of some of America's most hallowed real estate.

The Mall is lined with memorials to wars and the soldiers who died in them and marble monuments to great presidents. But this addition to Washington's monumental core will be a unique paean to the man and the ideal that it honors -- a civilian and an African American who embodied the American tradition of peaceful protest and activism.

"I think, like many kids, I came to D.C. years ago and saw all the monuments," said Harry E. Johnson Sr., president of the Washington, D.C. Martin Luther King, Jr. National Memorial Project Foundation Inc. "But there never was a memorial to a man of color, a man of peace.

"And even today, there is nothing to place King in the proper historical context. He is among the giants of our country, though he was not a war hero nor a president," Johnson added.

Tomorrow's groundbreaking ceremony is expected to draw 5,000 people. It will feature former president Bill Clinton, who signed the 1996 bill authorizing the memorial. Talk show host Oprah Winfrey and poet Maya Angelou also will speak.

They will gather at the sweeping four-acre site along the Tidal Basin that sits halfway between monuments to Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, and Lincoln, liberator of slaves. The crescent-shaped memorial park will be near the steps leading to the Lincoln Memorial, where King gave his electrifying "I Have a Dream" speech in 1963.

Cranes and backhoes won't move in immediately, however. This groundbreaking is ceremonial, and the construction permits from either the secretary of the Interior or the General Services Administration will be issued once fundraising is complete. In the case of the World War II Memorial, permits were issued two months after the groundbreaking ceremony attended by about 10,000 people on Veterans Day 2000.

The design of the memorial park is the physical articulation of one of the most famous and powerful passages in King's 1963 Washington speech.

DOJ_NMG_0093044

After outlining the dream of his children growing up to live in a nation where people are judged by the content of their character, where even in the racist South black and white children would join hands as sisters and brothers, he added:

"This hope is our hope. This is the faith that I go back to the South with. And with this faith, we will be able to hew out of the mountain of despair a stone of hope. With this faith we will be able to work together, to pray together, to struggle together, to go to jail together, to stand up for freedom together, knowing that we will be free one day."

At the memorial to King's vision, visitors will enter through a 12-foot-wide cut in the wall, walking through a tall, dark passage symbolizing the Mountain of Despair.

Once visitors pass through the portal, the view of the Tidal Basin's waters and ring of trees will unfold. The giant stone piece removed from the wall to create the opening will be in the middle of the plaza. King's image will be sculpted from it, emerging from the rough-hewn Stone of Hope.

The design team is working on plans to create waterfalls that will flow in a syncopated rhythm reflecting King's oratory style, cascading over a wall engraved with his words.

The design, created by the ROMA Design Group of San Francisco, has had an unusually warm reception since it was unveiled in 2000, compared with the harsh criticism that stalled other contemporary memorials.

Many considered the Vietnam Veterans Memorial too modern and abstract when it was introduced in 1981. The World War II Memorial was called too large and complicated for such a prominent spot on the Mall when construction began in 2001.

The King Memorial's design has received resounding kudos.

"It's very elegant and simple and moving," Thomas Luebke, secretary of the U.S. Commission of Fine Arts, said. "It's interesting that on part of the Mall, there is a theme developing. It is less about war and more about ideas and aspirations."

The prominent site was authorized by Congress in 1998. Its place was secured even after Congress passed the Reserve Act of 2003 forbidding further construction in the core of the Mall. The King Memorial is likely to be one of the last giant monuments to furnish the nation's front yard.

The biggest obstacle the memorial has faced is money. And that's part of the message its backers will send during tomorrow's ceremonial groundbreaking.

They have raised almost two-thirds of the $100 million needed to build. Efforts have been beset by delays.

"The fundraising is difficult, period," Johnson said. "There is always something else looking for attention of the donors. There was 9/11, then the tsunami, then Hurricane Katrina."

In 2001, the foundation struggled with King's family, which wanted a fee for the use of the slain civil right's leaders name. An agreement was eventually reached and no fee paid.

But the delay pushed the foundation up against the December 2003 deadline imposed by Congress to complete the monument, and it had to apply for an extension.

Supporters of the memorial would like to finish fundraising before the eventual construction of the National Museum of African American Culture and History, slated for Constitution Avenue and 14th Street NW on the Mall. It will be tapping much of the same donor base that the King memorial is targeting.

"We want to be out of the way before the museum starts up, so there's no competition for donations," Johnson said. "We're accepting donations, from $1 on up. If only everyone in America gave us $1."

The System Worked (WP)

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

AN ESTIMATED 83 million Americans voted in last week's elections. Some people encountered difficulties, but not of the scale or scope that had been predicted by Election Day doomsayers. Overall the voting system worked.

Because the vote of every person is so important, problems are not to be minimized. It is unconscionable that some Prince George's County voters had to wait in line for four hours to vote. It is disturbing that Virginia election officials received reports of people being given incorrect information in an apparent effort to intimidate them not to vote. Balky voting machines, faulty software and disputes over whether voters were properly registered cropped up across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0093045

Local and national election officials must focus on these problems as they assess their election night performance so that further improvements can be made. By the same token, the politicians and critics of electronic voting who tried to undermine public confidence should be mindful that the chaos they predicted did not occur. They should be responsible in their future suggestions for change.

No one denies there are shortcomings. The generational decline in voter turnout is more reason than ever to figure out better ways to encourage voting. Is early voting a good idea? Should Election Day be a national holiday? How about adopting Oregon's system of voting by mail? All are ideas worthy of consideration, but let's not fool with parts of the process that aren't broken.

A key here is the public's belief that the votes they cast will be counted. That confidence was reflected in national exit polls showing that 88 percent of Americans trust the system. More telling, though, was the way the nation accepted without question the outcome of two razor-thin contests that decided which party was going to control the U.S. Senate.

Let Naturalized Americans Run For President (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

ON TUESDAY, CITIZENS in an electoral-vote-rich state reelected a governor who had once seemed in danger of defeat. That sort of political resurrection ordinarily would be good for a mention or two in the endless speculation about 2008 presidential candidates. Unfortunately, this reelected governor can forget about aspiring to the highest office in the land.

Why? Because the governor, though eligible to administer a major state of the union, is barred from the White House by Article II, Section 1 of the U.S. Constitution, which says: "No person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President."

A reflection of the framers' worries about meddling in the new nation's affairs by European monarchies, this restriction makes no sense in the 21st century, when even opponents of legalizing undocumented aliens acknowledge that this is a nation of immigrants. It's insulting that a legal immigrant to the U.S. who has twice won election as governor cannot aspire to the presidency.

The Constitution shouldn't be amended lightly. But this is a matter of principle: a core principle about the equality of opportunity in our society to strive for the highest office. Congress and state legislatures should adopt a 28th Amendment to the Constitution that would put all citizens 35 and older on equal footing when it comes to the highest office in the land. Americans should be free to decide whether they want to be led by President Jennifer Granholm.

Gotcha! Who'd you think we were talking about? Jennifer Granholm, a naturalized American who was born in Canada, was reelected governor of Michigan on Tuesday. Were you perhaps thinking of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger?

In this nation of immigrants, there will always be individuals affected by this arcane discrimination, and the urgency to address the matter should not be dampened by partisan concerns that it may help one candidate or another. Indeed, it would be nice to see California Democrats spearhead the movement, even if it could theoretically benefit our Austrian-born governor.

If Americans wanted Schwarzenegger in the White House, the fact that he is a naturalized citizen (who no doubt appreciates his earned U.S. citizenship a lot more than many people born here) is no reason to deprive them of that choice.

The requirement that the president be a "natural born" citizen excludes not only immigrants who came here as adults or teenagers but also every infant adopted from abroad who will remember no other homeland but the United States. And it sends them a message that, regardless of anything else they feel or do in their lifetime, they can't really be full, trustworthy Americans.

Congress has taken some of the sting out of the "natural born" requirement, enacting legislation that makes it clear that some children born of Americans living abroad are more "natural" than others. But to excise the "natural born" requirement entirely will require a constitutional amendment, and that means approval by two-thirds of the House and Senate and three-fourths of the states. Congress should at least hold hearings on this proposal.

It's admittedly an uphill battle. Polls show little support for such an amendment. But a campaign on its behalf (featuring such notable foreign-born Americans as Michael J. Fox, former Intel Chief Executive Andy Grove, Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright) would strive to correct a historical wrong and would serve as the perfect antidote to the acrimonious debate surrounding illegal immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0093046

The Corporate End Run (NYT)

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

Corporate profits are at record levels. The Dow, too, has climbed past its high-water mark from the dot-com era. Executives reap bigger and bigger paydays, even as wages have stagnated. Meanwhile, the widening investigation into stock-option backdating reminds us that the corporate malfeasance era was much more than just a couple of bad apples like Enron and WorldCom.

It seems almost unbelievable, then, that corporate America would pick this moment to beg for relaxed regulation and enforcement, as well as more protection from investors' lawsuits. But as Stephen Labaton reported recently in The Times, industry groups are seeking broad new protections for corporations and accounting firms, not through legislation but from the Bush administration through agency rule changes.

The rationale is that the high cost of complying with the corporate governance law, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, along with runaway lawsuits have scared foreign companies away from American stock exchanges. The timing is particularly odd given that the compliance costs associated with the much-reviled Section 404 of Sarbanes-Oxley — which requires audits of companies' internal financial controls — fell last year, as did the number of investor lawsuits, for the second year in a row.

What has actually happened is that opponents of regulation believe that the coast is clear. The law's namesakes, Paul Sarbanes and Michael Oxley, are retiring. Kenneth Lay of Enron is dead. The time appears ripe for rollbacks.

Advocates of big business like to point to a sharp decline in the United States' share of global initial stock offerings between 2000 and 2005, hoping that everyone will infer that the cause was the passage of Sarbanes-Oxley in 2002. In fact, that share had been declining since 1996, even before the Asian financial crisis. It hit bottom in 2001 and has risen since.

United States markets lost their dominance of initial stock offerings for numerous reasons that had little to do with regulation. Some of last year's biggest deals were Chinese and French privatizations. Markets elsewhere are bigger and more liquid than they once were. There are also intangibles, such as America's recent unpopularity, increased barriers for visa seekers and extraordinary budget and trade deficits, which might make an issuer think twice about a dollar-denominated stock.

The London Stock Exchange, one of the leading beneficiaries of the American decline, commissioned a study showing that underwriting fees in London are just 3 percent to 4 percent of a transaction, compared with an average of 6.5 percent to 7 percent in the United States.

When workers confront globalization, they are told to adapt, take their pink slips and go to night school. It is the harsh downside of an integrated world economy that has on balance significantly enriched the country. When financiers feel the pinch from competition in Hong Kong and London, they run to the Bush administration for rule changes.

America's investor protections and corporate regulations have made it a nation of share owners, with almost 57 million American households owning stocks either directly or through mutual funds. The Securities and Exchange Commission has already signaled that it will smooth the implementation of Sarbanes-Oxley, especially for smaller companies. And abuses of the private litigation system like pay-to-play should be stopped. There is room for reform. But over all, the system is working. It may need tweaks, but it does not need a revamping.

U.S. Vetoes Security Council Resolution Assailing Israel For Attacks (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 11 — The United States vetoed a Security Council resolution on Saturday that condemned Israel for its military actions in Gaza and called for an immediate withdrawal of Israeli forces from the area.

The United States ambassador, John R. Bolton, told the Council that the resolution "does not display an even-handed characterization of the recent events in Gaza, nor does it advance the cause of Israeli-Palestinian peace."

The resolution, introduced by Qatar, the Arab representative on the Council, had been amended during two days of negotiations to meet objections that it was not balanced. But Mr. Bolton said it remained "in many places biased against Israel and politically motivated."

DOJ_NMG_0093047

In the vote, 4 countries abstained — Britain, Denmark, Japan and Slovakia — and 10 were in favor — Argentina, China, Congo, France, Ghana, Greece, Peru, Russia, Qatar and Tanzania.

The original draft had made no mention of Palestinian rocket strikes into Israel and accused Israel of conducting a "massacre" of civilians in its attack at Beit Hanun on Wednesday that killed 18 civilians.

New language was inserted condemning the firing of rockets from Gaza into Israel and calling upon the Palestinian Authority to take "immediate and sustained action" to end the rocket fire. But while the resolution named Israel as liable for the attacks on Gaza, it was silent on who or what group was responsible for the attacks on Israel.

In other changes, a reference to "indiscriminate" Israeli violence became "disproportionate" violence, and the words "military assault," "aggression" and "massacre" were dropped in favor of the general phrase "military operations."

Another provision had proposed that a new United Nations observer force be sent into the area to monitor a cease-fire, but it was substituted with language suggested by France that called for the creation of "an international mechanism for the protection of civilians."

Mr. Bolton said the United States considered this "a promise which is unwise and unnecessary and which, at any rate, raises false hopes."

The resolution that was voted on requested that Secretary General Kofi Annan establish a fact-finding mission to investigate Wednesday's attack and report back within 30 days and called for the resumption of international efforts to achieve peace by the so-called quartet — the United Nations, the European Union, Russia and the United States.

Israel has apologized for the deaths at Beit Hanun, blaming a "technical error," and has announced its own investigation of the episode. But it has said it will continue to try to stop militants from launching rockets into Israel from Gaza.

The United States traditionally opposes what it considers one-sided Security Council resolutions on Israel, and Saturday's vote was the fourth time in three years that Washington had taken such action.

In July the United States vetoed another resolution on Gaza; in March 2004 it vetoed a resolution condemning Israel for killing the Hamas leader, Sheik Ahmed Yassin; and in December 2003 it blocked a measure protesting the construction of the Israeli separation barrier in the West Bank.

Almost all of the 45 nations that spoke during a daylong debate on the Middle East on Thursday condemned Israel. Arab nations are now expected to move for a vote in the 192-member General Assembly, a path they have followed in the past when such measures have failed to pass the Security Council.

Unlike Security Council resolutions, those passed in the General Assembly are nonbinding and largely symbolic. But they generally attract widespread support when Israel, and, by extension, the United States, are the targets.

Jean-Marc de la Sablière, the French ambassador, said he felt the final negotiated text was "a balanced one" and would have sent the right message to both Israel and the Palestinians. He added, "I hope that the fact this text has not been adopted will not renew tensions on the ground."

U.S. Vetoes Condemnation Of Gaza Strikes (AP)

By Justin Bergman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 12, 2006

The United States vetoed a U.N. Security Council draft resolution Saturday that sought to condemn an Israeli military offensive in the Gaza Strip and demand Israeli troops pull out of the territory.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said the Arab-backed draft resolution was "biased against Israel and politically motivated."

"This resolution does not display an evenhanded characterization of the recent events in Gaza, nor does it advance the cause of Israeli-Palestinian peace to which we aspire and for which we are working assiduously," he told the Security Council.

The veto unleashed a flurry of criticism in the Middle East.

"This decision by the U.S. government gives unlimited cover to commit more massacres of innocent Palestinians," said Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government. "This is a shame on the American administration, which says it is trying to promote human rights and democracy in the Middle East."

DOJ_NMG_0093048

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, however, the draft resolution would have aggravated the situation in Gaza because it contained "inflammatory and unnecessary language."

"We do not believe the resolution was designed to contribute to the cause of peace," she said in a statement.

In Jerusalem, Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev agreed the draft was one-sided. "It's good that it wasn't accepted by the Security Council," he said.

The draft received 10 votes in favor and four abstentions, along with the U.S. vote against. Britain, Denmark, Japan and Slovakia all abstained. The U.S. is one of five permanent members of the council that have the power to veto resolutions.

It was the second U.S. veto this year of a Security Council draft resolution concerning Israeli military operations in Gaza. The U.S. blocked action on a document this summer after Israel launched its offensive in response to the capture of an Israeli soldier by Hamas-linked Palestinian militants.

Palestinians strengthened calls for Security Council action after an early morning Israeli artillery barrage in the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun killed 19 people Wednesday.

In an open session of the General Assembly on Thursday, Palestinian U.N. observer Riyad Mansour called the attack "state terrorism" and said the perpetrators should be held accountable under international law for war crimes.

Israel has expressed regret for the loss of life in Beit Hanoun but said it will continue operations to stop militants from launching rockets into Israel. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is scheduled to visit Washington on Sunday to meet with President Bush.

Qatar's U.N. Ambassador Nassir Al-Nasser warned in the Security Council meeting that the failure of the body to act on the draft would lead to more Israeli violence against Palestinians.

"Any lukewarm reaction or response on our part gives the impression we are shirking from our humanitarian responsibilities," said Al-Nasser, who sponsored the resolution on behalf of the Palestinians. Qatar is the only Arab nation on the council.

Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa said the veto "will only increase the anger" toward Israel, and Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit accused the Security Council of "turning a blind eye to Israeli acts in Gaza."

The Arab League was planning to hold an emergency meeting of foreign ministers in Cairo, Egypt, on Sunday to decide how to respond the latest Israeli offensive.

The draft resolution had been weakened slightly in recent days to help improve its chances of passage. A section was added demanding the Palestinian Authority take immediate action to bring an end to violence, including the firing of rockets into Israel.

It also called for the U.N. secretary-general to establish a "fact-finding mission" to probe Wednesday's attack in Beit Hanoun, a step below ordering a full investigation.

In addition, it backed off calls for U.N. observers to be placed on the Gaza-Israel border, asking instead for the "possible establishment of an international mechanism for protection of the civilian populations."

In his remarks to the Security Council, Bolton said the draft was still too one-sided. He said it compared legal Israeli military operations with the firing of rockets into Israel — an act of terrorism. He called the fact-finding mission unnecessary and said the text failed to condemn the ruling Hamas party's refusal to renounce terrorism.

Both Bolton and Deputy British Ambassador Karen Pierce voiced support for returning to the internationally backed "road map" peace plan, which has been stalled for years.

But Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at The Brookings Institution, said the fact that the council allowed the draft to go to a vote showed the world's frustration with the U.S. not involving other members of the so-called Quartet of Mideast mediators in recent decisions on Israel. The other members are the U.N., the European Union and Russia.

"They don't have a stake in the talks and they are more willing now to force our hand," he said. "A lot of times the world has felt (the U.S.) has been too pro-Israel, but in this case, people are just fed up."

Associated Press Writer Omar Sinan contributed to this report from Cairo, Egypt.

Hamas Official: Unity Gov't Deal Near (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0093049

By Albert Aji, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 12, 2006

A senior Hamas official said that a deal on forming a Palestinian national unity government was near, adding that an agreement on a new prime minister has been reached.

"There is some progress on this issue and in the next days, God willing, the remaining outstanding issues will be resolved," Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy leader of Hamas' political bureau in Syria, said in a telephone interview late Friday with The Associated Press.

He spoke following talks in Damascus with Farouk Kaddoumi, the head of the Palestine Liberation Organization's political wing.

Abu Marzouk said Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas officials have agreed on a candidate for the Palestinian prime minister, but declined to disclose the candidate's name, saying: "It will be disclosed at the suitable time."

Abbas said Saturday from the West Bank that he hoped to form a coalition government with the Islamic Hamas party by the end of the month.

"I tell my people that we have achieved great progress on the way to forming a national unity government that can end the siege and open the horizons for political solutions that will end the occupation forever," Abbas said at a ceremony marking two years since the death of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Tens of thousands of Palestinians converged on Arafat's gravesite in a rally that also appeared aimed at reinvigorating his faltering Fatah Party.

Fatah bused in Palestinians from across the West Bank for the event, dropping many of them in the center of Ramallah — the Palestinians' de facto capital. Carrying Fatah banners and pictures of Arafat, they marched through the city to the compound that served as the late leader's headquarters.

Top Palestinian officials laid wreaths at the glass shrine atop Arafat's grave inside the compound and read verses from the Quran, the Muslim holy book, while crowds filled the nearby courtyard. A massive picture of Arafat stood nearby.

Meanwhile, thousands of Palestinian students in the West Bank and Gaza Strip returned to school Saturday after a two-month teachers strike.

Clamoring into school buildings that stood empty during the strike, small children and teenagers greeted their classmates with excitement.

Some 40,000 teachers launched the strike at the start of the school year in September, protesting the Hamas-led government's failure to pay their salaries since it came to power in March. International sanctions have made it largely impossible for the Hamas government to pay its 165,000 civil servants, causing widespread hardship in the West Bank and Gaza.

The Hamas-run Education Ministry vowed earlier in the week to begin paying teachers, and scraped together enough cash to pay them a partial salary.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Friday he would be willing to sacrifice his job if the international community would lift economic sanctions that have crippled his Hamas-led government.

His statement was the latest indication that the Hamas was nearing a deal to form a national unity government with Abbas' moderate Fatah Party that would be made up of independent experts.

"All the measures undertaken by Hamas aim at breaking the siege on the Palestinian people, otherwise there would be no need for (government) change," Abu Marzouk said.

Kaddoumi, who had held talks in Damascus with Khaled Mashaal, head of Hamas' political bureau, said before leaving Damascus late Friday for Iran that talks over the formation of the government have achieved progress.

"But there are still some details that need to be worked out," he told reporters in Damascus.

Talks Collapse In Lebanon As Shiites Vacate The Cabinet (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093050

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 11 — Lebanon was thrown into a political crisis Saturday when talks broke down over giving the militant faction Hezbollah and its political allies greater control of the government. Almost immediately, cabinet ministers from the group and the other main Shiite party resigned.

Lebanon's political leaders have held talks for four days, trying to defuse tensions among the various government factions after Hezbollah demanded a greater role in the cabinet and called for its alliance to have veto power over all government decisions. Hezbollah was politically emboldened after its 34-day war with Israel this summer, and it quickly pressed for more power.

Though for days it appeared the talks were headed toward a compromise, the negotiations collapsed when Hezbollah refused to relinquish its demand for a veto, people in the talks said. When the governing coalition refused, the talks collapsed, and within three hours the political brinksmanship began with all of the Shiite ministers resigning.

Under the accord that ended the civil war, called the Taif Agreement and signed in 1989, the government must include members from all the country's main sects. With the departure of the Shiites, it now becomes an interim government with the authority only to handle day-to-day management of the country.

"It is an escalation," said Hilal Khashan, a professor of political science at American University of Beirut. "They are telling them they are willing to stage confrontations."

Lebanon's political stability, and the success or failure of the sitting government, is not just consequential for this country of four million. It is part of a broader contest between the United States, which backs the government coalition, and Iran and Syria, which support Hezbollah.

One of the crucial decisions coming up, and one that cannot be addressed by an interim government, is whether to approve a law to participate in an international tribunal on the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister. The investigation into the killing has implicated Syrian officials. And on Friday, the United Nations Security Council presented Lebanon with a draft proposal for a framework of a tribunal to pursue the case.

"The reason behind the resignation is the international tribunal," said Akram Chehayeb, a member of Parliament who belongs to the governing coalition, adding that the pro-Syrian parties had hoped Russia would have altered the proposal to their liking.

In a joint statement, the two main Shiite parties, Amal and Hezbollah, said their ministers had resigned because the government had entered the talks with conditions.

"We will not go along with anything that we are not convinced with and would damage the higher national interest," the statement said.

Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, had threatened to stage street demonstrations aimed at bringing down the American-backed government if his alliance's demands for greater power were not met by Monday. After the talks collapsed, Sheik Nasrallah's deputy, Sheik Naim Qassem, said at a news conference that his group would study what happened and might decide to demonstrate.

"What we are going to do is study very carefully what happened today, and we will take the appropriate decision," Mr. Qassem said. "Either we will wait with little patience, to give a chance for the talks to come up with a result if such a chance is available, or we will discuss with our allies the program of our protests, which will be wide, God willing."

Not longer after, the ministers resigned, and officials from the governing coalition were saying that if Hezbollah took to the streets, its supporters might as well.

Shortly after talks began, it appeared that the sides would be able to find a compromise. One proposal was to bring Hezbollah's main ally, the Free Patriotic Movement, into the government without granting veto power. One particular fear among members of the governing coalition was that with veto power, Hezbollah could paralyze the government and block the adoption of the international tribunal.

Former President Amine Gemayel, leader of the small Christian Phalange party, said Saturday that the mood in the room during the negotiations was "cold, very cold." He said that the governing coalition was adamant about not giving Hezbollah the one-third plus one seats it would need for veto power. "They are still insisting on having the third of the government," Mr. Gemayel said Saturday after leaving the negotiations. “It is a way in fact to control completely the government and the very existence of the government.”

DOJ_NMG_0093051

Hezbollah Quits Lebanese Cabinet (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

BEIRUT, Nov. 11 -- Cabinet ministers from Hezbollah and an allied party resigned Saturday, a decision that could cost the Western-backed government crucial support from Lebanon's Shiite Muslims.

Prime Minister Fouad Siniora said he would not accept the resignations. He has the authority to order the five cabinet ministers to stay on, but it was unclear if his weak government could enforce the demand.

The resignations are not enough to bring down Siniora's government -- eight cabinet ministers must resign for the government to collapse -- but they could cost him support among Shiites, the majority sect in Lebanon, and make it difficult for him to govern.

The ministers of Hezbollah and the allied Amal party resigned because talks on forming a national unity government collapsed hours earlier, Hezbollah said in a statement broadcast by its al-Manar television station. Hezbollah accused the government of insisting on "imposing terms and premature results for negotiations," the TV station said.

Hezbollah, a Shiite militia that is by far the strongest political and military force in Lebanon, has been demanding at least one-third of the seats in the 24-member cabinet for itself and its allies. That would give them veto power over key decisions and the power to bring down the government if they disagreed with a decision.

The governing majority, which succeeded in forcing Syria to withdraw its army from Lebanon last year, is not willing to relinquish full control.

Syria ended its 29-year military presence in Lebanon after international pressure and mass protests that followed the 2005 assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in Beirut. A U.N. investigation implicated top Syrian officials in the killing, but Syria has denied any role.

Russian Foreign Minister Hopeful About Nuclear Talks With Iran (AP)

AP, November 12, 2006

MOSCOW — Russia's foreign minister said Saturday that he believed international talks with Iran over its atomic program were still possible, maintaining that Russia could help bridge differences with other negotiating partners, including the United States.

President Vladimir V. Putin met Saturday with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, ending two days of talks that signaled a renewed push by Moscow to persuade Tehran to freeze its uranium enrichment effort. Iran, however, has so far snubbed Moscow's proposal to host its enrichment program.

Larijani remained defiant after the first round of meetings Friday, saying Tehran would push ahead with its nuclear program, and suggesting it could break off ties with the U.N. nuclear watchdog if the world inflicted punishments proposed by European nations.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov said his country would continue efforts to bring Iran back to negotiations with Germany and the five permanent members of the Security Council — the U.S., Britain, China, France and Russia.

"We will push for our common goal — the resumption of talks with six nations," Lavrov said in a statement after Putin's meeting with Larijani. "We think it's possible, if there is goodwill, to find a mutually acceptable basis for the resumption of talks on the basis of the proposals of the six and Iran's response to them."

U.S., Pyongyang Officials May Meet Soon, Report Says (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

TOKYO (AP) -- The United States and North Korea may hold talks in New York as early as this week aimed at working toward the resumption of six-nation discussions on Pyongyang's nuclear program, a newspaper reported yesterday.

Citing unidentified sources familiar with U.S.-North Korea affairs, Japan's Mainichi newspaper reported that officials from the two countries will discuss, among other issues, financial sanctions imposed on North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0093052

Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, said he was not aware of any plans for a meeting. A State Department spokesman, Kurtis Cooper, said he could not comment on the report.

Last year, Washington claimed that Banco Delta Asia SARL -- a bank in the Chinese territory of Macao -- was being used by North Korea for money-laundering activities. The Bush administration banned transactions between the bank and American financial institutions.

Earlier this month, the State Department said North Korea would get a chance to seek access to its frozen overseas bank accounts when the six-nation negotiations resume.

North Korea agreed to return to the talks -- involving the two Koreas, the United States, China, Japan and Russia -- following its test of a nuclear weapon on Oct. 9, a move that triggered international outrage and economic sanctions. No date has yet been set for their resumption.

North Korea, which claims its nuclear ambitions are aimed at deterring U.S. attacks, has boycotted the nuclear talks since November 2005 when the U.S. Treasury Department imposed economic sanctions on the country.

U.S. and North Korean officials had a direct meeting in Beijing on Oct. 31, which the North said at the time led to their decision to return to the six-nation talks.

Meanwhile, top South Korean officials yesterday decided against fully participating in a U.S.-led program to stop and search ships in international waters to prevent the movement of weapons of mass destruction, a press report stated.

Washington has said it wants South Korea to expand its participation in the Proliferation Security Initiative following the North's nuclear test and a U.N. Security Council resolution banning weapons trade with the North.

South Korea has only been an observer to the program out of concern its direct participation in stopping and searching North Korean ships could lead to armed clashes with its volatile neighbor.

The decision yesterday will become official after a formal government review process and a report to President Roh Moo-hyun, Yonhap news agency reported, citing unidentified participants in the session involving Prime Minister Han Myung-sook, key security officials and ruling party leaders.

Nicaragua's Ortega Vows Close U.S. Ties (AP)

By Traci Carl, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 12, 2006

Daniel Ortega returns to Nicaragua's presidency a shadow of the fiery revolutionary who in Cold War times vowed an endless fight against a U.S. government determined to overthrow him.

Balding, weakened by heart trouble and often appearing almost docile, he now preaches reconciliation and stability, and promises to maintain close ties with the U.S. and the veterans of the Contra army it trained and armed against him.

He has traded his wartime military fatigues for a white shirt and jeans. His guide, he says, is God, not Karl Marx.

The United States and his rivals worry the Sandinista revolutionary in him will resurface, as Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and Cuban leader Fidel Castro welcome him into a club of leftist leaders fighting American dominance in the region.

But Ortega, who was president in 1985-90, the height of the Contra insurgency, says he has traded war for peace, love and consensus.

His victory speech late Wednesday was tinged with some of his old fire. Raising his arms in victory, he led thousands in a rendition of an old revolutionary song: "The people united will never be divided."

He promoted socialist ideals such as free education and medical care, lambasted U.S. Republicans for the war in Iraq and thanked other leftist Latin American leaders for their support. But most of his speech was dedicated to praising democracy and reaching out to opponents.

"Don't let one criticism slip from your lips against those who didn't vote for us," he warned his supporters. "We have to be humble."

Ortega, who turned 61 Saturday and takes office Jan. 10, has been careful not to sound triumphalist. Even though his strong lead over Harvard-educated banker Eduardo Montealegre was clear soon after Sunday's election, he waited two full days for Montealegre to concede defeat before declaring victory.

DOJ_NMG_0093053

His speeches have focused on reassuring skeptics that he plans no radical changes and will embrace free trade, job creation and close U.S. ties.

On Saturday, Ortega said his Cabinet ministers will be named by the people — not himself — and he had asked local representatives to send him proposals for candidates. He vowed that half of his top officials would be women and he would include people who didn't vote for him.

He also promised more than 1,000 Sandinista peasant leaders that the government would buy land for people who need it, which they could pay for "little by little even if it is with a sack of corn."

Perhaps the biggest sign that Ortega has changed is his vice president, Jaime Morales.

Shortly after the Sandinistas ousted dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979, Morales' wife came home to find Ortega's wife, Rosario Murillo, occupying her house and wearing the family's clothes and jewelry. Morales spent years fighting for restitution.

Recently, he got it: Ortega returned works of art, a desk that was a family heirloom, and other things.

Shortly after, Morales agreed to run as his vice president, saying he preferred "the strange to the unknown."

"We agreed on peace 18 years ago, and it's time to heal that wound," Morales told The Associated Press. "Maybe together we can get people to forgive and forget and move on."

He said the next five years will be nothing like Ortega's first regime, when state economic control was so heavy that people lined up for rationed food and hungry farmers could be jailed for butchering their own cows without permission.

"Daniel Ortega knows he made a lot of mistakes," Morales said. "He's honestly regretful."

Ortega's mistakes will haunt his new administration.

Leaders of the country's Miskito Indians have accused him of genocide for forcing thousands to relocate during the U.S.-backed Contra civil war. He has apologized for moving them, but denies genocide.

On Thursday, the Permanent Commission on Human Rights, an independent Nicaraguan body, said it would push the genocide case against Ortega throughout his administration.

Ortega's stepdaughter, Zoilamerica Narvaez, says he molested her for years, starting when she was 13, and often speaks against him publicly. Ortega and his wife both deny it, alleging Narvaez is mentally unstable.

Remembering the Sandinista closure of opposition media, some worry Ortega will not keep his promise to respect media rights. During his campaign, he rarely spoke to news media he believed tied to the United States, and refused to take part in a campaign debate sponsored by U.S.-based CNN en Espanol.

In his third failed run for president, in 2001, when reconciliation was the watchword, he actually waved a U.S. flag on stage. Yet celebrating May Day 2005 in Cuba, he referred to Americans in a speech as "the enemies of humanity."

Maricela Ortega, a 43-year-old store saleswoman, says she believes the president-elect is a different man.

The previous Ortega "was a dictator," she said. "But from what I've seen so far, he's no longer a rebel."

His wife Murillo, who is also his campaign manager, decides whom he talks to and is always at his side. Cartoons show her manipulating Ortega like a puppet.

Dissident Sandinistas say he has become too conservative, as well as opportunistic in his alliances — for instance by joining forces with his opponents to push legislation through Congress that effectively weakened the then president, Enrique Bolanos.

Now he will replace outgoing Bolanos in that diminished presidential role, and must work with an opposition-dominated Congress.

More than ever, Ortega will need the support of his former enemies, and they have pledged to keep him in check.

U.S. State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos says cooperation with Ortega and his government will be "based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future."

"We want to have a close, respectful relationship with the United States," Vice-President Morales said. "That doesn't mean we will always agree with the U.S. But it also doesn't mean we are an enemy."

Associated Press Writer Filadelfo Aleman contributed to this report.

Former Contras Bemoan Ortega's Return To Power In Nicaragua (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0093054

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

SAN BENITO, Nicaragua -- As a young insurgent fighting to overturn Nicaragua's Marxist-led Sandinista revolution during the 1980s, Mart?n Laguna chose the alias "Comandante Amargura," Spanish for "Commander Bitterness," to protest his suffering at the hands of a government that had gunned down his father and confiscated his family's cattle ranch.

But 16 years after the Sandinistas' fall ushered in a new era of democracy in Nicaragua, Laguna's old code name seems just as apt.

Official promises to compensate him for the expropriated property never came through, so he has joined about 100 other former fighters squatting in flimsy shacks on this desolate plain outside the capital, Managua.

Jobs are scarce, so he feeds his four children by scavenging for firewood to sell by the highway.

And as if those humiliations weren't enough, last week Daniel Ortega, the Sandinista leader whom Laguna risked his life to overthrow, won back the presidency through a democratic election.

"I can't believe it," Laguna, a stocky man of 52, said disgustedly in a recent interview inside his home of sticks and plastic tarp. "After all these years, our enemy is going to have power over us once more. I never, never imagined this would happen."

A week after divisions among his opponents enabled Ortega, 61, to eke out a victory with less than 40 percent of the vote, Nicaraguans of all political stripes are still reeling. But perhaps none feel more personally affronted than the surviving foot soldiers of the U.S.-funded anti-Sandinista force, known as contras. Through a controversial, decade-long campaign of ambushes and sabotage, the contras, estimated to number as high as 12,000 at their peak, helped pressure Ortega into holding elections in 1990 in which voters swept him from office.

Now some former contras view Ortega's return in almost apocalyptic terms. Although Ortega cast himself as the candidate of "reconciliation," Laguna's neighbor, Leiva Ram?rez, a petite woman with dark, intense eyes, predicted that it is only a matter of time before he reinstates unpopular policies of his previous 11-year rule, such as expropriating property, rationing food and jailing dissenters.

"But we won't surrender to him!" shouted Ram?rez, 39, as her voice began to shake with emotion. "If we have to, we'll go back to the mountains where we are strong and fight again. Better to die in battle than to stay here and be killed off one by one."

Other former contra fighters interviewed were more sanguine, arguing that Ortega has probably mellowed over the years. Their concern was that his victory would embolden his more radical supporters to harass former contra fighters in the many urban neighborhoods and rural villages across Nicaragua where old foes now live side by side.

Eighty miles north of the San Benito encampment, in the remote mountain village of La Lima, Efra?m Subalbarro, 42, said that Sandinista activists had already twice stopped by his house in the middle of the night.

"They pulled up in a truck and stood outside shouting obscenities and threats for about half an hour. It was very tense," said Subalbarro, a short, muscular man who commanded 45 fighters during the contra war.

But perhaps most upsetting to the former contra fighters is the notion that Ortega's victory could represent the final step in the contras' long descent into political irrelevance.

"We were the ones who gave Nicaraguans their democracy, and now we've been totally abandoned," said Subalbarro, who said he watched two younger brothers die in battle. "It's like we don't matter anymore."

The contras' loss of clout is at least partly due to their lack of coherence to begin with. Armed, trained and largely run by the CIA, the insurgency was dominated at its top tier by former members of the notoriously brutal National Guard that propped up dictator Anastasio Somoza until the Sandinistas deposed him in their 1979 revolution. A diverse group of civilian leaders, among them prominent business figures and former Sandinistas disenchanted with Ortega's rule, offered the contras a more palatable public face but exercised little power behind the scenes.

The rank and file, meanwhile, was filled mainly by peasants from the north and Miskito Indians from the Atlantic coast, many of them women and teenagers. They chafed under Sandinista rules that favored agricultural cooperatives, and resented the presence of Cuban doctors and teachers promoting an atheistic worldview.

After Ortega's loss in 1990, most of the contra civilian leadership joined anti-Ortega factions that have coalesced and divided and coalesced again in a dizzying series of alliances. Among the more surprising twists in this contretemps was the decision this year by Jaime Morales -- a former banker and contra negotiator whose home Ortega occupied after the 1979 revolution -- to run for vice president on Ortega's ticket.

DOJ_NMG_0093055

A small cadre of contra fighters did establish a party, known as the Nicaraguan Resistance Party, dedicated to representing former contra combatants. But it has been beset by frequent internal squabbles, the most recent of which erupted in September when the party's president, Salvador Talavera, infuriated many members by signing a public "peace agreement" with Ortega.

Such moves at the top have only compounded the disillusionment felt by many lower-ranking former contras over the level of assistance they have received from democratic administrations that succeeded Ortega.

After years of fighting, many had lost their lands to the Sandinistas. Others like Subalbarro, whose family was able to keep its cattle ranch in the northern state of Jinotega, felt it was unsafe to return. "Everybody there knows what operations you were responsible for, and there may be those who want to take their revenge," he said.

Violeta Chamorro, who defeated Ortega in the 1990 presidential election, originally promised to grant each demobilized contra either 50 manzanas of land, about 86 acres, on which to raise cattle or 15 manzanas, about 26 acres, for crops. But that commitment was based on estimates that put the contra force at 5,000, noted Alfonso Sandino, a former contra spokesman who heads the government agency in charge of compensating demobilized combatants. When 22,000 came forward claiming to be former contras, "it was clear that the original commitment was totally unrealistic. Nicaragua just doesn't have sufficient land to fulfill it," Sandino said.

Furious, small groups of contras rearmed and staged violent protests several times during the early 1990s, at one point occupying the Colombian Embassy in Managua. Each time, the crisis was soothed with more government promises.

Today, Sandino said, about 90 percent of former contra fighters have received some land -- albeit in smaller parcels than originally envisioned. The distribution, however, was haphazard, and contras' families often did not receive title to the new land, just vague permission to relocate there.

That has caused serious difficulties for Claudia Pe?a, 35, who moved onto a government-granted patch in the northern department of Matagalpa seven years ago.

Soon afterward, local Indians made a competing claim against the property and began grazing cattle there. Without a title, Pe?a and her husband have been unable to defend their claim to the land.

"We're supposed to have eight manzanas of land," she said. "But the truth is, we're only able to raise crops on about one."

One of her young sons sat on the ground nearby, watching her with a pinched expression. He's hungry, she explained, but there wasn't going to be enough for dinner that night. Instead, she said, "I'll give the children water to take away their appetite."

When she was asked whether this was the future she imagined back when she was fighting in Nicaragua's northern jungles, Pe?a's eyes filled with tears.

"No. We wanted peace so we could have a chance at a decent living," she answered. "This is not what I was fighting for."

Two U.N. Peacekeepers Killed In Haiti (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) -- Two U.N. peacekeepers from Jordan were shot to death in Haiti's capital after coming under attack by gunmen, U.N. officials said Saturday.

Jordan's official Petra news agency reported the two soldiers were attacked Saturday morning while on patrol in Port-au-Prince, the capital. But a United Nations police spokesman in Haiti, Fred Blaze, said preliminary reports indicate they were killed Friday night.

Blaze said the soldiers came under attack in the Sonapi section of the capital near Cite Soleil, a slum where well-armed street gangs blamed for kidnappings are based. The deputy U.N. mission chief in Haiti, David Wimhurst, confirmed the deaths but declined to give details.

Jordanian government spokesman Nasser Judeh identified the soldiers as 1st Lt. Ahmad Mohammed Hassan Ba'irat and Cpl. Rami Wasif Taha Al Mohammed.

The U.N. peacekeeping force has been stepping up patrols to quell violence in the Caribbean nation's dense slums. But there is growing opposition among poor slum dwellers to the Brazil-led U.N. force, sent to restore order after a bloody February 2004 revolt ousted then President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. They have accused U.N. troops of firing indiscriminately during gunbattles with gangsters, killing and wounding civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0093056

The U.N. denies peacekeepers open fire indiscriminately and says they only shoot when attacked. No overall civilian casualty figures were available.

In recent days, students and slum dwellers have staged street protests calling for the U.N. force's withdrawal.

Jordan has about 1,500 troops in the force of some 8,800 peacekeepers. Nine peacekeepers have been killed since the force arrived in June 2004.

The latest attack marked the bloodiest day for the blue-helmeted force in nearly a year. In December, a Jordanian soldier was shot to death while patrolling Cite Soleil.

Facing Reality On Europe's Immigrants (NYT)

By David C. Unger

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

"Write an article!" came the shout as I left a room full of German women preparing the food for their weekly breakfast discussion meeting in the Rollberg housing project in the Neukölln section of Berlin.

They were Germans now, but most had been born elsewhere, generally in Muslim countries. One wore a head scarf, the others did not. The youngest looked about 19. The oldest might have been a grandmother.

These women illustrated a reality finally accepted by some of Germany's most conservative politicians — there is no reason someone cannot be German and Muslim at the same time. In America, that idea would be unremarkable. In Germany, with its tragic history of exclusive nationalism and race-based citizenship, it is an intellectual revolution.

The moving spirit behind these meetings was Ayten Köse, an infectiously enthusiastic woman of Turkish descent, who relished telling a visitor what it had taken to make this project a reality.

The weekly breakfasts were among the activities of an outreach program sponsored by the local government and the European Union. One goal is to help the project's residents connect with one another and with local public services. That, in turn, is meant to reduce the sense of isolation many immigrants feel from the larger society they live in and from its political institutions.

Through this program, residents had gotten help in ridding public rooms in the housing project of the intimidating young toughs who hung out there, discouraging women from leaving their apartments. That reclaimed space became home to the Friday breakfast gatherings, where the women compared notes on problems from domestic violence to developments in Afghanistan, Gaza and Iraq.

It took a long time for Germany's leaders to wake up to the fact that millions of foreign-born or foreign-descended residents — people who originally arrived as guest workers or asylum seekers, along with their German-born children and grandchildren — intend to live their lives in Germany with no plans of returning to their ancestral homelands.

More than three million of these new Germans are Muslims — nearly two million from Turkey, with most of the rest from Bosnia, Albania, the Arab world, Pakistan and Iran.

It is in Germany's interest to help these newcomers succeed and prosper, by helping them improve their German language skills, preparing them for better jobs and smoothing their path to German citizenship. That lessens the risk of their slipping into an underground world of isolation, joblessness and despair, where they might fall prey to terrorist recruiters.

The new realism of its politicians is welcome, but Germany has a long way to go. Immigrants still face violent attacks from xenophobic neighbors and the discriminatory attitudes and practices of some local governments. Despite recent reforms, it remains too difficult for many long-time residents to become citizens.

Yet, despite its shortcomings, Germany's new approach contrasts favorably with that of neighboring France — the home of Western Europe's largest and perhaps least integrated Muslim population.

French policies have been confounded, paradoxically, by the country's militantly integrationist official ideology. The well-meaning insistence that all French citizens are simply French has led to decades of willfully ignoring the particular needs and diverse cultures of distinctive segments of the French population.

DOJ_NMG_0093057

The poor and unemployed young men who burned cars in suburban neighborhoods last fall weren't protesting the noble French ideal of égalité. They were protesting the daily humiliation of coping with police officers, politicians and employers who have no real idea of what their lives are like and no desire to find out. It is that kind of estrangement that German programs like the one in Neukölln are trying to avoid.

Voters Were Not The Only People To Notice Scandals (NYT)

By Mark A. Stein

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

Fed up with corruption? No wonder. It is getting worse.

Transparency International, a private antibribery group in Berlin, released its annual corruption perceptions index, which gauges how people view the honesty of public officials in 163 countries.

Perhaps unsurprisingly, Iraq's reputation suffered this year. So did those of Brazil, Cuba, Israel, Jordan, Laos, Algeria and — er — the United States. America fell three spots, to tie for 20th with Chile and Belgium.

The pecuniary relationships that Jack Abramoff and other lobbyists had with certain members of Congress apparently took a toll on the country's reputation.

And a substantial number of voters cited corruption as a factor in their decision in the midterm election last week.

But there is another side to the problem: the countries that pay graft to foreigners.

Transparency International uses this "supply side" of corruption to rank countries on a "bribe-payers index." Here, the United States does better. It tied — again, with Belgium — in ninth place.

DOJ_NMG_0093058

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Posada A Target Of New Federal Probes (MH) ... 3
FBI Destroyed Evidence As 'Routine' Matter (MH) ... 5
Why The FBI Is Coming After Me (WP) ... 5
Suspects' Treatment Secret (FREEP/MCT) ... 7

Homeland Response:
Frustration Grows At Carousel As More Baggage Goes Astray (NYT) ... 8

War News:
Panel May Have Few Good Options To Offer (WP) ... 10
Blair To Address Iraq Study Group (WP) ... 11
A Consensus On Iraq (WP) ... 12
Talking About Iraq (NYT) ... 13
Right Vision, Wrong Policy -- And A Mideast Price To Pay (WP) 14
Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 33 In Baghdad, As Police Search For 50 Kidnap Victims (AP) ... 15
Iraqi Sunnis Kill 10 Shiites, Kidnap 50 Others (AP) ... 15
Sectarian Rifts Foretell Pitfalls Of Iraqi Troops' Taking Control (NYT) ... 16
In Gates Selection, White House Hopes To Close Rift Between State And Defense (NYT) ... 19
Bush Swaps Idealists For Realists (BBC) ... 21
Gates Struggled Through The Iran-Contra Scandal (AP) ... 22
How (Not) To Run The Pentagon (WP) ... 23
The Donald Rumsfeld I Know (WP) ... 23
Rumsfeld's Self-inflicted Wounds (LAT) ... 25
Now What? (NYT) ... 26
Rumsfeld Was My Squash Partner (LAT) ... 28
Top Commander In Iraq Says U.S. Won't Abandon Its Mission (LAT) ... 28
U.S. Offers Reward For Help In Finding Missing Soldier (NYT) .. 29
Dissenting Officer Faces Court-martial (LAT) ... 30
Democrats Aim To Save Inquiry On Work In Iraq (NYT) ... 31
Despite Billions Spent, Rebuilding Incomplete (WP) ... 33
Democrats And Iraq (NYT) ... 35
Anti-corruption Official In Iraq Accused Of Fraud (LAT) ... 35
Could A New Strongman Help? (NYT) ... 36
Romania Vows Not To 'Abandon' Iraq (AP) ... 38
Steering His Nation Without A Rudder (LAT) ... 38

Corporate Scandals:
Shower Curtain Sold Separately (NYT) ... 43

Criminal Law:
More Subpoenas In Menendez Probe (NSL) ... 44
FBI Probes May Target Congress (MCT) ... 44
Death Penalty Sought In Hawai'i Case (HONADV) ... 46

Civil Rights:
Decision Could End Fight To Balance Hispanic Vote (ORS) ... 48
100 Bilingual Poll Workers Achieve Goal (RMA) ... 49
To Settle Suit In Boy's Death, New Jersey To Pay $7.5 Million (AP) ... 50

Antitrust:
Gannett Emerges As Possible Bidder For Tribune Properties (CHIT) ... 50
Microsoft Jury Pool Faces Long Survey (DMR) ... 52
Sports Artist Sued For Mix Of Crimson And Tide (NYT) ... 52
Mayberry Sheriff Calls The Law On Candidate (AP) ... 54

Environment:
Asarco Leaves Costly Environmental Mess In The City (CCCT) 54

Immigration:
Boot Nazi Guard, Pol Says (NYDN) ... 55
Immigrant Protection Rules Draw Fire (NYT) ... 56

Congress-Administration:
Poll: Bush Hits New Low (NSWK) ... 57
At Home And Abroad, Things Are Not Going Bush's Way (AP).. 59
Bush Uses Veterans Day Speech To Thank U.S. Troops For Dedication And Bravery (AP) ... 60
Bush Hails Bravery, Dedication Of Troops (WP) ... 61
For Vets And President, A Day Of Remembrance (WT) ... 62
Vote Won't Lessen Resolve, Bush Tells Terrorists (LAT) ... 62
Spinning Out Of An Electoral Beating (LAT) ... 63
Incoming Democrats Put Populism Before Ideology (NYT) ... 64
Democrats Find Lessons In GOP Reign (WP) ... 66
Reid, An Ex-boxer, Hasn't Forgotten Bush's Punches (LAT) ... 68
Ascending To A National Platform (LAT) ... 69
Speaker Clout Benefits District (AP) ... 71
Bush's Bipartisan Experience In Texas May Not Translate (HC) 71
Govern, Don't Gloat (NYT) ... 72

Let The Investigations Begin (NYT) 73
Democrats Now Look To Sustain Majority (AP) 74
How Rahm Emanuel Helped End An Era Of Republican Rule (CHIT) 75
Maybe You Did Vote Your Pocketbook (NYT) 82
How The Hammer Fell On His Own Party (HC) 83
G.O.P. Collapse In Indiana Emblematic Of Larger Loss (NYT) .. 84
Rove Remains Steadfast In The Face Of Criticism (WP) 86
Holding To The Center, Losing My Seat (NYT) 87
Webb May Be Senate Maverick (WP) 88
I Am Macaca (WP) 90
A Survivor Reflects On Political Casualties, And Real Ones (NYT) 90
New Democratic Majority Throws Bush's Judicial Nominations Into Uncertainty (NYT) 91
Carmakers' Agenda For Bush: Hear Our Pain (FREEP) 92
With Dems In Power, Part D Could Get A Makeover (PPG) 94
White House Eyes Dollars From Nevada Land Sale (WT) 95

Other News:

Liberal Groups Expect Postelection Results (LAT) 96
An Uneasy Alliance (NYT) 98
Core Values Still Valid, GOP Says (WT) 99
Reactionary Moderates (NYT) 101
2006: The Year Of The "Macaca" (NYT) 101
A True Blue Libertarian (WP) 103
Revolving Doors Spin Once Again (NYT) 104
Spitzer Buries His Cares For Weekend On The Sand (NYT) 105
Ehrlich Run Again "Unlikely" (AP) 106
Feingold Rules Out 2008 Run For President (MJS) 106
Sen. Feingold Rules Out Run For President In 2008 (AP) 107
Now, The Tape Measure For Those Other Drapes (NYT) 108
The Democrats: Is Winning Winning? (WP) 110
Is America Too Racist For Barack? Too Sexist For Hillary? (WP)111
Life Expectancy Increases For H.I.V. Patients (AP) 113
Memorial Planners Have A Dream, Too (WP) 114
The System Worked (WP) 115
Let Naturalized Americans Run For President (LAT) 115
The Corporate End Run (NYT) 116
U.S. Vetoes Security Council Resolution Assailing Israel For Attacks (NYT) 117
U.S. Vetoes Condemnation Of Gaza Strikes (AP) 118
Hamas Official: Unity Gov't Deal Near (AP) 119
Talks Collapse In Lebanon As Shiites Vacate The Cabinet (NYT) 119
Hezbollah Quits Lebanese Cabinet (AP) 120
Russian Foreign Minister Hopeful About Nuclear Talks With Iran (AP) 121
U.S., Pyongyang Officials May Meet Soon, Report Says (AP) . 121
Nicaragua's Ortega Vows Close U.S. Ties (AP) 122
Former Contras Bemoan Ortega's Return To Power In Nicaragua (WP) 123
Two U.N. Peacekeepers Killed In Haiti (AP) 125
Facing Reality On Europe's Immigrants (NYT) 125
Voters Were Not The Only People To Notice Scandals (NYT) . 126

DOJ_NMG_0093060

TERRORISM NEWS:

Posada A Target Of New Federal Probes (MH)

By Alfonso Chardy And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, November 12, 2006

One of the first things the businessman noticed about Luis Posada Carriles was that he spoke funny. Posada, who mumbled because of an old bullet wound in his jaw, frequently visited the businessman's Guatemala utility company in 1997 to meet with two co-workers.

The businessman grew suspicious after one of the workers told him about Cuban exile plans to assassinate Fidel Castro and after a Venezuelan politician confided that Posada, a CIA-trained explosives expert, was a ``very dangerous individual."

Concerned that Posada was using his utility business to plot illicit activities, the businessman hid a transmitter in an office and overheard the two co-workers talk with Posada about placing a "putty-like explosive" in the shoes of Central Americans paid to pose as tourists on trips to Cuba.

Soon afterward, the businessman became a "confidential source" for the FBI's investigation into bombs that exploded at Cuban tourist sites in 1997, killing an Italian and wounding seven others.

The businessman, a Cuban-American engineer who set up the utility company in Guatemala City in 1996, could turn out to be the central figure in the Justice Department's rekindled criminal investigation of Posada. The probe is back on track -- despite the fact that the FBI field office in Miami destroyed evidence in 2003 about the initial Cuba bombing case.

Federal grand juries in New Jersey and Texas are investigating the secret activities of Posada, 78, who is detained at an immigration facility in El Paso, Texas. The Texas probe focuses on whether he lied about how he sneaked into the country. The New Jersey investigation, aided by the FBI in Miami, is zeroing in on his role as the alleged mastermind of the dozen tourist-site bombings in Cuba that investigators think were financed by Cuban exiles in Union City, N.J.

Either of the probes could lead to the first indictment of Posada in the United States.

10-PAGE AFFIDAVIT

An insight into the Justice Department's case can be found in a 10-page affidavit obtained by The Miami Herald. In the June 10, 2005, sworn statement, FBI special agent Thomas H. Rice portrayed Posada as a dangerous man bent on killing Castro and spreading terror on the communist-run island to destroy its tourism economy.

"The FBI is unable to rule out the possibility that Posada poses a threat to the national security of the United States," Rice wrote.

Among the evidence cited in the sworn statement:

· In late August 1997, the businessman at the Guatemala utility company said he and a co-worker discovered "what appeared to be explosive materials" in the firm's office, where Posada regularly met with two other workers.

The businessman later told the FBI that the materials consisted of 22 transparent plastic tubes filled with a tan substance. They were labeled with the name of the manufacturer and ``explosivos de alto poder, extremadamente peligrosos" -- high-power explosives, extremely dangerous.

· The businessman said he found funnels in the office that he thought were used to mix explosive materials with liquid inside shampoo bottles. He also found a diaper that may have been used to absorb the liquid in the bottles and yield the explosives.

The businessman then found a carrying case containing a note in Spanish, which said, "The tyrant has to be eliminated, regardless of how many others are killed." Also found in the case: a note pad with Posada's name written on the first page.

· During the FBI's investigation of the 1997 Cuba bombings, agents collected records showing about $19,000 in wire transfers from the United States to "Ramon Medina," one of Posada's aliases, in El Salvador and Guatemala between Oct. 30, 1996, and Jan. 14, 1998.

WIRE TRANSFERS

The FBI agent specifically refers to an Aug. 25, 1997, fax intercepted by the businessman's co-worker at the Guatemala utility company.

The cryptic fax is signed Solo. Investigators think Posada sent the fax from El Salvador to the utility company, addressed to two alleged co-conspirators who worked there.

Handwritten in Spanish, it refers to wire money transfers totaling $3,200 from four men in Union City to pay a ``hotel bill."

DOJ_NMG_0093061

It also alludes to some discussion Solo had about the need for publicity for certain actions. But there is no mention of Posada or bombings.

"As I explained to you, if there is no publicity, the work is useless," Solo wrote. ``The American newspapers don't publish anything that hasn't been confirmed. I need all the information regarding the discotheque in order to try to confirm it. If there is no publicity, there will be no payment. I'll be awaiting news today, tomorrow I'll be leaving for two days."

CRUCIAL DOCUMENT

Since the fax became public in 1998, after it was reported first in The Miami Herald and then in The New York Times, it has come to be seen as a crucial document in the current investigation. It was included in the hundreds of pages turned over May 19 to the El Paso court considering Posada's custody.

In New Jersey, three of the people mentioned in the fax -- Abel Hernández, Rubén Gonzalo and his son, José -- have been approached by FBI agents and subpoenaed by the federal grand jury in Newark. Authorities wanted to know whether they helped finance the Cuba bombings.

Attorney Gilberto Garcia, who represents the three men and two other Cuban exiles also subpoenaed by the grand jury, said none had any role in the bombings.

"My clients had no knowledge about the financing of the bombings," Garcia said. ``They had no participation."

Nevertheless, Garcia said two of the five refused to testify and invoked their right against self-incrimination -- then prosecutors excused them. Two others agreed to provide information to prosecutors, and one testified before the grand jury. Those three said they had not been involved in the bombings.

Garcia said his clients' names on the Solo fax were "misappropriated." "Someone was sending these money transfers to Guatemala using their names," he said.

Although Posada was suspected as the mastermind of the bombings, he was never charged in the initial probe, largely because federal investigators insist that the Cuban government failed to help them build a case against him. But the federal case was reactivated after Posada, a Cuban-born Venezuelan citizen, sneaked into the United States last year.

The U.S. attorney's offices in Newark and El Paso declined to comment.

Eduardo Soto, Posada's attorney, said his client has not received a so-called target letter from federal authorities alleging he is a suspect in a crime. Soto said his client did not lie about his entry into the country and was not involved in the Cuba bombings.

In El Paso, three Cuban exiles from Miami -- José Pujol, Rubén López Castro and Ernesto Abreu -- have refused to testify. At least two of them, Pujol and López Castro, are facing prosecution.

The current Newark investigation has gained momentum as the FBI pieces together evidence -- including the fax allegedly sent by Posada listing suspected U.S. co-conspirators involved in the financing of the bombing campaign.

The government has stepped up its effort to keep Posada in detention because the federal judge in El Paso has set a Feb. 1 deadline for the Justice Department to demonstrate why he shouldn't be released in the United States, since he cannot be deported.

The reason: No country has offered to take him. Also, an immigration judge has ordered that he not be sent back to Cuba or Venezuela.

PROPAGANDA WEAPON

Castro and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez accuse Posada of masterminding the 1976 bombing attack that brought down a Cuban airliner, killing 73 people.

Both leaders have used Posada as a propaganda weapon against the United States, which was embarrassed by his illegal entry into the country in the post-9/11 climate when antiterrorism defenses were supposed to be tighter. Castro and Chávez have accused federal officials of coddling a ``terrorist."

For his part, Posada has blamed Cuban agents for a 1990 assassination attempt in which he was shot in the jaw and chest in Guatemala.

The Justice Department's renewed Cuba bombing probe was challenging at first because the FBI had destroyed some documents, such as Western Union cables and other case records, in the fall of 2003 -- after obtaining approval from the U.S. attorney's office in Miami.

In the initial case, the Cuban government was cooperative with federal authorities. A team of FBI agents visited Cuban counterintelli- gence officials in June 1998. The Castro government said it shared information on the tourist bombing attacks and other alleged Cuban exile terrorism activities during the 1990s.

1998 IMPASSE

Ultimately, Cuban officials refused to allow FBI agents to talk with witnesses or suspects or to conduct forensic examinations of explosive materials recovered from the tourist-site bombings, according to federal authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0093062

The final breakdown came in September 1998, when a federal grand jury in Miami indicted 10 Cuban agents on charges of infiltrating South Florida to spy on the U.S. government and the Cuban-American community.

One of the key pieces of evidence in the current Cuba bombing investigation is the mysterious fax signed Solo.

The link between Posada and the fax was reported first in The Miami Herald on June 7, 1998. A New York Times article the following month said a Cuban-American businessman in Central America, Jorge "Tony" Alvarez, had discovered the fax in his office. Alvarez claimed it had been sent by Posada from El Salvador.

`A BIG SCANDAL'

The article also asserted that Posada acknowledged being the author of the fax, and an accompanying story quoted Posada as saying he was responsible for the bomb attacks at Cuban tourist sites, including the one that killed the Italian.

"We didn't want to hurt anybody," the story quoted Posada as saying. ``We just wanted to make a big scandal so that the tourists don't come anymore. We don't want any more foreign investment."

For investigators, Posada's statements amounted to a confession.

Last year, prosecutors from the U.S. attorney's office in Miami sent subpoenas to The New York Times and freelance writer Ann Louise Bardach, demanding the recordings and any other documents she might have that were connected to the interview. Lawyers sought to quash the subpoenas, and the government withdrew them.

In October, the grand jury in Newark issued a new subpoena to Bardach. She said her Miami lawyer is preparing a response to quash it.

Taken together, the fax, FBI witnesses and the tapes could be crucial pieces of evidence in indicting Posada.

In testimony to an immigration court in El Paso last year, Posada acknowledged that he had made those statements to Bardach -- but noted that he did not understand her questions and did not provide proper answers because his English was poor.

In the end, the Cuban government arrested several of the bombers.

And over the next decade, the tourism industry was far from disrupted. Travel to Cuba became all the more popular, with experts estimating the total number of visitors doubling to more than two million last year.

FBI Destroyed Evidence As 'Routine' Matter (MH)

By Jay Weaver And Alfonso Chardy

The Miami Herald, November 12, 2006

A renewed federal investigation launched after Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles sneaked into the country last year posed a serious challenge at first because the FBI's Miami office had destroyed crucial evidence in the fall of 2003.

The evidence was part of a previous investigation of bomb attacks against Cuban tourist sites in 1997. Destroyed documents included Western Union cables and money wire transfers.

The Atlantic Monthly, in an article in its November issue, suggested the FBI destroyed the evidence to shield Posada from criminal prosecution and avoid angering the Cuban exile community where some view him as a patriot.

The FBI confirmed to The Miami Herald that some case records were destroyed but denied there were any irregularities.

Officials portrayed the destruction as a routine administrative procedure after the U.S. attorney's office closed the case in August 2003 because of lack of progress in the investigation.

"We routinely destroy evidence in cases that have been closed," said FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela, noting the agency needed to make room for other records in its evidence room at the time.

She added that the FBI has been able to rebuild the body of evidence in the Cuba bombing probe, which targets Posada.

Hector Pesquera, who was special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami field office in 2003, said that any suggestion he sought to protect Posada from prosecution was ``preposterous."

Said Pesquera: ``That's not the way this office works or any other law enforcement office works for that matter."

Guy Lewis, who served as the U.S. attorney in Miami during part of the Cuba bombing case, said such a claim was ``B.S."

Why The FBI Is Coming After Me (WP)

By Ann Louise Bardach

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

As a rule, I don't believe in conspiracy theories. They tend to be tidy and selective, whereas life seems so random and messy. But the case of Cuban militant and would-be Fidel Castro assassin Luis Posada Carriles has sorely tested my convictions.

I've been writing about Posada for nearly a decade. I interviewed him in Aruba for a series of articles in the New York Times in 1998. He was a fugitive who had escaped from Venezuela in 1985 while awaiting trial in the 1976 bombing of a Cuban passenger plane that killed all 73 people aboard-- the first deadly act of airline terrorism in the Americas. Posada has maintained his innocence, but in a rare instance of unanimity, the CIA and the FBI, as well as Venezuelan, Trinidadian and Cuban intelligence, concluded that he and fellow militant Orlando Bosch had masterminded the bombing.

DOJ_NMG_0093063

Last year, I wrote an Outlook article about Posada's surprise arrival in Miami, where he filed a claim for political asylum. Not only did this move strike many as brazen, but it also seemed incomprehensible that the Bush administration, so committed to what it calls the War on Terror, could have allowed someone of Posada's notoriety to slip into the country.

Soon after, Homeland Security Department officials got around to arresting Posada and charging him with illegal entry. I assumed that the Justice Department would act on his self-admitted history of paramilitary attacks and extradite him somewhere, and that I'd just continue to cover his case. Instead, the government has dithered for a year and a half while Posada languishes in an immigration jail in Texas.

And I, meanwhile, have found myself an unwitting player in the tangled drama of the United States and Luis Posada.

Not long after Posada's arrest, FBI and Homeland Security agents began to phone me, seeking information about the New York Times series. One agent came right out and asked if I'd share my research materials -- as well as my copies of FBI and CIA files on Posada. "Do us a favor," he said. "We can't find ours." I laughed politely, assuming it was a strained attempt at humor. But he wasn't kidding.

In August 2003, the Miami bureau of the FBI made the startling decision to close its case on Posada. Subsequently, according to FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela, several boxes of evidence were removed from the bureau's evidence room, or the "bulky," as it is known. Among the documents that disappeared was the original signed fax that Posada had sent to collaborators in Guatemala in 1997, complaining of the U.S. media's reluctance to believe reports about a series of bombings in Cuba, which he hoped would scare tourists and investors away from Castro's island.

I had shown Posada a copy of this fax during my interviews with him. The fax had been intercepted by Antonio Alvarez, a Cuban exile and businessman who had shared office space with Posada in Guatemala in 1997. Alarmed, Alvarez had notified agents from the FBI's Miami bureau, but when they took no action, he had turned to the Times.

"If there is no publicity, the job is useless," Posada wrote in the fax. "The American newspapers publish nothing that has not been confirmed. I need all the data from the [bombing of the] discotheque in order to try to confirm it." It was signed "Solo," his nom de guerre.

Posada fretted to me that the fax could cause him problems with the FBI. But he had no need to worry.

H?ctor Pesquera, the special agent in charge of the Miami FBI bureau at the time, showed little interest in Posada's case. To his agents' distress, he enjoyed socializing with Miami's hard-line exile politicians, and denied agents' requests for wiretaps on Bosch, known as the godfather of the paramilitary groups, as well as other militants suspected of ongoing criminal activity. Pesquera shuttered investigations into exile militants, agents say, before retiring in December 2003.

Without the materials that were removed from the evidence room, which also included cables and money transfers between Posada and his collaborators in the Cuban bombings, a criminal prosecution of Posada is severely hobbled. Orihuela, the FBI spokeswoman, explained that "the supervisory agent in charge and someone from the U.S. attorney's office would have had to sign off" before evidence is removed and destroyed. She confirmed that the approval to dispose of the evidence was given by the case agent on Posada, who happened to be Ed Pesquera -- H?ctor's son.

Though Posada's case was reopened in May 2005 and is now pending, the decision to close it in the first place baffled many longtime FBI and Miami Dade police investigators. Rarely had Posada been more active. In addition to the Cuban bombing campaign, he and three comrades had been arrested in Panama in 2000 in connection with an attempt to assassinate Castro.

In late April last year, while I was out at the hair salon, my husband phoned to tell me that two Department of Homeland Security agents had arrived at my home in Santa Barbara, Calif., to serve me with a subpoena. I told him to ask the agents to leave and refer their inquiries to the Times. Eventually, they served the Times' lawyers. Over the next few months, a dance played out in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida. After the Times filed its motion to quash the subpoena, the Justice Department withdrew it in August 2005.

Later, while I was working on an article about Posada for the current issue of the Atlantic Monthly, one of his attorneys told me that Posada's case "is being handled at the highest levels" of the Justice Department. All they have to do to detain Posada indefinitely, he explained, is to have Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales certify him as a national security threat. "But they're not going to do that," he added. "That would create problems for the Bush people with their Cuban-exile base in Miami." In other words, the government does not want to mount its own case -- and risk alienating Cuban American allies. Better it should get reporters to build its case.

On Sept. 11, the Justice Department whirled into action, perhaps emboldened by the symbolism of the date. It struck a plea deal for about two years in prison for Posada's comrades Santiago Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, who had been facing up to 50 years in prison for the illegal possession of hundreds of firearms. On the same day, a magistrate judge in El Paso recommended that Posada be released, as Justice had yet to file charges. (On Nov. 3, the presiding judge gave the government 90 days to make its case.) And later that afternoon, a Justice lawyer called the Times and said that another subpoena would be issued for materials relating to Posada.

DOJ_NMG_0093064

On Oct. 6, the 30th anniversary of the bombing of the Cuban plane (you have to give them credit for timing), I received a new subpoena. This one, issued by a federal grand jury in Newark, was requested by Gonzales. They may be ambivalent about the war on terrorism over at the Justice Department, but you can't question their dedication to their war against the Fourth Estate. For my part, it raised a peculiar pickle: contemplating how far one should go to protect the civil liberties of an accused terrorist.

My case, thankfully, does not involve confidential sources. And both the law according to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, where the case is pending, and the Justice Department's own guidelines are clear: Prosecutors cannot compel reporters to turn over information that they can obtain through other means. Only after other avenues have been pursued should the government turn to the media to build a prosecution.

Call me a strict constructionist, but somehow I do not believe that our founding fathers meant to allow the government to raid the news media for their work files after it bungles a case and destroys crucial evidence.

The Justice Department's new subpoena says that it wants only the tape recordings from my interview with Posada. Aside from the huge intrusion and inconvenience of searching through about 15 years' worth of research materials, the entire ordeal strikes me as a waste of time.

Posada agreed to meet with me because he wanted to publicize his efforts to topple Castro. I recorded as much as possible in the event that Posada may later have regrets. Which he did. But over the two days I spent with him, he revealed a good deal about his various bombing campaigns and his general philosophy.

My coauthor Larry Rohter, Times editors and I picked out the strongest and most interesting parts of the transcripts and notes for our stories. Contrary to what the great minds at Justice may think, we don't hold back the best bits -- we publish them. And just last month, the Atlantic published on its Web site Posada's notes to me, in which he offered editorial guidance -- "He does not admit the bombs in the hotels, but he does not deny either," he wrote.

The FBI and the Justice Department are filled with dedicated public servants, but it is the political appointees who make the final decisions. And for them, Posada may be a man who knows too much. His attorneys say that he was a paid CIA agent from 1959 until the mid-1980s. Indeed, upon his "escape" from prison in 1985, Posada promptly found employment running the Iran-contra field operation in El Salvador. Bosch, his co-defendant in the Cuban plane bombing, was championed by none other than Jeb Bush in his bid for U.S. residency, which was granted in 1991 by President George H.W. Bush over the objections of the FBI, the CIA and the Justice Department.

And there are other thorny details in this case. The Miami-Dade Police Department's liaison to the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force has been a well-regarded detective named Luis Crespo Jr. -- who is the son of Luis Crespo, one of the most famous anti-Castro militants, known as El Gancho, or The Hook, because of the hand he lost to an ill-timed bomb.

Working alongside Crespo Jr. is detective H?ctor Alfonso, whose father is also a legendary anti-Castro militant, known as H?ctor Fabian. Assigned to the MDPD intelligence unit, Alfonso's son has access to the most sensitive information on homeland defense, including on Cuban exile militants. "Say you had a tip for the FBI about a bombing," muses D.C. Diaz, a 27-year department veteran. "Would you want to give it to a guy whose father is Luis Crespo?"

Before the government starts tampering with the Constitution's protections of the press, it needs to do some housecleaning. A good start would be a special prosecutor to look into who ordered the removal of the Posada evidence, and why. If it then decides that it wants to go further, it might peruse the 45 years' worth of CIA and FBI files on Posada that detail his paramilitary career. And there are a dozen or so comrades of Posada's in Miami and New Jersey who know a great deal more than I do.

But that's assuming that the government wants to prosecute Posada. It has declined to do so for decades. And nothing so far suggests that it is inclined to start now.

bardachreports@aol.com

Ann Louise Bardach is the author of "Cuba Confidential" (Vintage) and the editor of "Prison Letters of Fidel Castro," forthcoming from Avalon in February.

Suspects' Treatment Secret (FREEP/MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg, Mcclatchy Newspapers

Detroit Free Press, November 12, 2006

It's a national security issue, CIA says

The CIA is still trying to impose secrecy around 14 top Al Qaeda suspects now held at the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detention center, including an alleged 9/11 mastermind, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed.

DOJ_NMG_0093065

The arena for the effort is the U.S. District Court of Judge Reggie Walton in Washington, D.C., where the government is seeking a still-undefined restriction on the attorney-client relationship in the case of Majid Khan, one of the 14.

The CIA argues that details of the man's three years of detention and interrogation at so-called black sites -- out of reach of the International Red Cross -- are national security secrets.

Khan's attorney, Gita Gutierrez, argues that the Bush administration's intent is not to safeguard national security but to cover up three years of extrajudicial detention of her client -- to "conceal illegal or embarrassing executive conduct."

Khan, 26, was captured in his native Pakistan in 2003. The White House says he's linked to unsuccessful plots to blow up gas stations in the United States, poison U.S. water supplies and assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

It's not known where he was held or how he was interrogated to establish these links. He hasn't been charged with a crime.

At least some of the 14 men whom President George W. Bush ordered handed over to the military this summer were reportedly submitted to harsh, classified interrogation techniques, including simulated drownings -- known as water-boarding -- to break their will.

Court documents filed by the government suggest that the 14 newest arrivals at Guantanamo, among them alleged Osama bin Laden deputies, would never be integrated into the general population of more than 430 captives, for fear they would talk about their secret confinement to other captives, who could, in turn, pass on the details to their lawyers.

In seeking to redefine attorney-client contacts, Justice Department lawyers offered a seven-page affidavit from CIA officer Marilyn Dorn, who describes herself as "the information review officer for the National Clandestine Service."

Dorn's office, she said, decides what secret CIA documents can be provided to civilian U.S. courts without jeopardizing "CIA interests, personnel or facilities."

Because Khan was held for three years in a "top secret" program, she says, "he may have come into possession of information, including locations of detention, conditions of detention and alternative interrogation techniques."

Attorney disclosure in court records of those details, she argues, could compromise clandestine relationships between the United States and its foreign allies.

All civilian lawyers at the Guantanamo naval base already go through a security screening before they're allowed to visit. Then they must turn over their notes to the military before they can leave the base. They can disclose their contents only by permission of a classification review team set up by the federal courts.

Now the CIA seeks a more restrictive review and disclosure process whose "particulars ... are still being worked out," said Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist.

She couldn't say whether the government will again propose to eavesdrop on attorney-client meetings, which a court refused to grant three years ago.

The Khan case also illustrates the ongoing Bush administration effort to curb civilian court intrusion at Guantanamo, a process that has evolved fitfully around two years of court rulings on detainee rights.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Frustration Grows At Carousel As More Baggage Goes Astray (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

ATLANTA, Nov. 6 — Since Aug. 10, when a ban on most carry-on liquids sent the amount of checked luggage soaring, airlines have been misplacing many more bags, and the fumbling could well escalate during the busy holiday travel season.

The Transportation Department reported that 107,731 more fliers had their bags go missing in August than they did a year earlier, a 33 percent increase. It got worse in September, with 183,234 more passengers suffering mishandled bags than a year earlier, up 92 percent.

Globally, about 30 million bags are mishandled each year, according to SITA, a company that sells software to airlines and airports for baggage and other systems. Airlines spend about $2.5 billion to find those bags and deliver them to waiting, often angry, passengers.

All but about 200,000 bags are eventually reunited with their owners each year — a number that sounds pretty high on its own, but that represents less than 1 percent of the billions of bags that are checked annually.

Efforts are under way to fix two of the worst baggage operations in the United States — at US Airways in Philadelphia and at Atlantic Southeast Airlines, which operates as Delta Connection here. Both airlines had scrimped on workers and equipment at these airports. But it is far from certain whether these hubs will be running smoothly by Thanksgiving.

DOJ_NMG_0093066

Because of the relatively primitive technology used by airlines to track baggage, passengers typically only learn that their luggage missed their flight after a futile wait at the carousel. Then, travelers must hunt down baggage agents, fill out forms, and wait for hours or even days for someone, often unannounced, to deliver their bags.

Rhoda Frank of Chicago took her 12-year-old granddaughter, Bronwyn, to Manitoba last month for a vacation in which they hoped to see polar bears. Bronwyn flew on United Airlines from Raleigh, N.C., to meet her grandmother in Chicago, but her bag stayed behind.

The flight to Manitoba was not until the next morning, and United told Mrs. Frank the bag would be delivered by midnight. "It didn't come," she said. They flew north anyway, without Bronwyn's long underwear or down jacket. The bag finally arrived, just before it was time to come home. In the meantime, "I scrounged for clothing," Mrs. Frank said.

Airlines were generally misplacing slightly fewer bags this year until Aug. 10, when authorities in London foiled a plot to blow up airliners using liquid explosives mixed onboard. The liquids ban led to a roughly 25 percent increase in checked bags, which stressed some baggage operations.

Many of the bag-handling problems are because of the industry's cost-cutting.

US Airways, twice in bankruptcy since Sept. 11, 2001, and then merged a year ago with America West Airlines, had a baggage meltdown at its Philadelphia hub around Christmas of 2004. Executives said they had known they needed to add people and equipment there. Some of that occurred. And through July of this year, fewer bags were going missing.

But with the surge of checked bags in August, the hub's bag-handling performance began "backsliding," said J. Scott Kirby, president of the airline. "A lot of balls in the air with the merger," he said. "This one didn't get done as well as it should have."

Crews at Philadelphia, for instance, were short of equipment and fighting over the tractors — known as tugs — that they use to pull baggage carts.

"There's a real lack of organization on the ramp in Philadelphia," he added, where three-to-four times as many bags are misplaced as at other US Airways hubs.

US Airways is hiring 190 additional workers and 60 managers to fix the bag mess. The company is also buying more tractors, but is still about 40 short of its needs.

"We're not going to fix the thing overnight," Mr. Kirby said.

Regional carriers have been the fastest-growing part of the airline business in recent years, as they started flying some of the short routes abandoned by big carriers like Delta Air Lines. For example, Atlantic Southeast — which Delta sold last year to SkyWest, but which still operates as Delta Connection — carried twice as many passengers in 2005, 12 million, as in 2000.

When it was owned by Delta, which is operating under bankruptcy court protection, Southeast was denied the tractors, carts, computers and people it needed to keep up with its baggage — in Atlanta 30,000 pieces a day now. "When Delta sold us Atlantic Southeast, part of the reason was for us to fix some things," said Jerry C. Atkin, SkyWest's chief executive.

But over the last year, Atlantic Southeast has showed only modest improvement, remaining the worst bag handler in the Transportation Department's rankings. And then in August its performance deteriorated again. Delta began complaining directly to Mr. Atkin, who installed new managers and agreed to hire 300 more ground workers and double Atlantic Southeast's fleet of carts to carry baggage, among other equipment purchases.

"I got tired of being embarrassed by the numbers," Mr. Atkin said. Now, he added, "there are some good people who have put their jobs on the line to fix things."

One of them is Walt Kaurin, the new baggage performance manager, whose leathery skin shows his 24 years working outside on the ramp for Atlantic Southeast. Told of Mr. Atkin's remark, Mr. Kaurin grimaced, explained his initial reluctance to become a manager, then, adopting a smile, said, "I was pretty confident we could fix it."

It will take time. October mishandled bag numbers, not yet released by the Transportation Department, will again be poor for Atlantic Southeast, said Joe Kolshak, an executive vice president at Delta, whose own bag performance is highly dependent on the regional carrier.

Getting those 300 new hires up to speed will not be easy. "They're minimum wage in many cases," Mr. Kolshak said. "And there's high turnover."

Financial problems have slowed industry investment in technology that could improve bag handling. Radio frequency identification tags, in wide use among retailers to track inventory, would allow airlines to easily know if a bag did not make a flight. Then, the passenger could be warned via text messaging not to waste time at the carousel, and to call to arrange a delivery.

Not waiting for airlines, McCarran International Airport in Las Vegas is installing radio frequency readers and tagging all outgoing luggage. The tags cost about 20 cents each, but are worth it to a city that relies so heavily on tourists.

"If they have a bad travel experience, they'll look at each other and say, 'Wow, we don't want to do that again,' " said Samuel Ingalls, assistant director of aviation.

DOJ_NMG_0093067

Meanwhile, airlines can hope more travelers adopt the Zen thinking of Pamela Ingram, a Binghamton, N.Y., consultant who travels five days a week. She checks her bags, fearlessly. In the rare instances — once this year — of a tardy bag, she happily makes do.

"I got to go to my meeting in jeans," Ms. Ingram said. "You can't travel this much and expect everything to go right."

WAR NEWS:

Panel May Have Few Good Options To Offer (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

After meeting with President Bush tomorrow, a panel of prestigious Americans will begin deliberations to chart a new course on Iraq, with the goal of stabilizing the country with a different U.S. strategy and possibly the withdrawal of troops.

Tuesday's dramatic election results, widely seen as a repudiation of the Bush Iraq policy, has thrust the 10-member, bipartisan Iraq Study Group into the kind of special role played by the Sept. 11 commission. This panel, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D), might play a decisive role in reshaping the U.S. position in Iraq, according to lawmakers and administration officials.

Those familiar with the panel's work predict that the ultimate recommendations will not appear novel and that there are few, if any, good options left facing the country. Many of the ideas reportedly being considered -- more aggressive regional diplomacy with Syria and Iran, greater emphasis on training Iraqi troops, or focusing on a new political deal between warring Shiites and Sunni -- have either been tried or have limited chances of success, in the view of many experts on Iraq. Baker is also exploring whether a broader U.S. initiative in tackling the Arab-Israeli conflict is needed to help stabilize the region.

Given the grave predicament the group faces, its focus is now as much on finding a political solution for the United States as on a plan that would bring peace to Iraq. With Republicans and Democrats so bitterly divided over the war, Baker and Hamilton believe that it is key that their group produce a consensus plan, according to those who have spoken with them.

That could appeal to both parties. Democrats would have something to support after a campaign in which they criticized Bush's Iraq policy without offering many specifics of their own. And with support for its Iraq policy fast evaporating even within its own party, the White House might find in the group's plan either a politically acceptable exit strategy or a cover for a continued effort to prop up the new democratically-elected government in Baghdad.

"Baker's objectives for the Iraq Study Group are grounded in his conviction that Iraq is the central foreign policy issue confronting the United States, and that the only way to address that issue successfully is to first build a bipartisan consensus," said Arnold Kanter, who served as undersecretary of state under Baker during George H.W. Bush's administration.

But the midterm elections may have made the job even tougher by emboldening panel Democrats, said people familiar with the panel's deliberations. The elections "sent a huge signal," said one of these sources, who added that the panel is trying to come to grips with whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government has the capacity to solve the country's problems.

While Baker has been testing the waters for some time to determine how much change in Iraq policy will be tolerated by the White House, Hamilton perhaps faces the now even-more-difficult challenge of cajoling Democrats such as former Clinton administration chief of staff Leon E. Panetta and power broker Vernon E. Jordan Jr. to sign on to a plan that falls short of a phased troop withdrawal, the position of many congressional Democrats.

In a brief interview, Hamilton conceded the obstacles ahead and emphasized that no decisions have been made. "We need to get [the report] drafted, number one," Hamilton said. "We need to reach agreement, and that may not be possible."

When it was formed in the spring by Congress, the Iraq Study Group was little known beyond the elite circles of the U.S. foreign policy world. Now its work has become perhaps the most eagerly awaited Washington report in many years -- recommendations are expected in early December -- with many lawmakers of both parties saying they are looking for answers to the troubled U.S. mission in Iraq.

"I can only be hopeful that they'll have a positive solution," Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who is likely to become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said in an interview Friday. Asked if he thought it was possible for the panel to please both the president and congressional Democrats, Skelton turned the question around, saying: "I wonder if the White House will not use them as a face-saving device."

Indeed, the White House, which had been skeptical that the group will have much new to say, has notably been more receptive since the elections. "If these recommendations help bring greater consensus for Republicans and Democrats, I think that could be very helpful," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to Bush. But he added: "If there were a rifle-shot solution, we would have already pulled the trigger."

DOJ_NMG_0093068

Bush, Vice President Cheney and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley will meet with members of the commission tomorrow. During three days of deliberations, the panel will also hear, via video link, from British Prime Minister Tony Blair -- who, one source said, has been anxious to talk to the panel -- as well as consult with members of the Democratic shadow foreign-policy cabinet, including former secretary of state Madeleine K. Albright, former ambassador to the United Nations Richard C. Holbrooke and former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger.

While Hamilton's role may be growing as a result of Tuesday's elections, it is Baker who has been the dominant force in the panel's work so far, according to people involved. And it is Baker whose special connection to the Bush family -- he was the closest political associate of then-President George H. W. Bush -- has invited fevered speculation that he is maneuvering to save the Bush presidency from the disaster unfolding in Iraq.

Baker, who did not respond to an interview request, has publicly expressed skepticism about George W. Bush's ambition of transforming Iraq into a democratic beacon of change for the entire Middle East. Speaking at Princeton University, his alma mater, in April, shortly after the study group was formed, Baker said, "We ought not to think we're going to see a flowering of Jeffersonian democracy along the banks of the Euphrates," according to the Daily Princetonian.

Baker has offered other pointed critiques of the Bush administration's Iraq policy in recent months, during appearances aimed partly at selling his new memoir. In television and other interviews, Baker has made clear his desire to chart a middle road between the Bush administration's policy and what he regards as premature withdrawal from Iraq. "He's a pragmatist, a realist," said a Baker colleague, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the insistence on secrecy surrounding the panel's work. "He believes in America's moral values, but he also believes in trying to keep an essential balance with national security interests. When the pendulum swings too much one way or the other, we get into trouble."

Though Hamilton had a hand in selecting the Democrats on the group, its makeup reflects Baker's pragmatic, centrist approach to foreign policy. Few of its 10 members are true foreign policy experts. Rather, it is a classic Washington blue-ribbon commission, a group of "old hands" steeped in the ways of the capital -- two former secretaries of state (Baker and Lawrence S. Eagleburger), two former senators (Republican Alan K. Simpson and Democrat Charles S. Robb), a former defense secretary (William J. Perry) and a former Supreme Court justice, (Sandra Day O'Connor).

Within the panel, staffers and expert consultants have waged warfare by memo as idealists argue with pragmatists over particulars: Retired CIA officer Ray Close complained in one such memo that the deliberations "had degenerated into petty squabbling" and accused "obstinate neocon diehards" of trying to fashion a "stay the course" strategy.

With the assistance of the U.S. Institute of Peace and other Washington think tanks, panel members have heard testimony from a wide range of administration officials and outside experts, and have traveled to Iraq for several days of interviews with senior U.S. diplomats and military officials, as well as Iraqi leaders. Baker, who seems intrigued by the idea of gaining greater assistance in Iraq from U.S. adversaries, had a three-hour dinner in New York with Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations. Zarif hosted the dinner at his elegant ambassador's residence.

Baker made clear that he was not negotiating for the United States but that the commission wanted Iran's input and suggestions. He specifically asked about the possibilities for cooperation between Tehran and Washington on Iraq, according to Iranian sources.

Such contacts have invited skepticism from some of the prominent neoconservatives who strongly pushed the invasion of Iraq but have come to be critical of the administration for not aggressively striving for military victory. They said the notion that Iran would help the United States out of its troubles in Iraq is ludicrous.

"There's no doubt that the majority of the people in this group, either as advisers or principals, either opposed the war or forgot that they were in favor of it," said Reuel Marc Gerecht, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute who was one of several dozen official expert advisers to the Baker-Hamilton group.

However, Gerecht and William Kristol, the editor of the Weekly Standard, said they believe their views received a respectful hearing from the panel. Kristol related a curious anecdote from his September appearance before the panel to promote a plan to provide more troops for security in Baghdad and elsewhere.

Then-panel member Robert M. Gates -- who quit the group Friday after Bush nominated him as defense secretary -- asked Kristol why he thought the president was so determined to stick with Donald H. Rumsfeld as the Pentagon chief.

Kristol replied that he was mystified -- at which point, as he recalled it, Baker interjected with the comment, "Well, you can't expect the president to do anything until after the election."

Staff writers Robin Wright, Walter Pincus, Glenn Kessler and Dan Eggen contributed to this report. Ricks, the author of "Fiasco," a book on the Bush administration's policy in Iraq, appeared before the study group at its members' request to answer questions about his book.

Blair To Address Iraq Study Group (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0093069

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 11 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair will speak via video link with officials from the Iraq Study Group on Tuesday to discuss "U.K. ideas on Iraq and the Middle East," a Blair spokeswoman said Saturday.

The spokeswoman declined to detail what Blair would say to the bipartisan U.S. panel, which is chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana.

The panel, which is expected to make recommendations on Iraq policy by the end of the year, is widely seen as having the respect of the Bush administration and Democrats, who regained control of both houses of Congress in Tuesday's midterm elections.

Blair has been President Bush's chief foreign ally in the conflict and has nearly a decade's experience dealing with Middle East issues.

The Guardian newspaper on Saturday reported that Blair would urge the panel to push the Bush administration to begin talks with Syria and Iran to persuade those two countries to become more involved in finding a solution to the situation in Iraq.

The newspaper also reported that Blair would press Baker and Hamilton to recommend that any solution in Iraq depends on the United States making a "reenergized push for peace in the Palestinian-Israeli conflict."

The Blair spokeswoman, speaking on the condition of anonymity, as is customary here, called the newspaper's report "speculation."

But Blair has expressed similar sentiments in the past, and analysts here said his view that Syria could play a constructive role in Iraq diverges from the U.S. position.

The Bush administration has been reluctant to discuss Iraq with Iran and Syria, which administration officials widely regard as supporters of terrorism and obstacles to establishing a democratic government in Iraq.

Blair sent a top-level envoy, Nigel Sheinwald, to Damascus, the Syrian capital, this month to meet with high-level officials. Blair officials have declined to discuss the details of Sheinwald's visit, including whether he met with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

A Blair spokesman said only that Syria has a "key relationship" with Iraq and that Syria "faced a choice: It can play a constructive role in international affairs or it can continue to support terrorism."

The Blair spokeswoman characterized the prime minister's conference with the Iraq Study Group as a "discussion" that would build on previous sessions the panel has held with lower-ranking British officials. She said she was unsure whether Blair or the panel had requested the discussion.

A Consensus On Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

WITH THE election over and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on his way out, both President Bush and leaders of the new Democratic congressional majority were talking about forging a bipartisan consensus on Iraq. But is consensus possible? The often polarized debate over the war, both before and during the campaign, might suggest that it's not. Yet a close look at what the White House and Democrats have been saying, along with what is emerging from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, offers grounds for some optimism. There is, in fact, a center to the war debate that offers the outlines of a way forward.

Start with what former Secretary of State James A. Baker III has said about the deliberations of the congressionally chartered study group, which will meet with Mr. Bush this week and deliver its report sometime after Thanksgiving. Judging from the public statements Mr. Baker has made so far, the panel won't propose an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, as the left wing of the Democratic Party favors. Nor will it endorse a U.S.-sponsored division of the country along ethnic lines, a proposal pushed in modified form by the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations committee, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.).

The group will, however, almost certainly endorse an idea long favored by Mr. Biden and many other Democrats: an attempt by the United States to find common ground on Iraq with its neighbors -- including Syria and Iran. Though the Bush administration has resisted such an initiative, the newly designated defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, is likely to favor it. Forging a stronger international consensus on stabilizing and reconstructing Iraq, perhaps by staging a multinational conference, is one major option the Bush administration hasn't tried.

Beyond these basic parameters, much current discussion about Iraq boils down to how the United States might induce Iraqi leaders, starting with the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, to negotiate compromises among warring Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, and to disarm ethnic militias. Some favor a peace conference like that which ended the Bosnian war; others want to announce timetables for U.S. troop withdrawals that they believe would force Iraqis to act. There are proposals for increasing aid to Iraqi reconstruction and linking it to progress on reconciliation or militia demobilization. The administration itself has been trying to get Mr. Maliki's agreement to an informal timetable for meeting certain benchmarks and threatening to curtail money for security forces if they don't reform.

DOJ_NMG_0093070

What's clear from all this is that new steps could and should be taken to increase U.S. pressure for an Iraqi peace settlement. But a fresh strategy can't be limited to such measures. Both the Bush administration and Democrats must face the possibility that no amount of U.S. pushing will produce political results or diminish the violence in Baghdad, at least in the short term. For some time, Mr. Maliki and other Iraqis have been warning any American who will listen that the dynamics driving the war won't necessarily respond to timetables drawn up in Washington. If Iraq's civil war is like most others, the fighting might last years before a new order is established.

The United States needs a strategy for defending its own vital interests in that case. As it happens, Mr. Maliki has one to offer: In the last couple of weeks he has made clear that his government's priority is to gain full command over the Iraqi army the United States has been building and take the lead in fighting the Sunni-al-Qaeda insurgency. That means that U.S. troops could begin moving to a supporting role, backing up the Iraqi units with air power and rapid reaction forces. Rather than trying to pacify Baghdad and other cities -- an unwinnable battle in the near term -- more U.S. advisers would embed in Iraqi units, and the training and equipping of those units would be significantly stepped up.

Many Iraqis would welcome a U.S. policy aimed at letting the government and its army carry out the fight to stabilize the country while ensuring that it had the resources and support to prevail over time. That could be a course that Mr. Bush and the Democrats can agree on, as well.

Talking About Iraq (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

You go to the polls, I hit the phones. Since the elections I've been burning my cellphone minutes trying to talk to every policy maker I could about how the elections are going to change Iraq policy. Here's what I've learned:

First, both parties are desperate to be substantially out of Iraq by 2008. Vietnam-haunted Democrats don't want to be saddled with the remains of the war if they retake the White House. Most Republicans don't want to wage another campaign under the Mesopotamian shadow. The president, however, is thinking about the decades-long struggle, not the next election, so the G.O.P. could be heading toward a blood feud between "Let's end this" Republicans and "Let's win this" Republicans, with the potential bitterness lasting for years.

Second, the elections have served as an intellectual release. Some within the Bush administration had been frustrated by the relative lack of freewheeling discussion as the situation in Iraq deteriorated. But that's certainly changed. Since I've been covering this administration, I've never heard such wildly divergent views from important advisers about where we are and what to do next. Some officials retain great faith in the Maliki government, others have very little. Meanwhile, in the Senate, there have been private conversations about forming bipartisan strategies, and an end to the campaign season freeze.

Third, the Baker-Hamilton commission may produce more peace in America than in Iraq. Essentially, the commission looks set to bring the two parties together by asking each to swallow a bitter pill. The administration will probably be asked to organize a regional conference, including Iran and Syria. This will be painful to some leading advisers, who think talking to Iran means abandoning the Bush doctrine (though others think a deal is possible and desirable).

The Democrats, for their part, could be asked to shelve calls for an imminent withdrawal. The Democratic Party is now divided between those, like John Murtha, who believe Iraq is unsalvageable and who want out, and those, like Joe Biden, who believe that with a change of policy it's still possible to head off full-scale disaster. The folks in the Murtha camp may squawk at the Baker-Hamilton emphasis, but the Democratic majority is not going to go McGovernite in the face of a bipartisan commission.

The fourth lesson is that events in Iraq are moving more quickly than adjustments in Washington. To put it bluntly, the era of the Green Zone may be coming to an end. That's in part because the Iraqi government is stumbling. Visitors to Baghdad have been surprised by the lack of urgency many Iraqi leaders seem to feel in the face of national disintegration.

But it's also because the country is segmenting organically. According to the U.N., 365,000 Iraqis have fled their homes and communities since the bombing of the mosque in Samarra in February, and more than 50,000 are retreating to their sectarian homelands every month. According to Senator Jack Reed, "the generals are feeling the pressure of the growing fragmentation of the country."

The upshot is that while oil revenues have to be divvied up from the center, fewer Americans in Washington believe there is much hope for a strong, functioning central government in Baghdad. (America's representatives in Baghdad may disagree.) The whole debate is moving in the direction of decentralization and federalism. And the real question is not whether the center will give way to the regions, it's whether Iraqi society is so atomized that the regions too are ungovernable.

DOJ_NMG_0093071

The folks in the Bush administration have a reputation for stubbornly staying the course. In fact, the Bush staffers are producing more churn and fresh thinking than anyone gives them credit for. And today, the most radical thinking is within the administration. One official described a future U.S. role that sounds less like a normal fight against an enemy and more, to use my metaphor, like an effort to corral six violent tigers who are constantly having feral cubs. The trick is to carefully define American interests in the midst of this chaos, the official said, and to focus on the tasks that directly impinge on those interests.

In every call I made last week, I heard anguish, open-mindedness and a genuine desire to put aside partisan feuds. Most of all, I heard Democrats and Republicans who know a lot about Iraq, and who are honest about the grim reality, but who haven't totally given in to the hopelessness that is so fashionable everywhere else.

Right Vision, Wrong Policy -- And A Mideast Price To Pay (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

President Bush lost more than a midterm election and a cantankerous defense secretary last week. He also abandoned any lingering chance of remaking U.S. foreign policy into a radical force for democratic change in the Middle East and elsewhere.

He had to. The American electorate showed emphatically that it had lost faith in his party and his promises. Bush's refreshing generic denunciations of foreign dictators -- including those who played ball with Washington -- could not make up for his failure to produce positive visible results to support the rhetoric. He needed an immediate firebreak, and so he named Bob Gates to replace Don Rumsfeld at the Pentagon.

History's seemingly unlimited store of irony now makes Bush 43 the evident instrument of the resurgence of the "realist" school of foreign policy so beloved of Bush 41 and so regularly scorned by this president -- until he turned to it for salvation in Iraq and elsewhere.

Many will revel in this turn, and there is rough familial justice at work: Only the incompetence and discord of the past three years could cause reasonable people to welcome back with applause policymakers who failed to anticipate and then opposed the breakup of the Soviet Union; who were not realistic enough to see, much less prevent, the Balkans from plunging into flames; and who "coddled dictators from Beijing to Baghdad," as the Democrats once accurately described the handiwork of Brent Scowcroft, Bob Gates and Jim Baker under Bush 41.

So hold the champagne and cheers for the return of "realism," a word that has even less meaning than most of the labels that politicians, journalists and academics attach to schools of foreign policy. It is too often a euphemism for cynicism, for playing for time and for passing up big opportunities that carry high risks and potentially great rewards. Bush 43 took such a risk in Iraq and now pays the price for failing to develop anything resembling a Plan B.

Replacing Rumsfeld's abrasiveness and his now-aborted designs for military transformation with the safe hands and bureaucratic blandness of Gates, an ex-CIA chief formed by the Cold War, may give the White House a chance to get control of an interagency process that went off the rails in Iraq. One of Rumsfeld's last internal victories was to block an effort by Josh Bolten, Bush's chief of staff, to bring Gen. David Petraeus into the White House to coordinate Iraq policy.

But the problems of Iraq are so deep today that improved policy coordination in Washington will not fix them. That will become even clearer in mid-December when the Iraq Study Group headed by Baker and Democrat Lee Hamilton is due to deliver its findings and recommendations and, in the process, provide Bush with a second firebreak from rising opposition to the war.

Baker is, in fact, the smartest political operator Washington has seen in the past three decades. So he is too clever to put much stock in abstractions such as "realism" or "Wilsonian" democracy. The clearest foreign policy achievements of the Bush 41 administration turned on Baker's relentless dealmaking, from the Madrid Middle East peace conference to German reunification and management of the consequences of the Soviet collapse in Eastern Europe.

But even Baker will have to struggle to keep the faux realism of conventional thinking on the Middle East from making the study group's report instantly irrelevant. There was a time when let's-pretend policies -- championing regional or international peace conferences doomed to go nowhere, or naming special U.S. envoys to give Arab rulers a bone to toss to their publics -- usefully bought time, even though they were anything but realistic for the long term.

For better and for worse, the invasions of Afghanistan and Iraq, Iran's quest for nuclear weapons, and the bloody breakdown of Israel's occupation of the Palestinians have accelerated a profound radicalization of the Middle East that had already been unleashed by the pressures of globalization. Trying to get back to the 1990s is another bridge to nowhere.

Baker-Hamilton will certainly recommend that the United States urgently develop the regional and international structures to guide change that Bush has neglected, and the president must act on that advice.

DOJ_NMG_0093072

But Bush's going on the defensive does not mean that the radical positive changes he had hoped for cannot come about on their own, even if on a different timetable and with much greater costs than he ever imagined. True realism lies in recognizing that his diagnosis of a crumbling order in the Middle East was sound, even if his prescriptions were not.

Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 33 In Baghdad, As Police Search For 50 Kidnap Victims (AP)

By Qais al-Bashir

AP, November 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a police recruiting center in Baghdad early Sunday, killing at least 33 people and wounding 56, police said.

Crowds of recruits were gathering outside the center in western Baghdad's Nissur Square when the bomber detonated explosives strapped to his body, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said.

He said the death toll was expected to rise because many of the injuries were extremely serious.

The attack was one of several on Sunday in the capital, where sectarian violence kills scores each week. Just south of the city, police were searching for gunmen who killed 10 Shiite travelers and kidnapped about 50 others Saturday night along a notoriously dangerous stretch of highway.

Earlier Sunday, a pair of roadside bombings targeting police patrols in Baghdad killed at least six civilians and wounded six others, said police Cap. Mohammed Abdul-Ghani.

A car bomb outside a market in Baghdad's primarily Shiite downtown Karradah killed at least one person and wounded five others, while a similar bomb killed two people and injured 13 in the mainly Sunni neighborhood of Radhwaniyah, Police 1st. Lt. Thaer Mahoud said.

Unknown gunmen also shot and killed police Brig. Abdul-Mutalib Hassan as he was leaving his Karradah home for work. Hassan had been head of a police unit in charge of registering vehicles that is widely seen as a source of corruption.

Five people were killed in drive by shootings in different parts of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. The victims included a teacher, taxi driver, laborer, truck driver and phone company worker, provincial police said.

Patrols were looking for the Sunni gunmen who ambushed a convoy of minibuses at a fake checkpoint near the volatile town of Latifiyah, about 20 miles south of Baghdad in the so-called Triangle of Death.

The gunmen murdered 10 Shiite passengers before taking their captives to an unknown location, said the spokesman, who asked that his name not be used because he wasn't authorized to speak to media.

A leading Shiite politician warned that local tribes had armed themselves and were headed to the area to join in the search, a move likely to set off even greater bloodshed.

In an address to parliament, Abdul-Karim al-Anzi said the kidnappers had worn Iraqi army uniforms. He complained that security forces were doing little to capture the hostages.

"We demand that the government take quick action to send troops there in order to know the fate of those kidnapped," al-Anzi said.

Along with those killed, five bodies -- all blindfolded and bound at the wrists and ankles -- had also been recovered in various parts of eastern Baghdad early Sunday, police said. All had been mutilated by torture, marking them as victims of death squads that regularly kidnap rivals from Iraq's Muslim Sunni and Shiite sects.

Three more bodies were pulled from the Tigris River in Suwayrah, 25 miles south of Baghdad, morgue official Maamoun al-Ajili said.

U.S. forces, meanwhile, said they detained 10 people suspected of having links to al-Qaida in a raid in Baghdad early Saturday.

The military said no one was killed or wounded in the raid, and that those detained were "associated with terrorists who are involved in the housing, movement and enabling of foreign fighters, to include the organization of suicide operations within Baghdad."

Iraqi Sunnis Kill 10 Shiites, Kidnap 50 Others (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- Sunni gunmen ambushed a convoy of minibuses Saturday night at a fake checkpoint on a highway south of Baghdad, killing 10 Shiite passengers and kidnapping about 50.

Across the country at least 52 other people were killed in violence or were found dead, five of them decapitated Iraqi soldiers.

Police said the mass kidnapping and killing was near Latifiyah, about 20 miles south of Baghdad in the so-called Triangle of Death.

DOJ_NMG_0093073

Shiite Muslims, a minority in that district, have routinely come under attack from Sunni insurgents who control the territory. The highway passing through the region from Baghdad leads to Najaf, the holiest Shiite city in Iraq.

Shiite pilgrims have become a favorite target of Sunni gunmen, although it was not immediately known where the victims of Saturday night's assault were headed.

Sectarian revenge killings, many thought to involve police and Iraqi troops, have left morgues full across a wide swath of the country.

There were no reported deaths among America's 152,000 service men and women in Iraq on Saturday. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, oversaw a Veterans Day ceremony at which 75 members of the armed forces from 33 countries were sworn in as American citizens.

In Baghdad, eight people died and at least 38 were wounded when two bombs hidden under parked cars exploded among noontime shoppers in downtown Baghdad's Hafidh al-Qadhi square. Police and a medical workers said at least 38 others were injured in the explosion at the formerly bustling area on the eastern bank of the Tigris River.

A Slovak and Polish soldier were reported killed overnight by a roadside bomb. Slovakian defense ministry spokesman Vladimir Gemela said the two died when their vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb near Kut, 100 miles southeast of Baghdad where coalition troops have fought fighters with the Mahdi Army militia loyal to the radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The deaths marked the 18th among Polish troops and fourth among those from Slovakia, which has about 100 troops in Iraq operating jointly with the 900 Polish troops in the country.

Slovakia's Prime Minister Robert Fico has said his country will pull its troops out of Iraq in February.

Baghdad police 1st Lt. Thayer Mahmud said his men found 25 corpses dumped in several parts of the capital in the 24 hours from 6 p.m. Friday.

A Samarra police captain, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he feared retribution, said the city morgue had received the beheaded bodies five soldiers who were kidnapped last week in the Meshahda area, 20 miles north of the capital.

Sectarian Rifts Foretell Pitfalls Of Iraqi Troops' Taking Control (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

BAQUBA, Iraq — It did not take long for Col. Brian D. Jones to begin to have doubts about the new Iraqi commander.

The commander, Brig. Gen. Shakir Hulail Hussein al-Kaabi, was chosen this summer by the Shiite-led government in Baghdad to lead the Iraqi Army's Fifth Division in Diyala Province. Within weeks, General Shakir went to Colonel Jones with a roster of people he wanted to arrest.

On the list were the names of nearly every Sunni Arab sheik and political leader whom American officers had identified as crucial allies in their quest to persuade Sunnis to embrace the political process and turn against the powerful Sunni insurgent groups here.

"Where's the evidence?" Colonel Jones demanded of General Shakir. "Where's the proof? What makes us suspect these guys? None of that stuff exists."

To that, Colonel Jones recalled, the Iraqi commander replied simply, "I got this from Baghdad."

The incident was one of many that alarmed Colonel Jones, who just completed a yearlong tour as commander of American forces in Diyala. In the end, he said, he concluded that the Iraqi general's real ambition was to destroy the Sunni political movement here — possibly on orders from Baghdad.

"I believe this is a larger plan to make Diyala a Shia province, rather than a Sunni province," he said.

Diyala is known as "little Iraq," because of its volatile mix of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. With its lush groves of date palms and abundant oil reserves, it is emerging as a crucial strategic territory in the sectarian struggle now gripping the country.

Long a stronghold of the insurgency — Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, was killed in a house only miles from here — Diyala is now teeming with Shiite militiamen who have rushed in from Baghdad in recent months to protect the Shiite population from attacks. Once considered by American officials to be relatively pacified, it has become a cauldron of violence carried out by insurgents and militias, intensified by sectarian-influenced security forces.

As pressures for a phased United States withdrawal build, the experiences of American commanders over the past year in Diyala provide a window on the possible consequences of ceding authority to the Iraqi Army.

And with the civilian homicide rate in Diyala now running at about 10 killings a day, according to United States officials, compared with 4 a day in April, the commanders' experiences form a cautionary tale.

In July, the United States turned over "lead responsibility" for security in Diyala to the Iraqi Fifth Army Division. But within months, facing heavy violence and evidence of sectarian activities by the Iraqi Army, American commanders shelved plans to turn over full operational control of the Fifth Division to the Iraqi government on Oct. 1. "Recent operations conducted by the Fifth Iraqi Army seem to be focused strictly on the Sunnis," said Maj. Gen. Benjamin R. Mixon, division commander for northern Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0093074

American commanders are now hoping for a spring transfer of control, General Mixon said, adding that they are conducting a wide-ranging investigation into allegations of death squad involvement and other activities by the Fifth Division under General Shakir. The Iraqi general denies treating Sunnis unfairly and says he has no knowledge of death squads in Diyala. "We don't favor one side," he said.

General Mixon said: "He's either failing to supervise closely enough to know what's going on, or he's directly involved in it. One or the other. There can't be any in between."

A Contagion of Violence

Much of Baquba, a provincial capital of 400,000, is now dusty and lifeless, with boarded-up stores and charred wrecks of cars and trucks strewn about.

"Baquba is a dead city, controlled by Al Qaeda," said Sameerah Shibli, a Diyala journalist. "They stop all life."

Security has sharply deteriorated in this province of 1.4 million people in the past year, for reasons that go well beyond the sphere of General Shakir. The sectarian violence that exploded in Baghdad, after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, has spread like a contagion to other regions.

Shiite death squads in Baghdad have forced many Sunnis to flee to Baquba, 35 miles to the north, where some have joined the insurgency and have begun attacking Shiites.

"The Sunni have driven the Shia out of Baquba," said Lt. Col. Thomas Fisher, commander of the 1-68 Combined Arms Battalion, which left Baquba in early November after a yearlong deployment. "They have come from Baghdad, driven out by Shiites there."

Many Shiites are completing the circle, he said, fleeing to Baghdad or farther south.

Sunnis in Baquba now slaughter Shiites simply to avenge the killings of Sunnis in Baghdad, said Baquba's mayor, Khalid al-Sinjari, a Sunni. "They kill in Baghdad, we kill in Baquba," he said.

But now the Shiites also kill in Baquba. The Mahdi Army, a militia allied with the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, has 6,000 to 8,000 members in Diyala, said Ali Khazim al-Hamdan, an official in Mr. Sadr's Diyala political office. That includes social service workers as well as armed fighters, mostly in the cities of Muqdadiya, about 25 miles northeast of Baquba, and Khan Bani Saad, 12 miles south of Baquba, where the threats are greatest, he said.

"Their goal is to protect Shia in Diyala," he said. "If my brothers are killed, we have to react to that."

The growing militia presence combined with the sectarian turn by Iraqi commanders will increasingly leave the Sunnis with only one source of protection, Colonel Jones said: terrorist groups like Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia and Ansar al-Sunna.

"We are really painting them into a box here," he said. "If you want to have a fight for the next 20 years, it's here. I can't imagine anybody who has seen war who wants that to happen. It's the innocents, it's these farmers out here, it's these kids who pay the price. But these interests are colliding and they don't care about that. Power is what they're going after, consolidated and uncontested political power."

"I think the sectarian war is coming this way," he added.

Sectarian Harassment

Despite a population that is 50 percent Sunni Arab, Diyala has a Shiite-dominated government, because many Sunnis boycotted provincial elections last year. Now, much of the provincial police leadership appears to be allied with Shiite militias, American commanders say.

The Diyala police chief, Ghassan al-Bawi, "is stacking the deck in a sectarian manner," Colonel Jones said. "We believe there are death squads that are operating, if not sponsored by the police, certainly with the knowledge of the police."

In recent months, American commanders say, the most senior Iraqi Army and police leaders have ignored growing Shiite militia activity, provoking retaliatory attacks by Sunni insurgents, like the ambush and killing of 35 police officers in October in attacks near the city of Khan Bani Saad.

And General Shakir continued to harass Sunnis, the Americans said. In late September, troops led by General Shakir arrested 400 people, nearly all of them Sunnis, during raids in Baquba. Colonel Fisher estimated that there was reasonable justification to detain perhaps 10 percent of them.

He said the raids, which enraged the Sunni community, prompted American commanders to require General Shakir to clear all operations with them — a step back from the July 3 transfer of "lead" authority to the Iraqis. Nevertheless, while the Iraqi Fifth Division remains under the United States chain of command, American officers say that General Shakir is not fully complying with their instructions.

DOJ_NMG_0093075

On Oct. 14, for example, commanders got word of what they said was a rogue Iraqi operation aimed at a Sunni sheik who had become an ally of the Americans in Khan Bani Saad. General Shakir never received approval for the operation, but ordered it anyway, Colonel Jones said.

After learning of the raid, American officers sent troops to force the Iraqis to return to base. When Sunni fighters saw the Americans arrive in the same sort of Humvees that the Iraqi soldiers use, they opened fire, Colonel Fisher said. The Americans returned fire and killed seven insurgents, he said.

General Shakir said he was not aware of the firefight.

American commanders also say the security forces are intimidating and arresting Sunnis who could be contenders for high political office — perhaps with an eye to welding Diyala eventually into a Shiite-dominated autonomous region under Iraq's new federalism law. That law would allow provinces to form into semi-independent states with wide powers over internal security.

"It just seems to be a deliberate attempt to make sure that the Sunnis are unable to organize politically here and represent themselves well in the next round of elections," Colonel Jones said, "because there is an awful lot at stake in this province."

General Shakir sought the arrest of Sheik Atta Hadi al-Sadoun, a general under Saddam Hussein, immediately after the sheik began to talk about running for governor, said Lt. Col. Frank Muggeo, who commanded a team advising an Iraqi Army brigade in Baquba.

Recently, Iraqi Army officials lured Sheik Atta to a meeting, where they arrested him. General Shakir was preparing to transfer the sheik to Baghdad when Colonel Jones intervened, he said, ordering the sheik into American custody because he feared he would be killed in Baghdad. "We saved his life," he said.

The Americans released the sheik for lack of evidence, Colonel Fisher said. But the sheik's nephew, who drove his uncle to the meeting and was seen leaving with General Shakir's men, is missing and feared dead, he said.

General Shakir said Sheik Atta remained a Saddam Hussein loyalist and had threatened Shiites. "One of my officers says Atta is worse than Zarqawi," he said.

Four Sunni police commanders and two key lieutenants have been killed in the past eight weeks, Colonel Jones said. A Sunni deputy police chief, he said, refuses to come to work because he believes "they're going to kill him."

Reports of detainee abuse in Iraqi Army facilities soared after General Shakir took over, Colonel Jones added, saying evidence shows some detainees were beaten and subjected to electrical shocks.

What is particularly disappointing for American officers is that there were two highly capable and even-handed brigade commanders serving directly under General Shakir — Brig. Gen. Rahman Challab al-Janabi in Muqdadiya and Brig. Gen. Saman Talabani in Baquba.

General Rahman was fired by General Shakir in late October, and General Talabani, who said he was frustrated with serving under General Shakir, has told United States officers that he expects that he will have to give up his command. During a recent operation he grabbed a radio and, in a reference to the militia led by Mr. Sadr, screamed at General Shakir, saying that he was not an Iraqi commander but a "Mahdi Army commander."

General Talabani, a Kurd, said he believed that General Shakir took orders from Mr. Sadr. "He's working for Moktada," he said. "He's working just for the Shia people."

He also said aides to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, a Shiite who to a great extent owes his position to backing from Mr. Sadr, had made it clear that they supported General Shakir.

In an interview, General Shakir — recently promoted by Baghdad to major general despite the American inquiry into his activities — said he was committed to fighting terrorists anywhere in Iraq, regardless of their sect.

He insisted that he pursued Shiite outlaws as aggressively as he pursued Sunnis. If he is given the names of Shiite militiamen, he said, he will order troops to seize them.

General Mixon said senior American commanders had told Iraqi officials of their grave concerns about General Shakir. Nevertheless, a spokesman for the Defense Ministry insisted that it had "received no complaints against him, nor have we had any bad indications."

Officials are "pleased" with General Shakir, and the descriptions by United States commanders in Diyala are incorrect, said the ministry spokesman, Mohammed al-Askari.

Tension Between Partners

During a recent joint American-Iraqi raid in a Shiite neighborhood of Abu Sayda, near Baquba, Iraqi troops stood around when they were supposed to be charging into homes. American soldiers, frustrated that the mission to apprehend men involved in sectarian violence was lagging, screamed and cursed at the Iraqis.

"Shoot them in the butt! Shoot them in the butt!" one yelled. "They're not motivated."

A 22-year-old platoon leader, Second Lt. Andrew Graziano, stepped up, barking orders and showing the Iraqis how to pound on doors.

DOJ_NMG_0093076

After the raid some American officers said the Iraqi soldiers did not want to search Shiite homes. Lieutenant Graziano defended the Iraqis, saying their performance improved after a "stumble." But he conceded that a pullout of United States troops would leave Diyala in grave peril.

"It would be real bad," he said. "We all know that."

Lieutenant Graziano's unit, the Second Squadron of the Ninth Cavalry Regiment, put together evidence linking Iraqi officers to death squads after the squadron took over a base in August near Muqdadiya.

Led by Lt. Col. Louis Lartigue, the squadron detained the current and former commanders of the major crimes unit of the Muqdadiya police force and accused them of running death squads. They also arrested an Iraqi Army battalion commander in connection with death squad activity.

Troops also identified an Iraqi captain, now on the run and thought to be in Basra, who Colonel Jones said had been placed in his army job by General Shakir and is now believed to have led death squads in Muqdadiya.

"As we got into it, there were guys more than just partial to the Shia," Colonel Lartigue said. "They were criminals." He said General Shakir should be removed for "poor generalship," if nothing else. "It would be a little like getting Al Capone on tax evasion," he said.

But it is not clear whether anyone other than the Iraqi leaders can remove a commander of his rank, and even that would still leave Diyala with abundant problems.

"The U.S. Army is past the point where we say, 'Fire this guy,' " Colonel Jones said. "All we can say is, 'Hey, this guy is bad. Iraqi government, what are you going to do about it?' "

"We're going out on a low note," added Colonel Jones, whose unit, the Third Heavy Brigade Combat Team of the Fourth Infantry Division, is returning to Fort Carson, Colo. "We are very frustrated because we were so close to getting this thing moving in what we thought was the right direction. Now, the army and I believe the police are moving against this direction.

"This is a tipping point. If we demonstrate to the Sunnis that we are not going to remove Shakir and that we are going to allow him to do business as usual, then they're going to lose faith in us and faith in the reconciliation process. And this thing is going to go kinetic in a big way."

In Gates Selection, White House Hopes To Close Rift Between State And Defense (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Scott Shane

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 — President Bush selected Robert M. Gates as his new defense secretary in part to close a long-running rift between the Defense Department and the State Department that has hobbled progress on Iraq, keeping the two agencies at odds on issues ranging from reconstruction to detaining terrorism suspects, according to White House officials and members of Mr. Gates's inner circle.

While Mr. Gates, a former director of central intelligence, had long been considered for a variety of roles, over the past two months Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, quietly steered the White House toward replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld with Mr. Gates, who had worked closely with Ms. Rice under the first President Bush. One senior participant in those discussions, who declined to be identified by name while talking about internal deliberations, said, "everyone realizes that we don't have much time to get this right" and the first step is to get "everyone driving on the same track."

White House officials said that goal may be difficult to accomplish in the seventh year of an administration. Ms. Rice and Mr. Rumsfeld never managed to resolve their differences, especially after their arguments over the handling of the occupation came into public view in late summer 2003. As national security adviser during Mr. Bush's first term, Ms. Rice was unable to halt a war between the State Department and the Pentagon that put senior officials in the departments in a state of constant conflict.

The question now is whether it is simply too late to achieve President Bush's goal of a stable and democratic Iraq, even if Mr. Gates and Ms. Rice are able to work together as smoothly in altering policy as they did 15 years ago on a very different kind of problem, managing the American response to the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

A few members of the Iraq Study Group — the commission created in March at the urging of members of Congress and led by James A. Baker III, from which Mr. Gates stepped down on Friday — have wondered aloud in recent days whether the insurgency and sectarian conflict in Iraq may be too far advanced to reverse. The group will consult with the British prime minister, Tony Blair, by video on Tuesday and is due to present recommendations to the White House and Congress in December.

And while Mr. Gates, who faces Senate confirmation hearings at roughly the same time, is considered far less combative and contrarian than Mr. Rumsfeld, he has a long-ago history of conflict with secretaries of state, most notably George P. Shultz, who objected to Mr. Gates's hawkish views of the Soviet Union and once tried to have him fired.

DOJ_NMG_0093077

He is being thrust into the job at a moment when Democrats, newly empowered by their control of the House and the Senate, are promising investigations into the conduct of the war in Iraq and demanding a far greater voice in Iraq policy.

Nor is it clear how Mr. Gates will deal with Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Cheney worked for years to protect Mr. Rumsfeld, who had hired him for his first government job, and the top echelons of the Defense Department have been peppered with Cheney protégés. Many of them have told associates they expect to be leaving, as Mr. Gates takes over with a mandate, in Mr. Bush's words, to approach the job with "fresh eyes."

White House officials would say little on the record about the deliberations that led to the selection of Mr. Gates, 63, the president of Texas A&M University. But on Friday, they rejected the conventional wisdom in Washington that his selection amounts to a resurrection of the advisers to Mr. Bush's father, or a resurgence of realism to rescue a war started with the ideological certainty that toppling Saddam Hussein would help spread democracy across the Middle East.

"It dumbs this whole thing down to say that this is the victory of the pragmatists over the ideologues," said Daniel Bartlett, the president's counselor, who took part in the secret decisions to oust Mr. Rumsfeld and bring in Mr. Gates. "We are going to be practical in some respects, and ideological in others. But we knew that we needed a defense secretary who could hit the ground running and who was very familiar with the challenges we face."

A national security official who served under Ms. Rice in President Bush's first term said she regularly consulted with Mr. Gates, particularly on intelligence matters. "When she needed to figure out what had gone wrong at the C.I.A., she turned to him," the official said.

Perhaps so, but Mr. Gates's friends say he will approach the current Iraq policy with a healthy skepticism. Joseph Nye, a Harvard professor and a Democrat who has known Mr. Gates for two decades and dealt with him on a variety of intelligence issues, describes him as "a realist, a conservative realist."

"He is open to evidence and less likely to be driven by fads, or the ideological certainties that sped this administration off course," Mr. Nye said. Mr. Gates's "frame of reference is more where Condoleezza Rice used to be, before the administration's excursion into democracy promotion."

In his memoirs, Mr. Gates writes of working with Ms. Rice, then a mid-level aide in the National Security Council, on a variety of projects, including the preparation of secret contingency plans in 1989 for the possibility that Mikhail S. Gorbachev might be overthrown and the Soviet Union descend into chaos.

Now, in a new partnership 17 years later, officials say their task is to guide Mr. Bush through even more treacherous waters: finding a way to stabilize Iraq, while devising options for the United States if the weak Iraqi government collapses or full-scale civil war breaks out.

All those possibilities have been debated by members of the Iraq Study Group. Mr. Gates was chosen as a Republican member of that commission by Mr. Baker, though the two occasionally clashed during the first Bush administration.

In his 1995 memoir, "The Politics of Diplomacy," Mr. Baker recounted his fury at learning in 1989 that Mr. Gates, then deputy national security adviser, intended to give a speech predicting that Mr. Gorbachev would not remain in power for much longer.

"When Gates had been at the C.I.A., he had given a speech that had completely undercut George Shultz on Soviet policy," Mr. Baker wrote. "That had hurt President Reagan then, and this would hurt George Bush now," he continued, referring to the first President Bush. Mr. Baker killed the speech.

In his long cold war experience as a C.I.A. director and deputy national security adviser, Mr. Gates never had to cope with an insurgency the size of the one that has erupted in Iraq, or devise a strategy for containing a battle between rival Islamic groups.

Last summer he told the Council on Foreign Relations that "we have the old line in the intelligence business that everything we want to know is divided into two categories: secrets and mysteries." Iraq, he said, "is very much the latter."

Yet together with Ms. Rice, Mr. Gates is expected to have to put into action recommendations by the study group that are likely to call for initiatives involving European allies and Iraq's neighbors in the Middle East. The new plans are expected to mix diplomacy, the training of Iraqi troops and the use of American force to quell the violence in Baghdad, and to require close coordination between the Departments of State and Defense.

"They needed someone who was not only capable but willing to try something new," said a former Gates colleague who has followed the process closely and who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Once these recommendations come out, some are going to be Gates's to carry out, and some are going to be Rice's."

Mr. Gates has at times been critical of Bush administration policies, most clearly in the case of how to deal with Iran, which administration officials fear is manipulating Shiite militias in Iraq. Along with Zbigniew Brzezinski, his former boss on President Jimmy Carter's National Security Council, he called in 2004 for a new approach, including talks with Tehran and expansion of and cultural contacts. So far, Mr. Bush has rejected most of that advice.

DOJ_NMG_0093078

“He defies labels,” said Bobby R. Inman, an old friend and former C.I.A. colleague of Mr. Gates. “His orientation is to solving problems.”

In 1994, he endorsed with some reservations the idea of missile strikes to take out North Korean nuclear facilities. “Unless they believe we can and will use our strength, there is little chance of influencing them,” he wrote. “A nuclear North Korea is the price we have paid to learn this lesson.”

Similarly, in 1997, he proposed “a powerful air and missile campaign” to prevent Saddam Hussein from acquiring unconventional weapons.

But in 1998, he took a less bellicose approach in a prescient article on terrorism, written after the bombings at American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. He said the United States had to consider “whether to make a war against terrorism our highest priority in foreign policy.”

He counseled caution, arguing that “retributive violence, no matter how massive, almost inevitably begets more violence against us in response.” He advised a combination of terrorist arrests, targeted military action and promotion of human rights and political freedom in the Middle East.

Bush Swaps Idealists For Realists (BBC)

By Jonathan Beale

BBC.com, November 11, 2006

Even the White House acknowledges that the result of the mid-term elections was in some way the American public's verdict on the direction of US foreign policy - particularly in Iraq.

Will a change in personnel mean a change in policy? Battered and bruised, the Bush administration is now under huge pressure to change direction.

The departure of Donald Rumsfeld is seen as one indication that the White House has listened to its critics. But it's clear that is not enough.

Democrats also want the president to change America's ambassador to the United Nations - John Bolton, a totem of the right.

And this is not just about a change of personnel - Democrats and many moderate Republicans want a change of policy too.

Enter the 'realists'

The departure of Mr Rumsfeld and the arrival of Robert Gates at the Pentagon is being interpreted as the end of the road for the ideologues and the re-entry into orbit of the foreign-policy "realists".

So-called "realists" are supposed to have a more nuanced view of the world.

They do not - like the so-called neo-conservatives - see everything in black and white terms.

Bush 41 - the current president's father - is seen as a "realist".

Mr Cheney and Ms Rice served Mr Bush's father as well So is his former Secretary of State, James Baker.

Mr Baker is currently reviewing the options in Iraq as the co-chair of the Iraq Study Group - of which Robert Gates is also a member.

Mr Baker has already stated that he believes there is an alternative between "staying the course" and "cut and run".

Zbigniew Brzezinski - National Security Adviser to President Carter - said he hopes that personnel changes at the White House will bring "a degree of rationality, common sense, balance and historical perspective" to the table.

But it's worth remembering that many of the first George Bush's senior advisers have been surrounding his son for the past six years.

Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice and Stephen Hadley were around when Bush 41 was in charge of the White House.

The newly appointed Mr Gates may be seen as more "moderate" than Donald Rumsfeld.

But he was a "hawk" in the cold war era.

No doubt the new arrivals will bring a fresh perspective to the White House.

But don't expect US forces to exit Iraq overnight or for Iran and Syria to be greeted with open arms.

Talking to the enemy?

However President Bush will now be encouraged to talk to the enemy.

Even before the defeat there was a growing chorus of senior diplomats, Democrats and even Republican voices calling on the Bush administration to engage with countries like Iran and Syria.

Mr Baker's new Iraq plan might involve talks with Iran or Syria Until now the Bush/Rice policy has been akin to telling the naughty boy in the classroom to face the corner - in the hope that everyone will ignore him until he repents and mends his ways.

So far in the case of Iran, Syria, North Korea and Venezuela, the policy appears to have had limited success.

DOJ_NMG_0093079

Mr Gates in the past has advocated talking to Iran.

But there is no guarantee that talking will get results either.

In truth, the Bush administration's foreign policy was already evolving.

The arrival of Condoleezza Rice at the State Department signalled an emphasis on diplomacy rather than a reliance on America's military might. (Colin Powell might have wished to use the tools of diplomacy, but he never had the ear of the president.)

That change was forced on an administration that faced international isolation after the Iraq war.

Democrats' dilemma

In the euphoria of victory the Democrats might be hoping for wholesale change.

But Congress has never had the final say on foreign policy.

The Democrats' new power may now make life more difficult for the president, but George Bush has already made it clear that he is not going to abandon his goal of defeating terrorism in Iraq or ease the pressure on North Korea and Iran.

There's a dilemma too for the Democrats.

They cannot afford to appear weak in the face of the threats that America faces if they are to have any chance of eventually taking the White House.

Gates Struggled Through The Iran-Contra Scandal (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — Robert Gates successfully navigated the legal and political perils of the Iran-Contra scandal. He emerged as CIA director and survived an ordeal that took a heavy toll on the first President Bush, the man perhaps most responsible for Gates' success.

George W. Bush now has designated Gates as Donald H. Rumsfeld's successor at the Pentagon, a job that will require the next defense secretary to find a different direction for the Iraq war, which has devastated the political fortunes of the Bush administration.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada says he has questions about Gates' involvement in Iran-Contra. Republicans plan to push the nomination through before they lose control in January.

Thomas Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a private group that has collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents on the scandal and published several books on it, calls Gates "the ultimate hear-no-evil see-no-evil high official during Iran-Contra."

In a final report, Iran-Contra prosecutor Lawrence Walsh said that, "like those of many other Iran-Contra figures, the statements of Gates often seemed scripted and less than candid."

In rebuttal, Gates said Walsh's 1994 report was "unjustifiably disparaging, unbalanced, filled with innuendo and insinuation, and draws conclusions not supported by the evidence."

Questions about Gates focus not on what he did in Iran-Contra, but on what he knew. CIA Director William Casey had his own parallel chain of command that excluded Gates. At the time, however, Gates was the agency's No. 2 official.

"You would think he had to know, but was he involved? No," former CIA officer Vincent Cannistraro said of Gates.

Former Democratic Sen. David Boren of Oklahoma, who presided over Gates' 1991 confirmation hearings, among the longest in Senate history, said Casey shut out Gates because he was "the kind of person who wouldn't have put up with what was going on."

The Iran-Contra affair plagued the final two years of Ronald Reagan's presidency and damaged the final political campaign of Bush's father. The scandal that broke out 20 years ago this month also bruised Gates' career, forcing him to withdraw his nomination as CIA director in 1987.

Gates soldiered on as the No. 2 official at the CIA, then went to the White House's National Security Council. Four years later, the first President Bush nominated him for the top CIA job.

Iran-Contra was the convergence of two covert operations run by the Reagan White House — selling arms to Iran in an effort to free U.S. hostages in Lebanon and supplying arms to the Contra guerrillas fighting the leftist government of Nicaragua.

NSC aide Oliver North oversaw the Contra resupply network during a congressional ban on military aid to the rebels.

Congress was kept in the dark. The two operations were exposed when a resupply plane was shot down over Nicaragua and when a Middle East newspaper disclosed the Iran initiative.

In 1991, as Gates prepared to testify at his confirmation hearings for the CIA, new evidence emerged that raised additional questions about whether he had told the truth in Iran-Contra.

DOJ_NMG_0093080

An ex-CIA officer alleged that he and at least three other CIA officials besides Casey had heard early on about the most explosive secret in the scandal — the diversion of profits from the Iran arms sales to the Contras.

The new evidence meant that at least five people above and below Gates knew about talk of a diversion in the summer before the secret surfaced. Had Gates known?

The president stood by him.

"Hey, you're my man. I'm all for you. ... don't let 'em get you down," Bush said he had assured the nominee.

As with Gates, the president was dogged by Iran-Contra. He spent the final weekend of his last political campaign answering renewed questions about his role in the scandal.

Bush had described himself as being "out of the loop" regarding opposition by two Cabinet officials to the secret arms-for-hostages deals with Iran.

The comment, however, was undercut by a reissued indictment showing that Bush, while vice president, participated in a meeting where the opposition he later denied knowing about had surfaced.

After losing the election five days later, the Bush campaign said the allegations had stopped the president's comeback in the polls.

At his Senate confirmation hearings in 1991, Gates handled Iran-Contra with a carefully crafted acknowledgment of responsibility. He also received some supportive testimony.

Gates said he simply had forgotten about being told by a CIA colleague about a diversion. The CIA official who told him said that was "quite easy to understand," adding that the information had been "very speculative."

Prosecutors said Gates' explanation that he did not recall the conversation is "to say the least ... disquieting.

"He had been told by a very senior officer that two of President Reagan's personal priorities were in danger — not something an ambitious deputy director of central intelligence would likely forget," the prosecutors' final report states.

In rebuttal, Gates said, "I did not engage in obstruction or willful misleading" and that the prosecutors' report "should have so stated."

Gates told prosecutors he was unaware North had an operational role in supporting the Contras. Gates said he believed North's activities were limited to putting Contra leaders in touch with wealthy American donors and to giving the Contras political advice.

Cannistraro, who dealt with both Gates and North, says "I find it almost impossible that Gates wouldn't know what I knew, and I knew a fair amount. He couldn't avoid knowing."

But Gates has said he did not know.

"A thousand times I would go over the 'might-have-beens,'" Gates wrote in his memoirs. "I was new to the job and was trying to learn the ropes while all this was going on."

How (Not) To Run The Pentagon (WP)

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Robert M. Gates, the former CIA director tapped by President Bush to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary, would bring to the Pentagon some clear ideas about how to lead and reform unwieldy public institutions. In a recent speech at Texas A&M University, where Gates serves as president, the nominee cautioned against new leaders arbitrarily imposing their ambitious agendas, only to witness the reversal of their efforts immediately after they leave.

"It is a fact of life in institutions that leaders come and go. Sometimes when they leave, there is regret among the professionals and staff who remain. More often, the celebrations begin before the departing executive's taillights are out of sight. Some leaders arrive with ambitious agendas and seek to impose them by fiat -- unilaterally and from above. They usually provoke either paralyzing opposition and internal warfare, or see the reversal of every action immediately after their departure. We can all think of specific examples of both at other universities over the last year or two.

What, then, is the formula for successful leadership in public institutions, above all a great university? I believe it begins with a leader's recognition that his or her time in office is finite and that the institution and those who carry out its mission endure. They were there long before the leader arrived, and will be there long after he or she departs. Whether at CIA or at a university, the professionals outlast both good and bad leaders.

I have long believed that the secret to successful leadership of public institutions -- especially in leading change -- is the involvement in decision-making of those who carry out the institution's mission: involvement in setting the agenda, involvement in shaping options, involvement in decisions, and involvement in implementation."

-- Robert M. Gates, Sept. 8, 2006

The Donald Rumsfeld I Know (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0093081

By Douglas J. Feith

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Much of what you know about Donald Rumsfeld is wrong.

I worked intimately with Rumsfeld for four years, from the summer of 2001 until I left the Pentagon in August 2005. Through countless meetings and private conversations, I came to learn his traits, frame of mind and principles -- characteristics wholly at odds with the standard public depiction of Rumsfeld, particularly now that he has stepped down after a long, turbulent tenure as defense secretary, a casualty of our toxic political climate.

I know that Don Rumsfeld is not an ideologue. He did not refuse to have his views challenged. He did not ignore the advice of his military advisers. And he did not push single-mindedly for war in Iraq. He was motivated to serve the national interest by transforming the military, though it irritated people throughout the Pentagon. Rumsfeld's drive to modernize created a revealing contrast between his Pentagon and the State Department, where Colin Powell was highly popular among the staff. After four years of Powell's tenure at State, the organization chart there would hardly tip anyone off that 9/11 had occurred -- or even that the Cold War was over.

Rumsfeld is a bundle of paradoxes, like a fascinating character in a work of epic literature. And as my high school teachers drummed into my head, the best literature reveals that humans are complex. They are not the all-good or all-bad, all-brilliant or all-dumb figures that inhabit trashy novels and news stories. Fine literature teaches us the difference between appearance and reality.

Because of his complexity, Rumsfeld is often misread. His politics are deeply conservative, but he was radical in his drive to force change in every area he oversaw. He is strong-willed and hard-driving, but he built his defense strategies and Quadrennial Defense Reviews on calls for intellectual humility.

Those of us in his inner circle heard him say, over and over again: Our intelligence, in all senses of the term, is limited. We cannot predict the future. We must continually question our preconceptions and theories. If events contradict them, don't suppress the bad news; rather, change your preconceptions and theories.

If an ideologue is someone to whom the facts don't matter, then Rumsfeld is the opposite of an ideologue. He insists that briefings for him be full of facts, thoughtfully organized and rigorously sourced. He demands that facts at odds with his key policy assumptions be brought to his attention immediately. "Bad news never gets better with time," he says, and berates any subordinate who fails to rush forward to him with such news. He does not suppress bad news; he acts on it.

In late 2002, Pentagon lawyers told Rumsfeld that the detainee interrogation techniques in the old Army field manual were well within the bounds of the Geneva Conventions and U.S. statutes. Detainee information could help us prevent another terrorist attack, and al-Qaeda personnel were trained to resist standard interrogations. So, with the advice of counsel, military officers at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, asked Rumsfeld to authorize additional techniques thought to fall safely within the bounds of the law. He did so.

Less than a month later, in December 2002, Jim Haynes, the Defense Department's general counsel, brought him the disturbing news that some lawyers in the military departments questioned the legality of the additional techniques. Rumsfeld did not brush off the questions or become defensive. In short order, he directed Haynes to revoke the authority for the new techniques. He told him to gather all the relevant lawyers in the department and review the matter -- and he would not approve any new techniques until that review was completed. It took almost four months.

I was impressed by how quickly Haynes brought the information to Rumsfeld and how Rumsfeld changed course upon receiving it. It seemed to me that if the country's leading civil libertarians had been in on the meetings with us, they would have approved of the way Rumsfeld handled the service lawyers' dissent. This story bears telling because when the cruel and sexually bizarre behavior at Abu Ghraib occurred many months later, critics inaccurately depicted Rumsfeld as disrespectful of laws on detainee treatment.

Rumsfeld's drive to overhaul the Pentagon -- to drop outdated practices and modes of thought -- antagonized many senior military officers and civilian officials in the department. He pushed for doing more with less. He pushed for reorganizing offices and relationships to adapt to a changing world. After 9/11, he created the Northern Command (the first combatant command that included the U.S. homeland within its area of responsibility), a new undersecretary job for intelligence and a new assistant secretary job for homeland defense. Improving civil-military cooperation, Rumsfeld devised new institutions for the Pentagon's top civilian and military officials to work face to face on strategic matters and new venues for all of them to gather a few times a year with the combatant commanders. He also conceived and pushed through a thorough revision of how U.S. military forces are based, store equipment, move and train with partners around the world -- something that was never done before in U.S. history.

When he told organizations to take on new missions, their instinct -- typical of bureaucracies -- was to say they needed more people and more money. Rumsfeld responded: If changes in the world require us to do new things, those changes must also allow us to curtail or end old missions that we continue for no good reason. He made numerous major changes in the Defense Department at the cost of goring a lot of oxen.

DOJ_NMG_0093082

On Iraq, Rumsfeld helped President Bush analyze the dangers posed by Saddam Hussein's regime. Given Hussein's history -- starting wars; using chemical weapons against foreign and domestic enemies; and training, financing and otherwise supporting various terrorists -- Rumsfeld helped make the case that leaving him in power entailed significant risks. But in October 2002, Rumsfeld also wrote a list of the risks involved in removing Hussein from power. (I called the list his "parade of horribles" memo.) He reviewed it in detail with the president and the National Security Council. Rumsfeld's warnings about the dangers of war -- including the perils of a post-Hussein power vacuum -- were more comprehensive than anything I saw from the CIA, State or elsewhere.

Though we knew that the risks involved in ousting Hussein were high, it hardly means that Bush made the wrong decision to invade. I believe he made the correct call; we had grounds to worry about the threats Hussein posed, especially after 9/11 reduced our tolerance for security risks. But Rumsfeld helped the president see that he had no risk-free option for dealing with the dangers Hussein posed.

Rumsfeld has been attacked for insisting that troop levels for the Iraq operation be kept low, supposedly out of ideology and contrary to the advice of the military. What I saw, however, was that Rumsfeld questioned standard military recommendations for "overwhelming force." He asked if such force was necessary for the mission. And he asked what the consequences might be of having a large footprint in Iraq and playing into propaganda about the United States wanting to take over the country.

But Rumsfeld never told Gen. John Abizaid or Gen. Tommy Franks that U.S. Central Command could not have the number of troops that the commanders deemed necessary. Rumsfeld is more politically sensitive than that -- he would never expose himself to the risk of a commander later saying that he had denied him the forces needed. If other generals are unhappy with the troop levels in Iraq, the problem is not that they failed to persuade Rumsfeld, but that they failed to persuade Abizaid or Franks.

Historians will sort out whether Rumsfeld was too pushy with his military, or not pushy enough; whether he micromanaged Ambassador L. Paul Bremer and the Coalition Provisional Authority, or gave them too much slack. I know more about these issues than most people, yet I don't have all the information for a full analysis. I do know, however, that the common view of Rumsfeld as a close-minded man, ideologically wedded to the virtues of a small force, is wrong.

Rumsfeld had to resign, I suppose, because the bitter political debate of recent years has turned him into a symbol. His effectiveness was damaged. For many in Congress and the public, the Rumsfeld caricature dominated their view of the Iraq war and the administration's ability to prosecute it successfully. Even if nominee Robert Gates pursues essentially the same strategy, he may command more public confidence.

What Rumsfeld believed, said and did differs from the caricature. The public picture of him today is drawn from news accounts reflecting the views of people who disapproved of his policies or disliked him. Rumsfeld, after all, can be brutally demanding and tough. But I believe history will be more appreciative of him than the first draft has been. What will last is serious history, which, like serious literature, can distinguish appearance from reality.

Douglas J. Feith, a professor at Georgetown University, served as undersecretary of defense for policy from 2001 to 2005.

Rumsfeld's Self-inflicted Wounds (LAT)

By Frederick W. Kagan, Frederick W. Kagan Is A Resident Scholar At The American Enterprise Institute And The Author Of "Fin

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

The outgoing defense secretary was too focused on transforming the military, and failed to plan for achieving political goals in Iraq.

DONALD RUMSFELD had the chance to be one of the great American heroes of all time. He held office at a moment of enormous danger. He had many admirable qualities necessary for success. But like the tragic heroes of old, hubris and inflexibility made vices of his virtues, leading to his own fall and the collapse of his life's work.

Rumsfeld was in many ways ideally suited to be secretary of Defense in the wake of 9/11. His experience in the same position under President Ford and as ambassador to NATO seemed to fit him to the task of overseeing a complex military coalition. His determination and self-confidence were essential in a wartime secretary — and unusual in recent times. When he showed, early in his tenure, that he meant to take positive control of the Pentagon's sprawling bureaucracy, many observers cheered. This was precisely the sort of man the nation needed at the military's helm at a time of crisis.

As former CIA Director Robert Gates prepares to succeed Rumsfeld, the chorus is already rising to declare that Gates must be more open to advice from the military, more of a consensus-builder than a tyrant. Perhaps. It isn't clear how a more open secretary of Defense would have fared given the advice the military gave Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0093083

Belief in the value of technology and the need for light, swift ground forces pervaded the senior military leadership in the 1990s. Then-Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki had launched an ambitious program to "lighten" the Army and equip it with advanced precision weapons. Shinseki certainly warned that more troops would be needed to secure Iraq in the wake of major combat operations. But Gen. Tommy Franks, the commander who developed and executed the actual war plan, wanted fewer. Many officers opposed the "light footprint" approach with which Rumsfeld tackled the problem of the Iraqi insurgency — but not Gen. John Abizaid, who took over from Franks right after the end of major combat operations. A secretary of Defense who encouraged discussion and dissent would have perhaps anticipated more of the flaws in the policies he was proposing. Still, the strategy that has led to disaster in Iraq belonged to the commanders at least as much as to Rumsfeld. Scapegoating him in isolation will prevent us from learning the essential lessons of our recent failures.

For the problem with Rumsfeld was not his flawed managerial style, but his flawed understanding of war. Early in his term, he became captive of an idea. He would transform the U.S. military in accord with the most advanced theories of the 1990s to prepare it for the challenges of the future. He was not alone in his captivity. As a candidate, President Bush announced the same program in 1999 — long before anyone thought Don Rumsfeld would return as secretary of Defense. The program, quite simply, was to rely on information technology to permit American forces to locate, identify, track and destroy any target on the face of the Earth from thousands of miles away. Ideally, ground forces would not be necessary in future wars. If they were, it would be in small numbers, widely dispersed, moving rapidly and engaging in little close combat. This vision defined U.S. military theory throughout the 1990s, and it has gone deep into our military culture. Rumsfeld's advent hastened and solidified its triumph, but his departure will not lead instantly to its collapse.

At its root, this "transformation program" is not a program for war at all. War is the use of force to achieve a political purpose, against a thinking enemy and involving human populations. Political aims cannot normally be achieved simply by destroying targets. But the transformation that enthusiasts of the 1990s focused too narrowly on destroyed the enemy's military with small, lean and efficient forces. This captivated Rumsfeld, becoming his passion. He meant it to be his legacy. It was the fatal flaw in this vision that led, in part, to the debacle in Iraq. Focused on destroying the enemy's military quickly and efficiently, Rumsfeld refused to consider the political complexities that would follow that destruction. He and Franks pared the invasion force down to the smallest level that could defeat Saddam Hussein's army, but refused to consider the chaos that would follow the collapse of Hussein's government. This failure is inherent in the military thought of the 1990s. Rumsfeld did not invent it. He simply executed it.

Having made the mistake of failing to plan for achieving the political goals of the Iraq war, Rumsfeld then compounded his error. The war in Iraq threatened military transformation. It was expensive and sucked scarce defense resources away from transformational programs. It was manpowerintensive and hindered Rumsfeld's efforts to reorient the military away from a focus on land power. It was intellectually distracting; counterinsurgency has little to do with transformation. Here Rumsfeld's virtues became his greatest vices. Instead of recognizing the danger of losing Iraq, he remained committed to transforming the military to meet undefined future threats, spending billions of dollars preparing to fight Enemy X in 2025. He consistently opposed increasing the size of the ground forces, despite the obvious growing strains on the Army and the Marines of repeated deployments to Afghanistan and Iraq.

He fought to keep expensive weapons systems, such as the F-22 fighter jet and the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, which were billed as "transformational" because they used precision-guided munitions to strike remote targets. That money could have been used for better armored vehicles, more body armor and more soldiers. The same determination that had seemed so promising when he first took over became a stubborn refusal to change course in a storm.

Rumsfeld has paid a high price for this failure. He will not be known as the secretary of Defense who transformed the military, but as the secretary of Defense who, at best, nearly lost the Iraq war. Worse still, his stubbornness has destroyed the ground forces. The Army and Marines have worn out their equipment and their troops. Units must swap tanks and Humvees just to be able to train. The Army brass recently leaked the fact that only the units that are in Iraq or about to deploy to Iraq are combat-ready — an unprecedented military crisis. Rumsfeld leaves behind him a military far weaker and less capable than the one he took charge of in 2001.

The greatest irony of all is that the military Rumsfeld has destroyed is the one he created. He was secretary of Defense in the mid-1970s as the military was shifting from conscription to the all-volunteer force. He shepherded the volunteer military through its early growing pains and supported it valiantly against its many critics. Perfecting it through transformation was to be the culmination of his life's work. The damage he has done to it instead is his tragedy — and the nation's.

Now What? (NYT)

By Franklin Foer

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093084

ANDY CARD began his political ascent as George H. W. Bush's driver and carried forward a valet's mind-set into the job of White House chief of staff. Less a power broker than a punching bag, Card made it his mission to venture before the cameras to swallow blame for administration follies, like its catatonic response to Hurricane Katrina. And behind closed doors, his role was even more humiliating. The former Treasury secretary Paul O'Neill recalled George W. Bush interrupting a top-level meeting to issue Card an extremely urgent request: "You're the chief of staff. You think you're up to getting us some cheeseburgers?"

It is startling, therefore, to read Bob Woodward's portrayal of Card as the conscience of the Bush administration. In his telling, Card orchestrated a brave but doomed campaign to oust Donald Rumsfeld and change course in Iraq. Where other advisers evaded responsibility, Card constantly told the president, "You should not be afraid to change me." Card occupies considerable space in "State of Denial" and has dominated coverage of it. Such an unconventional portrait inevitably provokes a cynical explanation: that Woodward, amanuensis to the Washington stars, has once again uncritically transcribed someone's self-serving version of events.

Cynicism, however, trivializes the significance of Card's confessions. To have so many of the president's fiercest loyalists, like Card, testify to his incompetence — and with the ultimate Establishment journalist's tape recorder running — is itself a turning point. With two years to go, Woodward has written the Bush administration's version of "The Final Days."

He has retroactively bundled his books on the Bush White House into a trilogy. "State of Denial," the jacket tells us, is Part 3 of his "Bush at War" cycle. This is obvious sleight of hand. Woodward's first book provided so favorable a treatment of the administration that the Republican National Committee recommended it on its Web site. But "State of Denial" isn't a continuation of his previous work as much as a repudiation — the installment in which he takes a mulligan and attempts to correct for past obsequiousness.

Your standard volume of Woodward reportage could be titled "Everything That Happened Since My Last Book." But "State of Denial" deviates from this model. It doesn't even begin where his last Bush book, "Plan of Attack," left off — in the euphoric early days of the Iraq war. Instead, Woodward retraces his reportorial steps back to the moment George W. Bush first considered running for president, when his father called the Saudi ambassador, Prince Bandar bin Sultan, down to Austin to provide his boy a foreign policy tutorial. And Bandar initiates the book's flood of unflattering details. According to him, Bush exclaimed, "I don't have the foggiest idea about what I think about international, foreign policy." (Domestic foreign policy was another matter.)

Where Bush appeared resolute in the first two installments of Woodward's trilogy, he now comes across as a "Saturday Night Live" version of himself. He cracks fart jokes with Karl Rove and conspires to play a prank on the current Federal Reserve chairman. Woodward argues that this Andover grad still views himself as a cheerleader, bucking up the polity even if his rosy exhortations come at the cost of the truth. (When a C.I.A. briefer informs the president of the deteriorating security situation in Iraq, Bush dismisses the messenger from Langley as "Baghdad Bob," a reference to Saddam Hussein's old spokesman.) And if the president can't face the facts, it may have something to do with his insecurities. According to Woodward, the president's legs anxiously jiggle under the table in meetings. He also suggests, as others have, that our adventure in Iraq had less to do with the promotion of democracy and more to do with the president's relationship with his father. Bush wanted to outdo his dad by taking down the tyrant his old man had left standing.

But the president is too passive a player to be Woodward's central villain. Besides, Donald Rumsfeld fills that role far too perfectly. He comes across as utterly contemptuous of other human beings. When Condoleezza Rice makes important presentations to the president, Rumsfeld ostentatiously fails to pay attention — and then fails to return her calls afterward. What's worse, he is an obsessive micromanager, but one who disavows projects once they look doomed. As soon as the hunt for weapons of mass destruction seemed fruitless, he handed over the mission to the C.I.A.

Rumsfeld takes so much pummeling that he eventually becomes a strangely sympathetic character. While almost every other member of the Bush administration stiffed Woodward's request for on-the-record interviews, Rumsfeld manfully subjected himself to two sessions — this despite his obvious disdain for the author. In the course of these interviews, Woodward breaks his own time-honored rules of access journalism. Instead of rewarding Rumsfeld's openness, he uses the interviews to disprove his own reputation for softness. After Rumsfeld employs the metaphor of a "fruit bowl" to describe the administration's varying methodologies for measuring insurgent attacks, Woodward writes: "I was speechless. Even with the loosest and most careless use of language and analogy, I did not understand how the secretary of defense would compare insurgent attacks to a 'fruit bowl,' a metaphor that stripped them of all urgency and emotion."

While Woodward reserves particular antipathy for Rumsfeld, his descriptions of nearly everyone else in the administration are equally damning. Every chapter in the book presents a heretofore uncovered anecdote of incompetence. Why did we botch postwar reconstruction? Weeks before the invasion, one of the men recruited to help rebuild Iraq is sitting in a library scraping for any bit of available information about "what we should do with the Iraqi Army." Unfortunately, the United States government didn't have any good intelligence on the subject. When Jay Garner, who was in charge of the reconstruction, asked Rice on the eve of the invasion how he should put together a postwar government, he didn't receive an answer. Garner didn't even know he should relocate his operations to the Middle East until Paul Wolfowitz told him, "You should already be there."

DOJ_NMG_0093085

Amid all of Woodward's maddening reports of administration ham-handedness and arrogance, unintentional comedy abounds. He captures official Washington offering the lamest excuses as it trips over itself to deny responsibility for the Iraq war and the Bush era. George Tenet, the former director of central intelligence, is shown decrying the Iraq invasion as a "mistake" on the eve of the war — despite Woodward's previous reports of his "slam dunk" assessment of the Iraqi arsenal. After Richard Armitage's initial pre-presidential encounters with George W. Bush, he "was not sure Bush filled the suit required of a president" — yet nevertheless went on to serve as his loyal servant for four years. But Woodward doesn't render this rat-jump with the appropriate comic flair. He portrays these revisionist accounts with far more sympathy than they deserve.

This book, after all, is an object lesson in precisely this brand of retreat. You can easily understand Woodward's urge to retreat. For the past decade, he has received unending abuse, suffering a devastating Joan Didion hatchet job and then the scorn of the anti-Bush left. His critics have turned him into a symbol of journalism's rot, a leading force in the sad demise of adversarial reporting that led to Judith Miller and media passiveness in the face of Bush spin. After writing "All the President's Men," Woodward became one of them.

With "State of Denial," you sense this (somewhat overwrought) critique has rattled Woodward. It has forced him to change his style. There's less of his signature omniscience here — a style that not only reflected his proximity to power, but captured the self-confidence of the Washington Establishment. In its place, he has grown self-referential, nervously mentioning his past books, as well as inserting himself as a character into his own tale. That Bob Woodward has strayed from the Bob Woodward method tells you a lot about the state of American journalism.

Rumsfeld Was My Squash Partner (LAT)

By David Hiller

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

THERE WAS A PERIOD in the late 1990s when Don Rumsfeld and I played squash almost every month in Chicago, and before I say anything else, I should acknowledge this: He beat me almost all the time, even though, as he regularly pointed out, he was "almost old enough" to be my father.

We both lived in Chicago at the time. Don was in his late 60s, and I was in my 40s. I attribute my regular trouncing to several things (apart from my own poor play). Don was a strong technical player with a keen sense of court geometry and shot placement. He followed diagrams that his friend Arthur C. Nielsen, founder of the TV ratings business and one of the best amateur racquet-sport players in the U.S. in his day, had drawn for him by hand. I'm still looking for the copy Don gave me.

Don had a deadly, hard overhand service that came off the front wall like a bullet, came straight to the back wall and dropped in the corner, safe from my racquet. I'm sure that serve is what tore Don's rotator cuff.

Don also held the strategic ground in the center of the court better than anybody. We once collided as we both moved there, and I couldn't play for a week. Don moved well, certainly for a guy in his 60s. As he said, "I'm quick, not fast."

I think what struck me most was that Don never gave up on a point. His view was that every shot could be made, every game could be won, and he never surrendered until the last volley was played out. With me he was usually right.

Were these the qualities he brought to his job as secretary of Defense? I'm not sure, but I suspect that the rules he lived by were the same ones he played by, and I thought of them again as I watched the president announce Don's resignation.

DAVID HILLER is publisher of The Times.

Top Commander In Iraq Says U.S. Won't Abandon Its Mission (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

BAGHDAD — Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Iraq, voiced confidence Saturday that the United States would not abandon its mission in this violence-racked country amid a postelection reevaluation of Iraq strategy.

"The weeks and months ahead will require courage and determination," Casey said at a Veterans Day naturalization ceremony for 75 U.S. troops at Baghdad's Camp Victory. "But succeed we will."

His comments were among his first public statements since the resignation last week of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Washington political insiders have speculated that both Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who was also at the ceremony, could leave their posts because of the Republican Party's defeat at the polls Tuesday. Both men quickly left the ceremony after reading prepared statements.

At least 40 Iraqis and two European soldiers were reported killed in Iraq on Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0093086

The U.S. military indicated that it had come up empty-handed in its quest to find a soldier missing for nearly three weeks. It offered a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of Army Reserve Spc. Ahmed Qusai Taei, an American of Iraqi descent.

He was abducted Oct. 23 outside the U.S.-protected Green Zone in Baghdad while on a visit to his Iraqi wife and in-laws.

The European soldiers, a Slovak and a Pole, were killed overnight by a roadside bomb near the southern city of Kut, news agencies reported.

Iraq's south has come under the sway of rival Shiite Muslim militias with anti-U.S. agendas.

Police in Najaf discovered a cache of antitank rockets, armor-piercing weapons and mortars hidden in the city's ancient cemetery. In 2004, Najaf was the scene of intense street battles between U.S. forces and Shiite militias.

In the capital, two car bombs exploded near the main market, killing eight civilians and injuring 37. Almost daily explosions at the wholesale market have further stifled an already moribund economy.

In other violence, a roadside bomb in an upscale Sunni Muslim neighborhood in central Baghdad killed one and injured five. Another roadside bomb in west Baghdad killed three passersby and injured three.

News agencies reported that as many as 10 Shiites traveling south of Baghdad on minibuses were killed in an apparent sectarian attack, but the account could not be confirmed. Dozens more reportedly were kidnapped by the gunmen.

Assassins killed a police sergeant in east Baghdad and an official in Iraq's intelligence service in south Baghdad as he locked up his car.

Gunmen killed two bodyguards of a former member of parliament in an east Baghdad shootout that left four people wounded, including the politician.

Iraqi police discovered the mutilated, bullet-riddled corpses of at least 24 men and a woman around the capital, police officials said.

Suicide bombers rammed U.S. military convoys near Taji, 20 miles north of the capital, and in east Baghdad, Iraqi police said. The military did not report any casualties from either incident.

U.S. Offers Reward For Help In Finding Missing Soldier (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 11 — The American military on Saturday announced a $50,000 reward for anyone with information leading to the recovery of an American soldier who was captured nearly three weeks ago outside the heavily protected Green Zone.

Iraqi and American soldiers conducted another raid in the impoverished Shiite district of Sadr City on Friday, looking for a “top-level death squad leader” as part of efforts to find the soldier, military officials said Saturday.

Also on Saturday, Sunni Arab gunmen pulled over a group of minibuses carrying Shiites traveling through a volatile region just south of here, killing 10 and kidnapping dozens, Iraqi state television said. And in one of several deadly attacks here in the capital, a pair of car bombs tore through a popular downtown shopping area just after noon, killing at least six people and injuring 32 others, an Interior Ministry official said.

A roadside bomb near Kut, about 100 miles southeast of Baghdad, killed one Polish and one Slovak soldier late on Friday, The Associated Press said.

The missing American soldier, identified by the military as Specialist Ahmed Kousay al-Taie, 41, an Iraqi-American translator from Ann Arbor, Mich., disappeared Oct. 23 after he left the Green Zone without permission to visit his Iraqi wife at her home nearby. Armed men handcuffed him and took him away, his relatives and the military said.

Since then, he has been the subject of a hunt that has involved some 2,000 American troops and 1,000 Iraqi security officers, who flooded the middle-class Karada neighborhood outside the Green Zone and surrounded Sadr City, where the military and his relatives said they believed he had been taken.

Last week, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki demanded that American troops lift the security cordon that they had placed around Sadr City. The checkpoints were quickly removed, and little has been heard since about progress in the search.

The case took a turn late last week when Entifad Qanbar, an associate of Ahmad Chalabi, the influential Iraqi politician, identified himself as the soldier’s uncle and said that the kidnappers had issued a $250,000 ransom demand. American officials had been meeting with an intermediary trusted by those who had captured his nephew, he said. Mr. Qanbar said that he had asked for proof from the captors that his nephew was still alive, setting a deadline of noon last Saturday.

But he has not had any contact with the kidnappers or their representatives since then, Mr. Qanbar said Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0093087

Several people who claim to know the captors have contacted family members, indicating that he is still alive, he said. The family has also reached out to people on their own, who have given them assurances about his well-being, he said. “God willing, I hope he is alive.” .

Relatives believe a notorious Mahdi Army militia commander named Abu Rami who lived near the wife’s home in Karada took Specialist Taie. Mr. Qanbar said Saturday that he had been told that the commander operated a well-organized criminal ring that functioned independently from the militia, whose members ostensibly claim loyalty to Moktada al-Sadr, the Shiite cleric.

American and Iraqi troops have followed up on some 335 tips from Iraqi citizens about Specialist Taie’s disappearance, leading to 53 missions, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman. The most recent mission took place in Sadr City on Friday, in which five men were detained, he said.

The soldiers in the raid were looking for a death squad leader who “controls the actions of multiple cells, with hundreds of cell members, that conduct sectarian murder and torture, kidnappings, improvised explosive devices attacks and other attacks and crimes against Iraqi civilians and Iraqi security forces,” the military said in a statement.

The soldiers seized six makeshift bombs and an array of Iraqi Army uniforms, the statement said. Military officials declined to identify the specific target of the raid, but confirmed it was part of its efforts to find Specialist Taie.

In all, 38 people have been arrested and held for questioning in connection with Specialist Taie’s capture, Colonel Garver said.

The attack Saturday on the minibuses took place near Latifiya in the so-called Triangle of Death, an area plagued by Sunni insurgents. The bus had been on its way from the mainly Shiite southern city of Diwaniya to Baghdad, Iraqi state TV reported.

The twin car bombs that killed six people in the capital struck Hafud al-Qadi Street near the Shurja market, an area crowded with stores.

Earlier in the day, another roadside bomb exploded in eastern Baghdad, killing at least one person and wounding five others, an Interior Ministry official said. Another concealed bomb that detonated Saturday evening in the western Baghdad Sunni neighborhood of Amariya killed three people and wounded three others, the official said.

The police also discovered the bodies of 25 people dumped across the city on Saturday, the official said.

Dissenting Officer Faces Court-martial (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe,

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada cites ethics in becoming the first commissioned troop to refuse Iraq deployment.

The nation's first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq said he was disappointed by the Army's decision last week to proceed with a court-martial against him but reiterated that he believed he did the right thing in opposing the war.

As the nation honored its military veterans Saturday, Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada said he believed his refusal to lead his soldiers into what he viewed as an illegal and immoral war was fulfilling his duty to them and the Constitution he pledged to uphold.

"I am at peace with my decision because I feel that from the beginning I made it according to my conscience and my duty as a soldier and officer," said Watada, who is stationed at Ft. Lewis, Wash., about 50 miles south of Seattle. "The reason I'm standing up is that no one else is speaking up for the troops dying every day — not to mention the 600,000 Iraqis who have died.

"I'm willing to accept the punishment, whatever it may be," said Watada, whose case has sparked widespread debate over a soldier's duty to follow orders versus conscience.

In phone interviews Friday and Saturday, Watada also said that recent events had reinforced his belief that many Americans, including a growing number inside the military, shared his sentiments against the Bush administration's conduct of the war. Those events include the midterm election results giving Democrats control of Congress, the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and a landmark editorial in four affiliated military-focused publications calling for the Pentagon chief's ouster.

On Thursday, the Army announced, as expected, that it would refer Watada's case to a general court-martial for refusing to deploy to Iraq.

What observers were closely watching was whether Lt. Gen. James Dubik, Ft. Lewis' commanding general, would also refer to trial charges involving critical public statements Watada made about the administration's war efforts.

Watada stated in a June news conference: "The war in Iraq is not only morally wrong but a horrible breach of American law…. The wholesale slaughter and mistreatment of Iraqis is not only a terrible moral injustice, but it is a contradiction to the Army's own law of land warfare. My participation would make me party to war crimes."

The Army contends that that statement and others — expressing shame over wearing the uniform to conduct a war he said was based on "misrepresentation and lies" — brought dishonor to the military.

DOJ_NMG_0093088

In his decision, Dubik dismissed two of the speech-related charges of "contempt toward officials" but referred to trial four charges of "conduct unbecoming an officer." The lieutenant could be sentenced to a maximum of six years in prison.

Army officials were not available for comment.

Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz of Honolulu, said Saturday that he was disappointed that the Army had refused to negotiate on the charges. Seitz argued that Watada's statements, made off-duty and out of uniform, were permissible exercises of his free-speech rights.

The trial is "going to be a spectacle," Seitz said. "It's going to raise a lot of issues that frankly I don't understand why the Army wants to raise" in an antiwar political climate.

Watada, a Honolulu native who enlisted after the Sept. 11 attacks, said he gradually came to his conclusion that the Iraq war was illegal and immoral after his superiors told him to study up on it last year in preparation to deploy to Iraq in June with his Stryker brigade combat team.

Watada said he concluded that the war violated international and U.S. law because the administration failed to obtain U.N. Security Council authorization for it and secured congressional authorization based on wrong assertions that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and was linked to Al Qaeda.

The Nuremberg principles adopted after World War II, he said, require soldiers to disobey illegal orders.

Watada offered to deploy to Afghanistan or resign his commission instead, but the Army refused to allow that. Army spokesman Col. Dan Baggio told The Times in a previous interview that soldiers could not pick and choose their conflicts but must uphold their oath to follow orders.

Although some soldiers have fled the country, gone absent without leave, claimed conscientious-objector status or taken illegal drugs to avoid Iraq service, Watada said, it was never his aim to avoid combat per se.

"I felt I could never do any of that personally because I needed to take a stand and hold people accountable for this illegal and immoral war," he said. "It all boils down to 'What is the purpose of a soldier and officer?' And that is to serve the American people."

teresa.watanabe@latimes.com

Democrats Aim To Save Inquiry On Work In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz, David Johnston, Thom Shanker

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 — Congressional Democrats say they will press new legislation next week to restore the power of a federal agency in charge of ferreting out waste and corruption in Iraq and greatly increase its investigative reach.

The bills, the first of what are likely to be dozens of Democratic efforts to resurrect investigations of war profiteering and financial fraud in government contracting, could be introduced as early as Monday morning.

The move would nullify a Republican-backed provision, slipped into a huge military authorization bill, that set a termination date for the agency, the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. The agency's findings have consistently undermined Bush administration claims of widespread success in the reconstruction of Iraq.

Oversight, the power wielded by Congressional committees to demand information and internal documents and to haul executive branch officials to hearings, by subpoena if necessary, is reverberating through Congress as a Democratic battle cry.

"The unilateral decision made by House Republicans to shut down this critical office should be reversed immediately," said Senator Harry Reid, the Nevada Democrat who is poised to become the majority leader.

The House version of the bill will be introduced by Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat likely to take over as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, a member of Mr. Skelton's staff said Friday. Mr. Skelton also said he would resurrect a subcommittee on oversight and investigations that was jettisoned by Republicans to investigate military spending.

In the Senate, Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who is in line to become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said that seeking a new strategy for Iraq would be his primary focus, but that he would also look carefully at military contracting.

"There have been serious allegations and evidence of misconduct among suppliers," Mr. Levin said. "And the taxpayers, of course, get socked on that. And the troops are not properly taken care of when that happens."

Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, said on Saturday that the administration was willing to have discussions with Congress on the proposal to extend the inspector general's tenure. Mr. Fratto added, "We have a history of cooperating fully with and supporting inspectors general."

Mr. Fratto said he could not speak more definitively on the subject because the legislation was yet to be released.

DOJ_NMG_0093089

In a measure of the momentum behind the bill, it is expected to be introduced in the Senate by Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, along with co-sponsors Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, and Joseph I. Lieberman, who won re-election as an independent in Connecticut.

"It is inconceivable that we would remove this aggressive oversight while the American taxpayer is still spending billions of dollars on Iraq reconstruction projects," Ms. Collins said.

Mr. Reid has said that after the lame-duck session ends, the Democrats will press ahead with Congressional oversight, particularly on Iraq. But Democratic leaders have also been conciliatory in discussing broader efforts to review the administration's initiatives of the past six years.

The imperative to investigate financial misdeeds extends beyond the military. Congressional aides said that the House government reform committee under Representative Henry A. Waxman of California might also investigate spending related to domestic security and the response to Hurricane Katrina.

The Appropriations Committee, which is likely to be led by Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, is likely to review more closely spending like large supplementary requests for Iraq and Afghanistan.

In addition, after the negative political fallout of corruption cases involving lawmakers, the Appropriations Committee is under pressure to curtail earmarks, which are spending measures for specific projects not sought by a federal agency but sponsored by a lawmaker — sometimes anonymously and often for a financial supporter.

Potentially explosive confrontations over foreign policy issues between Democrats and the Bush administration may be unavoidable. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, who is expected to become the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, has been a critic of the C.I.A.'s secret detention program and the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping program.

It is unclear how far chairmen like Mr. Rockefeller may push the administration to obtain more information about secret programs. The committee, like many others, has often degenerated into partisan rancor over the past two years, and Mr. Rockefeller, like other incoming chairmen, has told colleagues that one of his priorities is to restore the committee's historic bipartisanship.

But there is unlikely to be much downside for the Democrats in going after waste and fraud in government contracting, particularly in the Iraq war, which is not only unpopular with the American public but also where corporate giants like Halliburton, Parsons and Bechtel have committed highly publicized missteps in the rebuilding program.

Investigations by the Iraq oversight agency, led by Stuart W. Bowen Jr., have already led to convictions of American occupation officials on bribery charges and uncovered many instances of substandard construction.

Mr. Bowen's investigations of Halliburton have uncovered tens of millions of dollars of charges for work that achieved little in the way of results, but apparently met the letter of the company's contract with the United States to repair oil facilities. Mr. Bowen has also found that Halliburton has been using federal loopholes to impede investigations of its work by declaring nearly all information about company activities in Iraq to be proprietary, or sensitive because it could aid the company's competitors.

So it came as a surprise to many that Mr. Bowen's office was directed to go out of business on Oct. 1, 2007, by an obscure provision in an authorization bill that President Bush signed last month. The termination language was quietly inserted into the bill by staff members working for Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who now leads the House Armed Services Committee.

As in the bill that the president signed, the new Senate proposal would expand the pot of money that Mr. Bowen could investigate, but it would not set a hard deadline for the agency's work to come to an end. Both the House and Senate measures extend the deadline at least into 2008, by most readings, but the House measure would also add about $2 billion — for training and equipping Iraqi security forces — to the amount that the agency could investigate, a Congressional staff member said. Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who is expected to become the House speaker, said she would strongly support that legislation.

"Democrats want the inspector general to stay at work until the job is done," Ms. Pelosi said. "Those individuals and companies responsible for shoddy work or fraudulent billing practices must be held accountable."

Several officials on Capitol Hill said that the locus of resistance to extending the tenure of Mr. Bowen's office came from the State Department, which believes that its own inspector general should begin taking on the job of investigating reconstruction in Iraq. But that notion finds resistance among some lawmakers who distrust the administration's will to investigate itself.

Outside the reconstruction program, some agencies are likely to be singled out for special scrutiny, not only the Pentagon, but also the Central Intelligence Agency and Federal Bureau of Investigation. Incoming Democratic chairman have said they plan to review the C.I.A.'s secret detention and interrogation program for important terrorism suspects and what some lawmakers have said is the sluggish pace of the F.B.I.'s effort to transform itself into a counterterrorism agency.

DOJ_NMG_0093090

The Homeland Security Department has had at least some scrutiny from Congress in recent years, most particularly related to its performance and that of the Federal Emergency Management Agency during Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

But the new Democratic leaders, their aides said, intend to significantly broaden the oversight efforts, a step that may include more frequent subpoenas for administration officials who have declined to appear for some hearings, as was the case in the hurricane investigation.

One area that almost certainly will draw additional oversight is mass-transit security, said Dena L. Graziano, spokeswoman for Representative Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, who is expected to take over the House Committee on Homeland Security.

And Democrats have long argued that the administration is too focused on aviation security, and has failed to devote enough money or attention to preventing bombings like those that have occurred in Madrid and London. Some Democrats, nursing years of slights at the hands of Republican appointees in federal agencies who ignored or brushed aside hundreds of their letters asking for information, are eager for answers. The Senate Judiciary Committee has staff members trying to compile a complete list of unanswered questions.

Some Democrats said before the election that they would inquire more deeply into some issues, asking for fuller accountability among senior officers and civilian officials at the Pentagon over the harsh treatment of detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

"I think the accountability for Abu Ghraib has not yet been accomplished in terms of finding out who was involved, at what level," said Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island.

For all the pledges of rigorous oversight, Democrats are moving warily, fearful of a misstep, mainly in national security areas, that could return them to the sidelines as a minority party.

That may explain the focus on less volatile issues like waste and fraudulent spending and why few Democrats are proposing inquiries on hot-button issues, like the underlying rationale for the war in Iraq or the underpinning for the administration's counterterrorism policies.

Agendas are likely to shift over time, particularly in the House, where the leadership lineup will not be known with certainty for weeks. In addition, the transfer of majority control in both chambers means Republicans and Democrats must switch offices in the House and Senate. Republicans will be forced to dismiss some committee staff members, and Democrats will expand their workforce, in some committees nearly doubling staff size.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Skelton said that in the past, "the Congress has not worked, and has not asked the tough questions or held the administration to account."

But he said it was the responsibility of every Democrat taking over a subcommittee chairmanship also to apply more scrutiny to government action, and not just those of subcommittees specifically charged with that mandate.

"Our subcommittee chairmen will be able to bring oversight back to their individual subcommittees," he said.

Despite Billions Spent, Rebuilding Incomplete (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

For a little more than $38 billion, the United States and its contractors in Iraq have provided 4.6 million people with access to water. They have distributed seeds to Iraqi farmers, improving wheat harvests. With electricity-generating capacity now above prewar levels, they have given many Iraqis more daily hours of power. They have repaired more than 5,000 schools and vaccinated 4.6 million children against polio.

The list goes on. But as the U.S.-led, U.S.-funded portion of Iraq's reconstruction nears its end, American officials and contractors alike are grappling with a cold reality: Thousands of successes in Iraq may add up to a single failure.

"We accomplished a significant amount of work. But it was just overwhelmed by the overlay of violence," said Clifford G. Mumm, who has spent much of the past three years in Iraq managing projects for Bechtel Corp. "It's hard to be very optimistic."

U.S.-funded projects have long been a target for sabotage. Many of those that were spared remain unused by a population paralyzed by violence.

Yet those inside the reconstruction effort say security concerns were hardly the only problem. Poor planning and coordination by U.S. officials meant that even successful individual projects failed to do the job; for example, health-care centers were built at great cost but had no water and sewer service. Poor work-site management by contractors meant that some projects went awry. And now that the United States is handing over reconstruction efforts to Iraq, many involved with the process worry that the Iraqis don't have the training or the money to keep U.S.-built facilities running.

This was not how the rebuilding of Iraq was supposed to go. In the fall of 2003, six months after the U.S. invasion, President Bush promised Iraq "the greatest financial commitment of its kind since the Marshall Plan." Top administration aides said they considered that plan, which helped rebuild Europe after World War II, to be a model for Iraq. Congress soon passed a spending bill that, while offering less money than the Marshall Plan, was expected to be enough to get Iraq back on its feet.

DOJ_NMG_0093091

Riding through the streets of the northern city of Mosul three years later, taxi driver Sattar Khalid Othman has barely noticed.

"What reconstruction?" Othman said in an interview last week. "Today we are drinking untreated water from a plant built decades ago that was never maintained. The electricity only visits us two hours a day. And now we are going backwards. We cook on the firewood we gather from the forests because of the gas shortage."

Othman's view is shared by many across the country. In interviews last week, Iraqis expressed frustration not just with the United States but with Iraqi leaders, too, for pocketing aid money that was supposed to be for everyone.

"When the occupation came and we heard the promises, we said, 'Now the conditions in the city will improve.' But things got worse," said Ahmed Mohammed, 45, a teacher in the central province of Salah al-Din. "We know that large amounts of money have been dedicated to the city, but they were all stolen."

The United States has committed more than $38 billion to reconstructing Iraq, far more than any other nation, according to the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction. Most of that money is now gone. Three-quarters of the primary fund for rebuilding has been spent and the rest has been set aside for finishing key projects.

Overall, 88 percent of planned projects -- about 12,000 -- have been completed, with just 4 percent yet to begin.

Yet tallying finished projects can be a misleading way of measuring success.

"We knew it wasn't a matter of how many projects were completed. It was a matter of: Is the electricity flowing to Baghdad? Is there security on the streets? Is the oil flowing? Those were the things that mattered," said Jon C. Bowersox, who until this summer was the health attache at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. "Too often, though, from what I could see, it was all about the process -- how many hundreds of millions of dollars you had put under contract -- and not the product."

In the transportation sector, for example, the numbers look good. The United States has finished repairs on 86 of 98 railway stations. But few trains run because of security concerns. In the oil sector, despite the fact that production capacity has nearly returned to prewar levels, the country had a severe fuel shortage this summer because of high demand and sabotage.

Millions of children have received vaccinations and thousands of health-care workers have been trained. But more than 100 health-care facilities that were scheduled to be finished by now instead are empty because the contractors assigned to build them did not get their jobs done.

The problem, Bowersox said, was that the plan to build new facilities across the country was too ambitious. "We could have gone in and done low-cost rehabs, and not tried to transform their health-care system in two years," he said.

Bechtel was responsible for one of the facilities that was not finished: a children's hospital in the southern city of Basra that was supposed to provide world-class care and had been championed by first lady Laura Bush.

Mumm, the Bechtel manager, said the project, which is just an empty shell today, could not continue because of security threats. "It was impossible to get people to come to work. They were threatened every which way," Mumm said. Fifty-two people associated with company projects died, most of them Iraqi. Overall, 650 civilian contractors have died working on U.S.-funded reconstruction.

Not every U.S.-backed effort came under assault. CHF International, a Silver Spring nonprofit organization, has operated in Iraq since the U.S. invasion, completing hundreds of projects on slim budgets.

The organization's Middle East director, Bruce Parmelee, said CHF has avoided violence because local communities were always involved in the work. "Before we could do anything, the community would have to agree. I would tell them, 'It's for your community. You're the Iraqis. You can pave the way for this to happen.' And they did that," said Parmelee, who spent months at a time living among Iraqis in the areas where CHF worked. "It was never a case of some American saying, 'This is what you need in your country.' People won't attack projects that they feel ownership of."

That community-based approach, he said, wasn't broadly shared by others involved in the reconstruction. "Large contractors didn't necessarily have that mandate," he said. "Security was challenged right from the beginning, so a majority of decisions were made behind a bulletproof shield."

Bringing Iraqis into the process early also made it easier to transfer projects to Iraqi control, Parmelee said. Auditors surveying U.S. efforts have been warning for more than a year that all will be for naught unless Iraqis are trained in how to operate, maintain and pay for their new facilities. Last month, the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., wrote that the process for transferring U.S. assets to the Iraqis "appears to have broken down."

"Many successful projects have been completed," Bowen said. "Whether they are operating within a sustainable Iraqi infrastructure is yet to be answered."

Many Iraqis say they're looking forward to playing a bigger part in their country's rebuilding. But given the security situation, they don't know that they'll have any more success than the Americans did.

DOJ_NMG_0093092

"The insurgents targeted the contractors by killing, kidnapping, slaughtering them and forcing them to pay enormous ransoms, till all the work stopped," said Fawzi al-Nieami, who works in construction in Mosul. "Now there are lots of profitable contracts, but no one dares to take them."

Democrats And Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

The Democrats will not be able to savor their victory for long. Americans are waiting to hear if they have any good ideas for how to get out of Iraq without creating even wider chaos and terrorism.

Criticizing President Bush's gross mismanagement of the war was a winning electoral strategy. But criticism will not extricate the United States from this mess, nor will it persuade voters that the Democrats are ready to take back the White House.

Let us be clear. The responsibility for all that has gone wrong lies squarely with Mr. Bush. Even with control of the Congress, the Democrats' role in changing things will be hortatory. And while we too are eager to hear the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group — better known as the (James) Baker commission — it should be the start, and not the end, of a bipartisan discussion on Iraq strategy. The Democrats need to be ready to play a full role.

Under Republican control, Congress has exercised virtually no oversight of the administration's misconduct of the war, and the new Democratic leadership is eager to hold extensive hearings. The public deserves a full accounting (backed by subpoenas, if necessary) of how prewar intelligence was cooked, why American troops were sent to war without adequate armor, and where billions of dollars in reconstruction aid disappeared to.

The Democrats will also need to look forward — and quickly. So far they have shared slogans, but no real policy. During the campaign, their most common call was for a "phased redeployment" — a euphemism for withdrawal — of American troops starting before the end of this year.

Threatening to pull out may be the only way to get cooperation from Iraq's prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, who is thwarting even the most limited American efforts to disarm militias and set timetables for genuine political compromise on the most fundamental issues, like protecting minority rights and fairly apportioning the country's oil wealth.

Unless America's exit plans are coupled with a more serious effort to build up Iraq's security forces and mediate its sectarian divisions, a phased withdrawal will only hasten Iraq's descent into civil war — while placing American soldiers who remain behind in even greater danger. We also fear that Iraqis will have no interest in anything but retribution, until they see that security and rebuilding are possible. For that reason we have suggested one last push to stabilize Baghdad. That would require at least a temporary increase in American and Iraqi troops on Baghdad streets.

We are skeptical of calls, by some Democrats, to divide the country into three ethnically based regions. Most Iraqis — except for the Kurds — show little enthusiasm for the idea. And while there has been horrific ethnic cleansing, it hasn't yet got to the point that boundaries could be drawn without driving many more people from their homes.

Such ideas deserve a full discussion, something the United States has not had since its troops first rolled into Iraq. We are not sure that any shift in strategy can contain the disaster. But we are sure that even a few weeks more of drift and confusion will guarantee more chaos and suffering once American troops leave. Voters gave the Democrats the floor — and are now waiting to hear what they have to say.

Anti-corruption Official In Iraq Accused Of Fraud (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

The head of the Commission on Public Integrity says he is the target of an intimidation campaign.

BAGHDAD — Iraq's top anticorruption watchdog, a high-profile judge whose efforts have been hailed by Americans as one of the few bright spots in the country, is himself the target of a corruption probe, officials said Saturday.

Judge Radhi Radhi, head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, is under investigation by court authorities, accused of turning his 1,700-employee agency into a personal fiefdom and padding his salary with an extra $50,000 a year.

Radhi denies the charges, arguing that they're part of a campaign of intimidation by government officials to quash his investigations, which include examinations of corruption in ministries controlled by Iraq's dominant Shiite Muslim parties.

He said he has come under pressure to shut down his commission or cede its independent status. The government has ignored his requests for information, threatened his legal mandate and demanded he halt his investigations, said Radhi, who is a Shiite, but secular.

"They tell me, 'You are not a ministry to be giving us orders,' " he said in an interview Saturday. "There are voices among them who say there is no need for this commission."

DOJ_NMG_0093093

Lawmakers have threatened not only to remove Radhi from his post for alleged incompetence, but to prosecute him for corruption, as detailed in an Oct. 29 affidavit submitted to the Supreme Judicial Council.

"I don't want him to be just removed from his post, I want him to be punished according to the law," said Sheik Sabah Saadi, a Shiite lawmaker who heads the parliamentary anti-corruption committee and has spearheaded the efforts against Radhi. "We have found financial and administrative corruption inside the integrity commission."

Transparency International, a Berlin-based organization that monitors official graft, patronage and bribery, lists Iraq as the world's third most corrupt nation, behind Haiti and Myanmar.

U.S. officials have hailed Radhi's work. He has pushed for the prosecution of several former ministers and uncovered corruption in the Interior Ministry, which has been infiltrated by Shiite militias. His targets have included former Defense Minister Hazem Shaalan and former Electricity Minister Ayham Sameraei.

Radhi has worked closely with Stuart W. Bowen Jr. of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, a U.S. agency created to investigate waste and fraud by U.S. officials and contractors in Iraq. That agency's legal mandate has run out, and it may soon be folded.

The integrity commission, too, rests on precarious legal ground. It was created by an order of an American, L. Paul Bremer III, head of the former Coalition Provisional Authority, and has never been written into Iraqi law. Iraqi legislators have stalled a vote on whether to give the commission permanent status or dissolve it and let government inspectors audit their own agencies.

The affidavit submitted against Radhi accuses him of hiring staff without publicly advertising jobs.

"We have documents and we have witnesses," Saadi said in a telephone interview from Basra. "It is not a mere accusation."

Saadi also charged that Radhi has managed to show relatively few results, despite the nearly $20 million his agency has been allocated. Saadi called his work sloppy and unprofessional. His few successes, such as his pursuit of Shaalan, were uncovered by others, he said. Under Shaalan, who is no longer in Iraq, billions of dollars disappeared from the Defense Ministry.

"There is no clear strategy to combat corruption," said Saadi, who plans to hold a news conference in coming days to make public his battle against Radhi.

The commission's work "amounts to listening to complaints on a hotline and forwarding those complaints to the inspector general" of each ministry, he said, without determining whether they are true.

Radhi said he had grown used to nasty accusations by the targets of his investigations. Shaalan accused him of being partisan, and Mishaan Jaburi, a Sunni lawmaker who fled the country after being indicted on charges of stealing millions, accused Radhi of pursuing a sectarian agenda.

Radhi said the pressure on his office might be a reaction to his attempts to ferret out corruption in key Shiite-controlled ministries.

Among his commission's current investigations are the quality of food purchased by the Trade Ministry for monthly rations, the disappearance of petroleum products under the supervision of the Oil Ministry, a lack of progress in refurbishing the railroad system and misconduct by 451 police officers who work in the Interior Ministry. Each ministry involved is controlled by a Shiite politician.

Times staff writer Raheem Salman contributed to this report.

Could A New Strongman Help? (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

BAGHDAD - THE sight of Saddam Hussein haranguing the court that sentenced him to death last week in Baghdad may have done little to slow his trip to the gallows, which looks ever more likely to come early next year if the appellate court, as expected, moves swiftly to uphold the sentence.

But Mr. Hussein's outbursts served to remind many Iraqis, even those who hated him most, of something they crave in the rudderless nightmare Iraq has become under his successors: a strong leader, able to forge a nation from the country's fractious ethnic and religious groups, and to end the current wave of sectarian bloodletting that, left to build on itself, could ultimately match the mass killing that characterized Mr. Hussein's psychopathic years in power.

It is something ordinary Iraqis say with growing intensity, even as they agree on little else. Let there be a strongman, they say, not a relentless killer like Saddam Hussein but somebody who will take the hammer to the insurgents and the death squads and the kidnappers and the criminal gangs who have banished all pretense of civility from their lives.

Let him ride roughshod, if he must, they say, over the niceties of due process and human rights, indeed over the panoply of democratic institutions America has tried to implant here, if only he can bring peace.

DOJ_NMG_0093094

The message appears, so far, to have found little resonance in Washington as President Bush sets out, after the shock of the midterm elections, to review American policy on Iraq. The closest anyone with the White House's ear has come to suggesting anything short of democratic rule, let alone an authoritarian model typical of other countries in the Middle East, are leaks from the bipartisan commission headed by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, which is charged with suggesting a new American approach to Iraq; some of its members have said that the group has considered recommending that stability, rather than democracy, should become the principal objective there.

For the Bush administration, which made democracy-building here a cornerstone of everything it did after the American-led invasion, abandoning that goal now would be tantamount to abandoning one of its core missions. Coming on top of the failure to find the weapons of mass destruction that were the original justification for going to war with Mr. Hussein, it would constitute an about-face of historic proportions. But many Iraqis believe that it may now be the only hope — and a slim one, at that — of halting their country's descent into catastrophe.

Of the many hard lessons America may take from its enterprise here, the impracticality of grafting American political values onto a society as different as Iraq's, by measure of culture, religion and historical experience, will surely be one. History may judge that attempting it in the midst of a savage war was the greatest of follies. Far from Iraq becoming a beacon of democracy for the Middle East, some Arab scholars have said, the violence in Iraq will embolden other Arab leaders who defend their authoritarianism as a bulwark against chaos.

Lately, President Bush has put less emphasis on building democracy in his evolving definition of the American objective in Iraq. "A government that can defend, govern and sustain itself" was the way he put it at his news conference on Wednesday, a formulation that suggests that he, too, may have reduced the focus on the Jeffersonian ideals prevalent in the headier days after the American-led invasion. Then, L. Paul Bremer III, head of the American occupation authority, set aside $750 million for what was called "democracy building," sometimes with results that bordered on the comical.

One example was a democracy center in the southern city of Hilla, led by a man Mr. Bremer described as one of the most remarkable Iraqis he had met, Sayyid Farquat al-Qizwini. Mr. Qizwini, a towering figure with a bird's-nest beard and a black turban signifying his descent from the Prophet Mohammed, moved onto the American payroll after he "liberated" a mosque Saddam Hussein had built and named for himself, and used it for democracy classes for Shiite imams and tribal leaders. Away from the Americans, Mr. Qizwini liked to make a joke of the enterprise, saying he had once had to sing the praises of Mr. Hussein and, for $100 a day, was happy to do the same for the Americans.

The American enterprise in Iraq has had its high points, notably the three occasions when Iraqis went to the polls in their millions — the election in January 2005 for a transitional government; the referendum in October 2005 on a new Constitution; and a second election in December 2005 for the four-year government now in office. For anyone who experienced the brutal repression under Mr. Hussein — and the single-candidate "referendum" in 2002 that gave him a new, seven-year presidential term with a claimed 100 percent of the vote — there was something intoxicating in the sight of Iraqis voting freely for the first time in their history, with dozens of parties contesting for their support.

But in hindsight, the elections, far from bringing Iraqis together, served to harden the divides of ethnicity and religion. In the two elections, only a tiny percentage of the votes went to secular parties that bridged those divides. The big winners were Shiite religious groups whose objective was to secure Shiite domination after centuries of subordination to the minority Sunnis, and to extend the role of Islam in the national life. The Americans succeeded in drawing moderate Sunnis into the political process, and later into a subordinate role in the national government. But the net effect of the elections, for many Sunnis, has been to ratify their new status as second-class citizens in the new Iraq.

Now the divides are wider than ever, entrenched by Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads that are locked in a sectarian nightmare of suicide bombings, kidnappings and mass executions. America's 150,000 troops are caught in the middle, hunting killers on both sides, but finding little partnership from the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

After pledging from the outset of his tenure six months ago to act decisively against the militias that spawn the death squads, Mr. Maliki has so far resisted any concrete actions to disarm or demobilize them. Instead, he bows to Shiite leaders in the coalition who control the two most powerful militias, the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization.

If anything, Mr. Maliki's standing, outside the Shiite religious constituency he represents, is lower now than that of his predecessor as prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whose year at the head of the transitional government was notable, American officials say, for its lethargy and corruption.

So plainly disaffected have the Americans become with Mr. Maliki that he used a telephone call with Mr. Bush last month to ask if the White House planned to unseat him. Aides to the prime minister said he sought and received Mr. Bush's reassurance after picking up rumors in the Green Zone government compound that American officials were feeling out Iraqi politicians on the possibility of replacing the Maliki administration with a "national salvation government" to be headed by an unnamed "Shiite strongman."

DOJ_NMG_0093095

The leading candidate for strongman, among secular Iraqis, at least, would be Ayad Allawi, whom the Americans named prime minister in the first post-Hussein government, in 2004. Mr. Allawi, though Shiite, has strong ties with Sunnis, and a reputation as a hard man that goes back to his time as a young Baathist enforcer. During his government, as much as $1 billion in Iraqi defense funds went missing, Iraqi officials have alleged, but no charges have been brought against him. These days, out of government, he spends most of his time at his family home in London.

But even if President Bush were convinced that Mr. Maliki should go, it is far from clear that the Americans would have the means to get rid of him.

The mechanism for any such move could hardly be so crude as the American-backed overthrow of President Ngo Dinh Diem of South Vietnam in 1963; he ended up dead, a bullet in his head, in the rear of an American-made armored personal carrier outside Saigon's presidential palace. The obvious route in Baghdad would lie through the Iraqi Parliament, where the ruling Shiites, bitterly divided among themselves, control the government through a shaky alliance with Kurdish parties.

A parliamentary coup might unseat Mr. Maliki personally, but it would be much tougher to shake power loose from the Shiite religious groups. Those parties have been held together by the overarching influence of Iraq's most powerful Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani.

The ayatollah is keenly aware of the lessons of the 1920's, when Shiites split among themselves, rose in rebellion against the British colonial administration and ultimately lost power to the Sunnis. From his cloistered existence in the holy city of Najaf, he has told the Shiites that they must hang together at all costs.

So far, they have, and little now on the horizon suggests that is likely to change.

Romania Vows Not To 'Abandon' Iraq (AP)

By William J. Kole, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 12, 2006

Romania has no intentions of withdrawing its troops from the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq, President Traian Basescu said Saturday, vowing to stay "because it's a dishonor to leave your allies."

In an interview with The Associated Press, Basescu said he empathized with mounting calls to withdraw the country's 608 non-combat personnel in Iraq, including impassioned pleas from the families of those serving.

But "Romania's honor is greater than its feelings," he said.

"An exit strategy is a matter of concern for us, and we are building it with our main allies, the U.S. and the U.K. But the states that form the coalition cannot abandon Iraq as it is now," he said after addressing reporters at a presidential retreat about 60 miles northeast of Bucharest.

"We have an obligation to the Iraqi people. We will leave when the local authorities can provide security for the people," he said.

Basescu also lashed out at Britain for announcing restrictions on Romanians trying to seek jobs there after the ex-communist country joins the European Union on Jan. 1.

"Romania isn't a perfect country. It has good features, but also people who steal, who drink," he said. "At the same time, it is hard for us to accept that countries such as Britain have imposed measures that are tougher than those imposed on the nations that joined (the EU) in 2004."

"We are not afraid to call this discrimination, and it's very difficult for us to accept such treatment," he said.

Ireland has also said it would limit the number of workers from Romania and fellow EU newcomer Bulgaria after Jan. 1. Basescu said he hoped employers would pressure the two countries to overturn the proposed restrictions.

"I didn't see them so outraged to have our troops fighting side by side with them in Iraq," said Basescu, 55, a tough-talking former sea captain who made it a priority after his 2004 election to forge closer ties with Britain and the U.S.

Romania and Bulgaria are being admitted under unprecedented EU conditions that will require both countries, which shook off communism in 1989, to report back every six months and ensure they are making progress on key reforms — or risk losing lucrative EU subsidies.

But Basescu said Romania would be "a pleasant surprise" for the EU, and would make important economic, social and cultural contributions. He also underscored Romania's key role in securing the 1,680-mile frontier along the Black Sea and the non-EU countries of Serbia, Moldova and Ukraine.

Steering His Nation Without A Rudder (LAT)

By Paul Watson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093096

Afghanistan's Karzai faces disaffection in a nation hungry for progress. Many see him as a shadow of a president, and they fear a slide back to the Taliban.

TRIBAL elders pleaded with Hamid Karzai to intervene in a land feud with their neighbors. But it was too dangerous for the president of Afghanistan to travel south to the heart of the Taliban insurgency, so Karzai invited them up to Kabul for lunch.

At least 120 men arrived, making their way past razor wire strung out a mile from the palace doors. After being repeatedly frisked and scanned, they finally passed through the palace gates.

The desert dust still clung to their plastic sandals and tattered clothes as they sat down under vaulted ceilings and crystal chandeliers. Waiters in black uniforms served up platters of roast chicken legs and heaping plates of pulau rice with raisins, almonds and pistachios.

The elders of the Tokhi and Hotak tribes, ethnic Pashtuns from Zabol province, ate their meal off fine china and washed it down with tumblers of doogh, a salty yogurt drink sprinkled with chopped mint.

Karzai, 48, himself the son of a Pashtun chief, assured them that he would try to find a solution to their 40-year-old argument with the Nasir tribe.

"My father spent all of his life solving tribal problems, and I was with him the whole time," he said. The elders muttered skeptically.

Most presidents don't concern themselves with tribal disputes, but Karzai, like Afghan kings of old, makes local quarrels part of his daily routine.

Five years after the fall of Kabul, aides say he is turning to tradition as he struggles to build a stable democracy on a foundation of war, corruption, foreign interference and religious extremism. Critics counter that he is retreating behind the walls of his 19th century palace and losing touch with a country sinking deeper into trouble.

But Karzai's foreign backers have left him with little real power, and his weak, corruption-riddled government lacks direct control over billions of dollars in development aid, money meant to help Karzai win Afghan support for his administration.

After the United States joined forces with Afghanistan's Northern Alliance militia to oust the Taliban regime, it pledged to help rebuild the country and chose Karzai to lead the effort. Since then, foreign donors have spent at least $16 billion in Afghanistan; more than $10.3 billion of that has come from the United States.

Afghanistan has made enormous progress in some areas. With hopes for a better future soaring, its citizens defied insurgent threats to elect Karzai to a full term two years ago and to choose a parliament last year. The elections were the freest and fairest in the country's history.

Under Karzai, more than 90% of Afghan children are in school, compared with fewer than 20% during Taliban rule. A multinational effort is training an army that is halfway to its goal of 70,000 soldiers in uniform, as it strives to overcome ethnic divisions, equipment problems and low morale. Parliament is gradually asserting its authority. A full quarter of the members are women.

But the progress has not met the rising expectations of Karzai's countrymen. Many see the nation slipping back into the grip of violence, corruption and extremism from which the West promised to liberate them.

On paper, the post-Taliban constitution gives Afghanistan's president ample power. But parliament wrangled with Karzai for months over his Cabinet picks and rejected his nominee to head the Supreme Court.

He has had better success shuffling provincial governors, but several are still regarded as corrupt and ineffective. Central government influence remains weak in large parts of the country.

Perhaps Karzai's greatest strength is giving pep talks to Afghans at news conferences and in speeches, urging them to unite and solve their problems. Still, many say they would prefer honest justice, jobs and peace to fine words.

From ethnic minorities in the north to his fellow Pashtuns in the south, Karzai faces the same growing disaffection.

Sitting on a curb in the northern city of Mazar-i-Sharif, Sanam Shah spoke of the Karzai era's mixed blessings. A mother of eight and an ethnic Uzbek, she suffers kidney and digestive problems and traveled from her desert village of Andkhoi to find a good doctor.

Foreign aid has delivered new equipment to her local clinic, but none of the employees are properly trained to use it, she said, speaking through the mesh of her white burka veil. "I think Karzai is doing a fine job, but nothing has changed in my life," she said.

Hundreds of miles to the south in Lowgar, the owner of a two-pump gas station, a Pashtun, said he was unemployed under the Taliban but was able start his own business when U.S. aid rebuilt the highway.

But the Taliban are back, scaring off customers by ambushing cars at night, said Hekmatullah, who, like many Afghans, uses one name.

"Power is back in the hands of those who had it before, like warlords, the Taliban and thieves," he said. "Nobody pays attention to poor people like us."

DOJ_NMG_0093097

In the eyes of Afghans, the restrictions on Karzai's authority imposed by foreign governments make him a shadow of a president with only the trappings of power: photo opportunities, ribbon cuttings, bodyguards with wraparound sunglasses who carry M-4 assault rifles and whisper into microphones in the sleeves of their dark suits.

Although Karzai is officially commander in chief, he has no control over the foreign troops fighting the Taliban insurgency and little over his own army, which answers to the United States and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. His defense minister's main job is cajoling donors into providing the army with better equipment.

Karzai repeatedly has demanded changes in tactics, but each time foreign troops accidentally kill Afghan civilians, he loses credibility with his people.

In the meantime, the insurgency has spread across more than half the country, with fighters advancing northward from strongholds in the east and pushing all the way to the Iranian border in the west. Government officials say the militants in villages and districts near Kabul, the capital, are laying the groundwork for future offensives.

Former mujahedin retain ties to their old commanders, and many are ready to fight again if democracy falters.

Corruption in the courts and police has made many Afghans nostalgic for the Taliban's ruthless justice. The threat of violence has forced hundreds of schools to close and left others without enough books or teachers.

The country's gross domestic product has doubled since Karzai came to office, but the drug trade is the largest employer and source of income. Drugs account for half of Afghanistan's economy and create what the United Nations calls a "narco society."

Despite hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign aid aimed at persuading farmers to grow legal crops, this year's opium harvest is expected to set a record. It's up 50% from last year, to an estimated 6,700 tons, the U.N. said in early September.

Though reconstruction spending could help the government draw support away from drug lords, the Taliban and other foes, only a quarter of public spending goes through the Afghan government, World Bank figures show.

U.S. money supports a wide variety of projects to improve agriculture and government institutions, support schools and clinics, and rebuild roads, bridges, canals and other infrastructure destroyed by war. But unlike Britain and a few other countries, the United States has not demonstrated confidence in Karzai's government by giving it direct control of the funds.

William Byrd, senior economic advisor at the World Bank office in Kabul, said more of the money should be channeled through the government, allowing Afghans to learn to handle it and showing respect for the country's sovereignty.

"The only way to get these government systems going is to start working with them, and in them, rather than on parallel tracks outside," he said.

Aid groups and their contractors are also guilty of corruption, but they aren't accountable to Afghan voters, said Jawed Ludin, Karzai's chief of staff.

"Democracy is about the empowerment of people," Ludin said in an interview. "To make democracy in Afghanistan real, we should give the Afghan people the sense that they can control things, that they can implement their own decisions."

Journey from Pakistan

UNTIL the war to oust the Taliban five years ago, Osama bin Laden and other Al Qaeda leaders were comfortably entrenched in Afghanistan and Karzai was living in exile in Pakistan, trying to organize opposition.

Karzai shared a Pashtun heritage with most of the Taliban. His father, Abdul Ahad Karzai, was chief of the Popalzai tribe. Karzai inherited that post when his father was killed in 1999 in what was widely regarded as a warning from the Taliban to Pashtuns who opposed them.

In October 2001, with the war underway, Karzai entered southern Afghanistan with a small group of armed men, including U.S. Special Forces, to rally tribal leaders on the mullahs' home turf.

For those Afghans suspicious of U.S. intentions, Karzai's close ties to the U.S. military were an issue from the start. When Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld announced that an American chopper had rescued Karzai from a firefight with the Taliban, Karzai insisted that he had walked away from the battle and never left Afghanistan.

Still, Ludin now cites that incursion into the Taliban heartland as a sad irony.

"The president and American Special Forces were going in a leisurely fashion from village to village in 2001, and they were welcomed everywhere," Ludin said. "And everywhere they went, the Taliban were driven away from those villages, districts and provinces without a fight."

Five years later, President Karzai can't risk a visit to his home region. "Now these same areas are seen as hotbeds of the Taliban and terrorism," Ludin said. "Today, if the president wants to go to Kandahar, he needs massive security arrangements."

Ludin blames Pakistan for reviving an insurgency that once looked to be on its last legs.

After they were ousted from power in 2001, the Taliban retreated to bases in Pakistan, where the military's powerful Inter-Services Intelligence agency had once nurtured them. From there, the Taliban and its allies regrouped in eastern and southern Afghanistan, U.S. military intelligence documents say.

DOJ_NMG_0093098

Washington today regards Pakistan as a key ally in fighting terrorism, but many Afghans suspect the country of playing a double game, cooperating with the United States while fostering the Taliban insurgency.

Karzai wants the U.S. to do more to stop the insurgency at its roots in Pakistan, but Washington strongly supports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

Karzai's frustration over tactics used by the U.S. and allied military forces, including the continued bombing of civilian areas, is raw. Senior Afghan officials are surprisingly frank about the dangers of foreign military dominance.

Despite the success in uniting Afghanistan's fractured ethnic groups into a national army, a senior aide to Karzai, speaking on condition of anonymity, called the army a "sort of lame-duck institution" without the capacity to make decisions.

"It will fall the instant that the U.S. military is not behind it," the official said.

An open tent

KARZAI lives and works in an 83-acre compound called the Arg-e-Shahi, or Citadel of the King, which was built in 1880 to replace a royal fortress destroyed by British troops. Three miles and a world away, one of his chief critics, Ramazan Bashar Dost, holds court in a large canvas tent in Kabul's main park. Outside, noisy children chase soccer balls in the swirling dust.

Each afternoon, Dost, a member of Afghanistan's parliament, sits next to a small, round folding table, framed by two yellow tent poles sunk into a dirt floor honeycombed with cracks. He listens quietly as Afghans vent their anger over corruption, unemployment and other ills.

Dost has become a kind of anti-Karzai, a French-educated intellectual who presides over a humble court of last resort where anyone is free to take a seat and gripe or ask for help, no appointment required. He is in high demand as ordinary Afghans wait their turn to complain about big issues such as corruption and foreign interference, or something as small as bullies at school.

Dozens duck through the tent flap each day, joining a circle of people waiting on plastic patio chairs in the dim light of a bare bulb. Some of Dost's visitors are fellow intellectuals who come to debate policy; others are activists who lobby for legislative agendas. But, like most of the people clamoring for Karzai's time, the majority in Dost's tent are seeking solutions to personal problems.

A few bedsheet banners hang on the tent's faded yellow walls. One explains the meaning of democracy in Dari, one of Afghanistan's main languages.

"Demo = people, cracy = government," it explains. "The famous definition by Abraham Lincoln is government of the people, for the people and by the people."

Dost resigned as planning minister last year after Karzai refused to let him shut down most nongovernmental aid agencies, which Dost claimed were embezzling money. The controversy made Dost one of Afghanistan's most admired politicians.

He offers a sympathetic ear to Afghans who feel wronged by the system. Even if Dost can't solve their problems, the visitors seem to leave feeling they've accomplished something. At least he sat and listened, which is more than most felt they got from bureaucrats.

Afghans also rely on Dost to tell uncomfortable truths if he can't pressure Afghan officials to do so first. As an example, he cites the roughly $60,000 a month the government had been paying two German experts to fix the national airline, Ariana. "Ariana has become worse. It is more dangerous," he said.

Meanwhile, the families of men who died fighting the Soviets in the 1980s get no more than $6 a month in compensation. "The Afghan people see this gap between $6 and $60,000 and they say they cannot accept this impossible situation," Dost said.

Examples like that are, "in my opinion, the biggest reason why the Taliban have become so strong in Afghanistan," he said. "Now the Afghan people have lost their trust in the international community."

Karzai's leadership style is making matters worse, Dost said. "He has a tribal image of the state. He believes that he's not a president of a country, but he's a father of a family, or a chief of a tribe."

One summer evening, a 22-year-old orphan came to ask Dost's help in finding money to launch an agency for street children and other orphans. Another young man wanted Dost to arrange a transfer to a safer high school because thugs were threatening him.

Dost took notes and gave the men slips of paper with the phone numbers of government officials who might help. But he didn't hold out much hope.

"For Afghan people, democracy means you can do anything you want," Dost said. "There are no rules, no laws, no justice or authority. When you have power now in Afghanistan, then you have the money, and you can have everything."

Behind palace walls

IN contrast to Dost's tent, Karzai's door is difficult to pass through. Few Afghans are allowed onto the palace grounds, and those who are must make their way through at least five high-security layers. Dogs sniff for explosives. Guards scrutinize pens, key chains and other everyday items.

DOJ_NMG_0093099

A suspected Taliban militant tried to assassinate Karzai in 2002 as he waved from an open-roofed car in Kandahar, his hometown. Karzai's American guards killed the would-be assassin. Now his trips outside Kabul are infrequent.

Karzai allowed an intimate look behind the scenes on two difficult days this summer as he toiled in his palace. He declined to sit for an interview, but he allowed a reporter and photographer to watch him maneuver the shifting sands of Afghan politics, culture and war.

The president's office is in the two-story Gul Khana, or House of Flowers, whose outer walls have softball-sized patches where masons have filled in hundreds of shrapnel holes from Afghanistan's long years of war. He lives there with his wife, Zinat, an OB-GYN who stays mostly out of the public eye. They have no children.

His is a draining schedule. Karzai, who earned a degree in political science in India, works seven days a week, 12 hours a day, normally starting with a briefing from his intelligence chief.

On a routine day this summer, he met with French Defense Minister Michele Alliot-Marie. That was followed by a meeting with his two vice presidents and other senior officials to discuss Cabinet nominations.

Karzai sat in a high-backed chair behind a large wooden desk that had a small globe of colored stone in one corner. His officials sat at a glass-topped boardroom table, polished to such a gloss that it mirrored Karzai.

Then Karzai had lunch with the elders from Zabol.

The petitioners were reaching for the toothpicks when Mohammed Nabi Tokhi, a retired senator who is said to be more than 100 years old, rose from his seat next to Karzai.

His fiery eyes were magnified by the thick lenses of black-rimmed glasses. Tottering to a microphone stand, he said a prayer for the president and then railed against the Nasir tribe, whom he accused of stealing about 2,500 acres of Tokhi land in the 1960s.

"They are a faithless tribe, a tribe of cowards," he said, his voice rising. "There is no way that we and the Nasirs will ever be able to live together in one area."

There was little Karzai could do that wouldn't anger one side. So he passed the problem to a special commission and urged his bickering fellow Pashtuns to talk to each other.

"No matter what you say," he told the Zabol elders, "you have to accept one thing: The Nasiris are also an Afghan tribe and they have equal rights with other tribes, don't they? Are they the sons of this nation or not?"

"Yes," a few men replied. Others grumbled or pushed past Karzai's guards to press their own petitions into his hands.

Afterward, Karzai retreated to his inner office, where he usually has some quiet time each afternoon. Typically he settles into a leather armchair to watch news on a large flat-screen TV or read a book before returning to his official schedule, which often runs until 10 p.m.

The next day, Karzai received a delegation of about 30 villagers from Oruzgan province, where U.S. bombers had killed about 60 civilians along with scores of Taliban fighters.

Over green tea and sponge cake, Karzai related how Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar had once asked him to join the regime as foreign minister. Karzai said he saw the Taliban, then backed by Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, as a foreign tool and wrote to Omar, "This nation has never been a slave and will never be a slave."

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Karzai said, he was sitting on a mountain in Oruzgan when his hand-held satellite phone rang. The call was from an aide to Omar who said the chief wanted to speak to him on a field radio. Karzai told him that he didn't have a radio and that his phone's battery was dying.

"Then this guy told me, 'Mullah Omar is asking, "What do you want?" ' I said: 'Hey man! I want my country!' " Karzai recounted. " 'Kick the foreigners out of this nation.' "

Afghanistan's enemies are still allied with foreigners, Karzai told the elders. Then he turned to look into the eyes of Abdul Rauf, a shy 7-year-old who had lost his family in the American bombing.

"He saw his father and mother dying but couldn't do anything. He is just a child," an elder said as Karzai sadly shook his head.

"The enemies are coming from Pakistan," the president said, "and the international community is bombarding them. And, caught in between, we suffer, not Pakistan."

It was time for Karzai to go. He told the elders the future was in their hands.

"They should not bombard us like this!" one shouted back.

"Definitely! You are right," Karzai replied. "Don't call me the president. Call me your small brother, call me your son. I am your servant, not your president. If you need anything just tell me."

"The first need of the people is security," another elder interrupted. "And security comes when the nation and the government get together."

DOJ_NMG_0093100

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Shower Curtain Sold Separately (NYT)

By Elizabeth Olson

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

When the government presented L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former head of Tyco International, with a bill for $167 million in fines and restitution, it was likely that everything would have to go.

After his 2005 conviction for looting Tyco, Mr. Kozlowski sold some big-ticket belongings, including his 130-foot yacht Endeavor and Impressionist paintings, whittling his debt to $59 million.

Now he's parting with his 8,600-square-foot chalet in Beaver Creek, Colo., complete with eight bedrooms and nine and a half baths — including one decked out as an outhouse. The sale price was $10 million, reduced from $11.5 million.

Brokers declined to identify the new owner, an oil-and-gas man based in Dallas, but said he also paid $750,000 for Mr. Kozlowski's furnishings, which include a stuffed mountain lion to greet visitors but no shower curtain like the infamous $6,000 model in his Manhattan flat. ELIZABETH OLSON

CASH ONLY, PLEASE Speaking of restitution, the Securities and Exchange Commission settled its lawsuit against five executives of the failed NextCard online credit card bank, which collapsed in bankruptcy amid an accounting scandal in 2002.

Without admitting or denying wrongdoing, the five people — John V. Hashman, the chief executive; Yinzi Cai, the chief operating officer; Bruce Rigione, the finance chief; Douglas Wachtel, the controller; and Jeremy R. Lent, chairman and chief strategy officer — agreed to pay a total of $1.4 million in restitution to investors.

Most of the cash, $894,000, will come from Mr. Lent, a co-founder and the chief executive for four years. He was accused of having sold $7 million worth of NextCard stock before the company failed. MARK A. STEIN

LANDING ON HIS FEET Five months after Delta Air Lines eliminated his job as chief marketing officer to save money, Paul G. Matsen has checked into the Cleveland Clinic. There's nothing ailing Mr. Matsen, 47. He was hired to help the hospital and medical research center expand its services — and its brand name — abroad.

The clinic recently opened an office in Toronto and signed an agreement to build and operate a hospital in Abu Dhabi. "But we are looking at more expansion," said Mr. Matsen, who likened the challenge to an airline opening international routes.

He noted that airlines and hospitals had a few things in common — neither is known for good food — but he added that the health benefits in his new job were hard to beat. BARNABY J. FEDER

REAL MONEY Having already pleaded guilty to securities fraud for his role in booking phantom revenue at the dot-com Homestore, Peter B. Tafeen agreed last week to settle a civil lawsuit in the matter by paying more than $2.6 million.

A day before Mr. Tafeen settled the civil suit, Judge Percy Anderson of Federal District Court in Los Angeles ordered him to pay $240,000 in restitution directly to investors and sentenced him to federal prison for 30 months. MARK A. STEIN

WILL WORK FOR A CURE The prospect of riches was not what inspired Raymond E. Joslin to leave a 40-year career in cable television for a medical research company. It was a concern about cancer.

Mr. Joslin, the former president of Hearst Entertainment and Syndication, became chief executive of CAD Sciences, which creates cancer-detection software, in 2004.

"Just about every family on earth is affected one way or another by cancer," Mr. Joslin, who had a brush with prostate cancer in 1999, said at a recent benefit for the Breast Cancer Alliance.

He said he had invested "quite a bit" in CAD, and pays himself only $1 a year. "But," he said, "I negotiated a 50 percent severance clause. If they fire me, I get 50 cents." FRANCINE PARNES

DO AS WE — ER, NEVER MIND Among an American ambassador's duties is the promotion of free enterprise, markets and trade as vital to a robust economy. Imagine how hard that became as Enron set off an avalanche of corporate scandals.

Three former ambassadors met at Southern New Hampshire University in Manchester last week to reminisce. They were A. Elizabeth Jones, a former ambassador to Kazakhstan; Cynthia P. Schneider, a former ambassador to the Netherlands; and Carl Spielvogel, the advertising executive who was ambassador to Slovakia.

Myron Kandel, the host, said ambassadors used to cite "the ethics, values and rule of law" underpinning American business. That, he added wryly, has been "sorely tested" lately. MARK A. STEIN

WELL, MAYBE HIM At a discussion sponsored by The Week magazine on "The Digital Media Revolution," Michael J. Wolf, the president of MTV Networks, said technology means constant change and "nothing is going to last forever."

At which point someone in the audience at the Four Seasons restaurant asked, "Not even Sumner?" — a reference to Sumner M. Redstone, the famously controlling, 83-year-old chairman of Viacom and Mr. Wolf's boss.

DOJ_NMG_0093101

The aside drew laughs from the audience, particularly from Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius, the satellite radio company — and the former president and chief operating officer of Viacom. LAWRENCE INGRASSIA

CRIMINAL LAW:

More Subpoenas In Menendez Probe (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Jeff Whelan

Newark Star-Ledger, November 11, 2006

Federal investigators have resumed their inquiry into a rental deal between U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) and a nonprofit agency, issuing new subpoenas in the days after he was elected to a full six-year term, according to a government source.

The subpoenas sought documents related to the more than $300,000 in rent Menendez collected from the North Hudson Community Action Corp. between 1994 and 2003, the source said. It was unclear what records were sought or who was subpoenaed.

"More are coming," said the source, who declined to be named because of the sensitive nature of the investigation.

Matt Miller, a spokesman for Menendez, said neither the senator nor his campaign or congressional office has been contacted by federal authorities. He said Menendez is unaware of any new subpoenas and maintains he did nothing wrong.

"We're confident that when the U.S. Attorney's Office completes its review it will come to the same conclusion as the House Ethics Committee, that the transaction was completely appropriate," Miller said.

The latest development cuts short Menendez's political honeymoon as he prepares to head back to Washington next week as part of a new Democratic majority in Congress. Menendez's victory Tuesday was critical to Democrats taking control of the U.S. Senate by 51 to 49.

In September, federal authorities launched the investigation by issuing a subpoena seeking records of the rental deal between Menendez and North Hudson, a nonprofit that provides health care and social services to the poor.

The first subpoena followed a report in The Star-Ledger that Menendez collected more than $300,000 in rent from the organization while he represented Hudson County in the U.S. House of Representatives. Menendez leased a Union City house to the agency that it used for an administrative office. During that period, he also helped the nonprofit win millions of dollars in federal funding.

Republican State Sen. Tom Kean Jr. made the probe a central issue in his unsuccessful campaign to unseat Menendez, who repeatedly denied he was under investigation.

Told of the subpoena yesterday, Kean said: "The people have spoken and I respect their decision. At the same time, I stand by the message and the thrust of my campaign and believe that the issue of corruption continues to be of critical important to the citizens of New Jersey."

Independent ethics observers have said Menendez's rental deal posed a conflict of interest, but Menendez said he had received verbal clearance for the deal from the House Ethics Committee. He also said the agency paid just below market rent. The House ethics attorney whom Menendez said he consulted at the time said recently that there is no rule against such an arrangement.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie's office has repeatedly said it will neither confirm nor deny any investigation.

Menendez sought to downplay the subpoena throughout the campaign. He initially denied being represented by one criminal lawyer who had contacted the U.S. Attorney's Office on his behalf. Just days before Election Day, he acknowledged that for months, another attorney, Marc Elias, had been representing him in the matter.

Miller maintained again yesterday that the senator is not under investigation. He said Elias contacted the U.S. Attorney's Office in September and was told federal authorities did not need any information from the senator and that Menendez "had no status in any investigation" as a target or a subject.

Menendez spent the day thanking his supporters on Wednesday before leaving for an out-of-state vacation on Thursday, Miller said. He'll be back at work next week, he said.

FBI Probes May Target Congress (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The new chief of the FBI's Criminal Division, which is swamped with public corruption cases, says the bureau is ramping up its ability to catch crooked politicians and might run an undercover sting on Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0093102

Assistant FBI Director James Burrus called the bureau's public corruption program "a sleeping giant that we've awoken" and predicted the nation will see continued emphasis in that area "for many, many, many years to come."

So much evidence of wrongdoing is surfacing in the nation's capital that Burrus recently committed to adding a fourth 15- to 20-member public corruption squad to the FBI's Washington field office.

In the past year, former Republican Reps. Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney have pleaded guilty to corruption charges. FBI agents are investigating about a dozen other members of Congress, including as many as three senators. The Justice Department also is expected to begin seeking indictments soon after a massive FBI investigation of the Alaska Legislature.

If conditions warrant, Burrus said, he wouldn't balk at urging an undercover sting like the famed Abscam operation in the late 1970s in which a U.S. senator and six House members agreed on camera to take bribes from FBI agents posing as Arab sheikhs.

"We look for those opportunities a lot," Burrus said, using words rarely heard at the bureau during the past quarter century. "I would do it on Capitol Hill. I would do it in any state legislature. ... If we could do an undercover operation, and it would get me better evidence, I'd do it in a second."

Philip Heymann, who oversaw the Abscam investigation as chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division during the Carter administration, expressed surprise to learn of the FBI's willingness to attempt another congressional sting after the outcry from Capitol Hill over Abscam.

"It shows courage at the FBI," said Heymann, now a criminal law professor at Harvard University. He said he concluded, after watching a recent public television documentary and listening to experts, that "there is more corruption (on Capitol Hill) than I ever thought imaginable" and that a single FBI sting "might result in very large numbers of prosecutions."

But even without an undercover operation, Heymann and other observers say they have been pleased with the GOP-controlled Justice Department's willingness to pursue old-fashioned investigations, even if they hurt congressional Republicans.

Nationally during the past year, 600 agents worked 2,200 public corruption cases, resulting in 650 arrests, 1,000 indictments and 800 convictions, Burrus said.

"Operation Rainmaker," the FBI's broad investigation of a Washington lobbying ring, has already led to a handful of convictions, including Ney's guilty plea last month. The inquiry was one reason for the resignation last year of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who also faces state campaign finance charges. Other investigations seem to be sprouting everywhere.

But Reid Weingarten, a former Abscam prosecutor who now is a high-profile Washington criminal defense lawyer, said he would bet that the flurry of congressional cases has resulted from evidence "falling in their (investigators') laps," rather than a programmed FBI hunt for corruption.

The FBI does appear to be stepping up its use of electronic surveillance and has conducted stings of state politicians. Bureau agents secretly taped Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., before finding $90,000 in his freezer during a raid last May. Cell phones were wiretapped for four months in an investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., government sources say.

In "Operation Tennessee Waltz," 10 Tennessee state officials, including five current and former legislators, have been prosecuted in a scheme in which hidden cameras whirred as FBI undercover agents offered payoffs in return for help for a dummy company. Burrus said some targeted Tennessee legislators were moving so quickly that "we were actually having to discuss how we were going to slow it down" so that bills aiding the phony firm didn't become law.

A separate undercover inquiry led to the indictment of three members of San Diego's city council.

In Alaska, the FBI has more than doubled its manpower in a sweeping investigation of allegations that an oil industry services company bribed state legislators, people familiar with the inquiry said. On Aug. 31 and Sept. 1, the FBI conducted two dozen raids and searched the office of state Sen. Ben Stevens, son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska.

Burrus declined to discuss any investigation but said the FBI will focus on more state capitals during the next year, "because we have seen a trend in cases that leads us to believe there's more out there."

When he arrived as deputy chief of the criminal division in 2004, he said, field offices frequently told him they had "no idea" how to pursue public corruption leads. Since then, he said, agents in about 30 of the bureau's 56 field offices have been trained. FBI agents in Washington have studied congressional activities that might invite bribes, such as hard-to-trace "earmarks" in which members appropriate money for pet projects, often keeping their involvement off the public record.

"Public corruption cases have to be fished out," he said, noting that crooked politicians tend to do secret deals with one other person and often try to disguise their actions as "for the public's good."

Controversial new legal theories are also helping prosecutors bring cases in which they can't prove outright briberies. A vaguely written, 28-word 1988 law, for example, makes it a fraud for a politician to deprive taxpayers of "honest services." It was among the charges lodged against Cunningham, Ney, former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the San Diego councilmen.

DOJ_NMG_0093103

Burrus said the FBI has to prove "that this person engaged in the activities specifically to receive this stream of benefits and knew that stream of benefits would stop if he did not support these particular projects."

Death Penalty Sought In Hawai'i Case (HONADV)

By Ken Kobayashi, Advertiser Courts Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, November 12, 2006

"Whatever you want to believe about the death penalty, it should never be used for political purposes, and it should never be used simply because, like a nuclear weapon, it's out there, so let's play with it."

— Alexander Silvert | attorney for Naeem Williams' wife

"The Justice Department has determined that the torture and beating to death of a small child warrants the death penalty as an optional sentence."

— Edward Kubo | U.S. attorney

Justice Department officials have overruled federal prosecutors here and authorized seeking the death penalty for an Army soldier in a move critics say is part of a nationwide attempt by the Bush administration to spread capital punishment to non-death-penalty states.

Naeem Williams, charged with murdering his 5-year-old daughter last year, is believed to be the first in the country to face the death penalty under a provision passed by Congress three years ago for first-degree murder cases involving "a pattern or practice of assault or torture against a child or children."

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Hawai'i recommended against seeking capital punishment for Williams and his wife, Delilah, who is also charged with the murder, according to sources familiar with the case who do not want to be identified because the recommendation is considered confidential.

The Justice Department went along with the recommendation for the 21-year-old wife, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who must approve federal death penalty prosecutions, authorized seeking capital punishment for the husband.

That move is part of a trend under the Bush administration to seek the death penalty in Hawai'i and 11 other states that don't have capital punishment, some critics of the death penalty believe.

WHITE HOUSE AGENDA

Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft authorized 180 death penalty prosecutions, including 51 cases in which the local U.S. attorney's office did not recommend capital punishment, according to the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, a national information clearinghouse for court-appointed defense lawyers in federal death-penalty cases.

Fourteen of the 51 cases are from non-capital-punishment states, said Kevin McNally, a Kentucky lawyer with the project.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the non-profit Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, D.C., which is critical of the way the death penalty is applied in this nation, said Ashcroft wanted to uniformly apply capital punishment across the country.

"To him, that meant seeking it in places that don't have the death penalty," Dieter said.

Dieter said there hasn't been any change in philosophy under Gonzales. He said local federal prosecutors now "have less of a say in the process."

Under President Clinton's administration, no one from a non-death-penalty state was sitting on a federal death row, but now there are six, Dieter said.

There are two from Iowa, and one each from Massachusetts, Michigan, Vermont and North Dakota.

David Bruck, a South Carolina lawyer with the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, raised concerns as early as 2003, when he said the trend reflected an attempt to "nationalize capital punishment."

"I don't think there's any doubt that this administration believes its role to be enforcing the death penalty nationwide without regard to local beliefs or policies," Bruck said in a recent interview.

He said Ashcroft dropped a provision under his predecessor Janet Reno that prevented federal death-penalty prosecutions when capital punishment was not authorized in the state where the crime occurred.

"This administration from the top down has been vigorously pro-death penalty," he said.

The criticism has been echoed by capital-punishment opponents in non-death-penalty states.

When Donald Fell was sentenced to death this year by a federal judge in Vermont for the 2000 fatal beating of a 53-year-old woman, the American Civil Liberties Union said Ashcroft sought to bring capital punishment to states without the death penalty. Vermont's ACLU said Ashcroft had earlier rejected a tentative plea agreement by federal prosecutors calling for a life term for Fell.

Vermont abolished the death penalty in 1987.

CONGRESS' ROLE

Peter Watkins, a spokesman for the Bush White House, deferred comment to the Justice Department on whether the administration is trying to expand the death penalty to non-capital-punishment states.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department, Kathleen Blomquist, said the recommendations by U.S. attorneys are confidential and that the department does not comment on the decision-making in specific cases.

Blomquist, however, said the goal of the department's capital-punishment review and decision-making process is a "fair, consistent and even-handed application of the federal capital sentencing laws nationwide to the worst offenders who commit the most egregious offenses."

The death-penalty prosecution will be unusual for Hawai'i, which abolished capital punishment in 1957. Sporadic attempts to revive it have never gotten far in the state Legislature, and Hawai'i remains one of 12 states that do not have capital punishment.

Congress, however, has authorized the death penalty throughout the country for federal crimes, starting in 1988 for drug kingpins. The law was expanded in 1994 to cover other offenses, such as murder for hire and murder of government officials. The provision involving a pattern of abuse and torture of children was added in 2003.

Currently, 46 prisoners from 20 states are sitting on federal death rows, according to the Death Penalty Information Center. Only three, including Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, have been executed under the federal death-penalty law. All three were executed by lethal injection.

In announcing on Sept. 8 that it would seek the death penalty in Williams' case, federal prosecutors accused the soldier of committing the murder in an "especially heinous, cruel and depraved manner in that it involved torture and serious physical abuse." The prosecutors said Williams' 5-year-old daughter was "particularly vulnerable because of her youth."

Williams also tried to thwart the investigation by washing his daughter's blood from the walls and instructing his wife to give a false statement to authorities, the prosecutors said.

In his statement to Army investigators, Williams said he used a belt on his daughter, Talia, daily for four months. On the morning of her death, July 16 of last year, he repeatedly hit the girl to discipline her, he told investigators. Later, he slapped her and she fell on her face, he said.

When the girl became unresponsive, he and his wife didn't call 911 for about an hour because Delilah Williams feared authorities would take away her 4-month-old baby, he said.

The autopsy report concluded Talia died from "inflicted head trauma due to battered child syndrome."

David Klein, Naeem Williams' lawyer, said the decision to seek the death penalty "compounded" the "tragic case."

He said his client "has no record of any significant convictions" and "has served his country in the military for a number of years."

Alexander Silvert, the first assistant federal public defender who is representing Delilah Williams, said he doesn't think capital punishment is appropriate for either defendant.

Silvert said he believes the death penalty is being sought for political reasons by the administration with Bush associates from Texas, a pro-capital punishment state. He said he fears the Justice Department is using the case to "test" the 2003 law.

U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo said the department did not reach its position because it wanted to "test" the new law.

"I don't think the president or any of the people under him from Texas knows about this case way out in Hawai'i," he said.

FIRST UNDER NEW LAW

Naeem Williams was initially charged by the military, but when the case was transferred to federal prosecutors in August last year, Kubo said Naeem and Delilah Williams were the first in the country prosecuted under the new law involving torture and abuse of a child.

Kubo said he does not know if there are currently any similar prosecutions in the country. Spokeswoman Blomquist of the Justice Department said those statistics are not readily available.

Silvert said that as far as he knows, Naeem Williams is the first to face the death penalty under the 2003 provision.

"To treat this as a death penalty case is really unwarranted," Silvert said.

He said the girl did not die as a result of a deliberate act to kill her.

"I don't think anyone can seriously argue that the child was struck with the intention to kill the child," he said.

If Williams had been charged under state law, he would have been charged with second-degree murder, punishable by life in prison with parole, but not with death, he said.

Silvert said he believes the U.S. Attorney's Office here gave the "appropriate consideration" on the death penalty issue for both defendants. "I think this is coming from Washington (D.C.)," he said. "I think it's political."

He contended that with the strong backing of the Justice Department, Congress added the provision in 2003, and that one reason for seeking the death penalty in Williams' case is that the Justice Department views the law as "its new toy."

DOJ_NMG_0093105

"Whatever you want to believe about the death penalty, it should never be used for political purposes, and it should never be used simply because, like a nuclear weapon, it's out there, so let's play with it," he said.

Kubo disagreed.

"Unlike the state Legislature, Congress has determined that under certain horrific circumstances, death would be an appropriate sanction, and the Justice Department has determined that the torture and beating to death of a small child warrants the death penalty as an optional sentence," he said.

He said the law was in effect at the time Talia Williams died.

"Since it's clear what it mandates and it fits within the facts of this case, we're just following the law of Congress," he said.

OCTOBER TRIAL

Naeem Williams and his wife are both being held separately at the Federal Detention Center.

His case is expected to generate a huge amount of litigation before U.S. District Judge David Ezra because it is a death-penalty case.

"I expect the case to be zealously litigated by both sides," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Marshall Silverberg, who is handling the prosecution.

Delilah Williams was added to the case when she was indicted by a federal grand jury Oct. 12 on a charge of murdering the girl. The maximum sentence she would face if convicted is life in prison.

Both have pleaded not guilty. Their trial is scheduled for next October.

Naeem and Delilah Williams are declining to comment, their lawyers said.

Silvert said his client has "very mixed emotions" with the death of her stepchild and the decisions that leave only her husband facing the death penalty.

"There's a lot of emotions that run through that, and I think she's entitled to her own privacy," he said.

Reach Ken Kobayashi at kkobayashi@honoluluadvertiser.com.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Decision Could End Fight To Balance Hispanic Vote (ORS)

By Mark Pino, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, November 12, 2006

Osceola County officials could agree on Monday to settle a federal discrimination lawsuit.

When Ana Erazo walked into the elections office on a summer day in 1990, her supporters followed and applauded after she filed the paperwork to run for County Commission.

"It all started with me," said Erazo, the first Hispanic to seek a commission seat. "In those days, there was lot of prejudice against us."

Erazo's tale is the first chapter in the struggle of Osceola's Hispanics for political power that came to a head last year when the U.S. Department of Justice sued the county, claiming countywide elections violate the Voting Rights Act by diluting Hispanics' political power.

The county spent nearly $2 million fighting, but now it looks as if Hispanic voters in Osceola may have a better chance to elect one of their own.

Commissioners are expected to vote Monday night on a single-member district plan to settle the suit after a federal judge noted "racial hostility" in Osceola and found that elections are "racially polarized."

"There is also evidence of a history of discrimination against Hispanic voters and candidates," U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell wrote in his ruling last month. "It is clear from the record that voting in Osceola County tends to be racially polarized."

Osceola's Hispanic population went from 1,089 in 1980 to 50,727 in 2000, according to census figures. The trend has continued. Today, 43,161 of Osceola's 127,176 registered voters -- or about a third -- are Hispanic and many live in the communities of Buenaventura Lakes, Lakeside and Poinciana. By 2011, Osceola County's Hispanic population is expected to eclipse its non-Hispanic population -- 139,000 to 135,000.

While Presnell found signs of discrimination, he did not find intent, and that was some solace for commissioners, who say single-member districts would disenfranchise taxpayers because they no longer would have a say in electing four of the five commissioners.

"This commission never singled out any ethnic group and ruled against them," Commissioner Bill Lane said last week.

Many who oppose single-member districts say the problem is in poor campaigning and the fact that Hispanics have not turned out to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0093106

But Presnell noted numerous instances where the county's non-Hispanic, white power structure created obstacles for the Hispanic community.

In particular, he cited splitting the largely Hispanic community of Buenaventura Lakes into two commission districts in 2001 and problems Hispanic voters experienced at the polls over the years.

The county and the Justice Department entered an agreement that mandated bilingual ballots and Spanish-speaking poll workers after the 2000 elections when "Hispanics suffered from discrimination at the polls when they were turned away without being allowed to vote, refused assistance, forbidden to use their own interpreters, asked for multiple forms of identification (unlike non-Hispanic voters), and treated in a hostile manner by poll workers," the judge wrote.

Only one Hispanic, the late Robert Guevara, was ever elected to countywide office, though last week Carlos Irizarry became the first to win a seat on the Kissimmee City Commission.

"Guevara's campaign generated racial hostility from non-Hispanics including Guevara's opponent, Charles Owen, who sent a campaign mailer that depicted Guevara with darker skin and portrayed him as 'Night' and Owen as 'Day,' " Presnell affirmed.

Today, Owen admits he should not have listened to a consultant about that flier.

"Reflecting back, it is probably something that shouldn't have gone out," said Owen. "It wasn't in good taste. It was not very professional."

It was Erazo's success in Osceola's burgeoning Hispanic districts in her 1990 loss to Larry Whaley that set the wheels in motion for the off-and-on battle during the past 16 years over how to elect commissioners.

Under the threat of legal action from Hispanic leaders, commissioners put single-member districts on the 1992 ballot and voters approved a referendum that changed voting from countywide to the district system for commissioners and School Board members.

The person who benefited from the switch was Erazo's neighbor and campaign manager, Guevara, who by 1991 had assumed the presidency of the county's chapter of the American Hispanic Voters League from Erazo.

Guevara became the first Hispanic commissioner in 1996 when on the same ballot voters approved a return to countywide voting.

"I feel it is an injustice," said Erazo, who now lives in Puerto Rico. "Single-member districts are needed right now. When I go back [to visit], many people remember me. I ask, 'Why?' and they say, 'You were the first one.' "

Mark Pino can be reached at mpino@orlandosentinel.com or 407-931-5935.

100 Bilingual Poll Workers Achieve Goal (RMA)

By NATALIA E. ARBULÚ

The Springfield Republican (MA), November 11, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - With more than 100 bilingual poll workers manning all but four voting precincts on Tuesday, the city has met a goal set in its voter reform agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice.

The federal government had filed suit against the city for violating the rights of Spanish-speaking residents by failing to provide enough help at the polls.

The reform agreement, reached in August, called for the city to have at least 95 bilingual poll workers who speak Spanish and English working at Tuesday's election.

Of the city's 410 poll workers, 127 are bilingual in Spanish and English and five speak Vietnamese, said Gladys Oyola, the city's Spanish Language Election Program coordinator.

The Justice Department required bilingual poll workers at all but four of the city's 64 precincts based on the number of voters with Spanish surnames in each precinct, said Election Commissioner Kathy Hoar Fleury.

Fleury said on Thursday that the Election Office has worked "extremely hard" to comply with the agreement.

"I think we've done a heck of a job in a short time," Fleury said.

The office has yet to calculate the number of bilingual workers that worked at Election Day, but Fleury said the figure is close to the original number hired.

Federal observers monitored the polls on Tuesday to ensure Springfield's compliance with the Voting Rights Act, as they did during the Sept. 19 primary election, but they were at fewer locations this time.

City Solicitor Edward M. Pikula noted that the relationship between poll workers and federal observers was more cordial than it had been for the primary.

Jose Claudio, chairman of the city's Spanish Language Election Program Advisory Committee, said he has not received any complaints regarding bilingual poll workers.

The committee will meet later this month to discuss how things went on Election Day.

Maria Rivera was the sole bilingual worker at the Dunbar Community Center on Tuesday. Rivera said a lot of voters needed help because they did not understand how to vote or were illiterate in both languages.

Van Sickle Middle School had four bilingual workers. Poll worker Ivan Serrano said Hispanics who came to vote did not need services in Spanish. "A lot of Hispanic voting but not much help needed," Serrano said.

For the primary, the city exceeded the agreement's requirement to have 57 bilingual poll workers by 35 workers.

Feedback from federal observers for the primary was generally positive, Pikula said.

"Overall they were impressed with our ability to pull together an effort that we did in short period of time with limited resources," Pikula said.

The reports from federal observers regarding the primary have yet to be made public.

Pikula said city officials will once again confer with Justice Department lawyers to review observers' reports from the election and determine what the city needs to work on.

The case against Springfield will be dismissed by 2009 if the Justice Department is satisfied with the city's performance, Pikula said.

To Settle Suit In Boy's Death, New Jersey To Pay $7.5 Million (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, November 12, 2006

NEWARK, Nov. 11 (AP) — New Jersey has spent $7.5 million to settle a lawsuit over a child welfare case in which a 7-year-old boy's mummified remains were found in a basement here.

The payout, arranged last year but only recently announced, is the second-largest made by the State Division of Youth and Family Services over child welfare mistakes, according to state officials.

The size of the settlement is surpassed only by the $12.5 million the state agreed to give to four brothers from Collingswood who were deprived of food and medical care by their adoptive parents. The state announced that settlement last year.

With the Newark case, the settlement money is going to the estate of Faheem Williams, along with two of his siblings who are in foster care.

The discovery in January 2003 of Faheem's body prompted an overhaul of the child welfare agency. The state had investigated abuse complaints involving Faheem, but had closed the file 11 months before his body was found in the basement of an apartment rented by his older cousin, Sherry L. Murphy.

The boy's brothers — Raheem Williams, now 11, and Tyrone Hill Jr., 8 — were found emaciated in a room adjacent to where the body was found.

Faheem's cousin, Wesley Murphy, later pleaded guilty to reckless manslaughter, admitting that while the family was living in Irvington he had killed the child with a wrestling move in which he had forced his knee into the child's abdomen. He has since served his time.

Ms. Murphy pleaded guilty to two counts each of aggravated assault, criminal restraint and child endangerment for her treatment of the children, and is serving a 25-year prison sentence.

She admitted that she left the boy's body on the floor of her Irvington home, then put it in a plastic hamper, which she took with her when they moved to Newark.

Faheem, Raheem and Tyrone had been living with Ms. Murphy after their mother, Melinda Williams, went to prison for endangering a child she had been baby-sitting. Ms. Williams was released weeks before Faheem's death, but had left the children with Ms. Murphy, her sister.

The child welfare agency and state attorney general's office representatives say the settlement approved by a State Superior Court judge in Newark gives $1 million to Faheem's estate, $2.75 million to Raheem and $3.75 million to Tyrone.

Lawyers in the case say legal fees still need to be settled, as well as the question of whether the boys' mother will have access to the money.

A Family Court judge in Newark ended Ms. Williams's parental rights last summer. She has appealed.

ANTITRUST:

Gannett Emerges As Possible Bidder For Tribune Properties (CHIT)

By Michael Oneal And Phil Rosenthal, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, November 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093108

Turning up the heat on the already simmering auction for the assets of Chicago-based Tribune Co., Gannett Co., the nation's largest newspaper publisher, has emerged as a possible bidder for Tribune's newspaper properties, the Chicago Tribune learned Saturday.

Executives from the McLean, Va.-based media giant, which publishes 90 U.S. newspapers, including top-read USA Today, were in Chicago last week to hear presentations on Tribune's financial condition, two sources close to the situation said.

Tribune has been hosting a number of bidders as part of a process it put in place in September to enhance shareholder value by possibly selling all of the company's television and newspaper assets.

But the emergence of a potential buyer with the resources and clout of Gannett could significantly change the complexion of the bidding process.

Spokespeople for Tribune and Gannett on Saturday declined to comment for this story.

The sources noted that the Tribune sell-off is still in its early stages and that Gannett has participated in newspaper auctions before without pulling the trigger. Most recently, Gannett expressed formal interest in Knight Ridder Inc. before eventually backing away.

But assuming it is serious, Gannett would be the first so-called "strategic buyer"—Wall Street parlance for a suitor in the same industry—to jump into the fray.

Until now, bidding for Tribune assets had been thought to be limited to financial buyers: several large private equity firms and a handful of wealthy entrepreneurs. But, unhappy with bids that valued the whole company close to the current stock price of about $32 a share, Tribune began asking for bids on its parts—newspapers such as the Los Angeles Times and the Chicago Tribune and television stations such as WGN-Channel 9, among other properties.

Sources said that opening up the bidding increased the level of interest among potential buyers in recent days. Last week, Los Angeles billionaires Eli Broad and Ron Burkle, who had earlier expressed interest in the Los Angeles Times, instead put in a bid for the entire company.

That may have induced others to move off the sidelines. At least one other media company, Denver-based MediaNews, is also interested in some of Tribune's newspapers, most notably the Hartford Courant, the Stamford Advocate and the Morning Call in Allentown, Pa., another source said. It's not clear, however, whether MediaNews has officially joined the bidding.

The emergence of a strategic buyer such as Gannett could mark a shift in the process by presenting Tribune Co. management with more flexibility in how to divvy up the company, said one Chicago attorney who has participated in many such deals.

Unlike a private equity player or a wealthy individual, a newspaper company like Gannett might see more immediate value in Tribune's newspapers, since it is already a large operator of papers across the country and might be able to find operating efficiencies and synergies other buyers would not.

The auction for Knight Ridder earlier this year provides a good example. Initially, several teams of private equity companies, as well as MediaNews and Gannett, bid for the company, only to back out by the end. That left Sacramento, Calif.-based newspaper operator McClatchy Co. as the only bidder. McClatchy bought all the Knight Ridder papers and then immediately sold off the lower-growth ones. Because many of the Knight Ridder papers matched McClatchy's strategy, going through this process made sense in a way it didn't for others.

What Gannett's strategy would be is unclear. But industry sources noted that Gannett already owns several papers in Florida and would likely be most interested in owning Tribune Co.'s highly profitable papers in Orlando and Ft. Lauderdale.

In any deal for Tribune papers, taxes are likely to be an issue, since Tribune has owned its properties for so long. But tax experts say there are many ways around that, including tax-free, spin-off structures.

Tribune and Gannett have a long history of working together. Gannett earlier this year paid $180 million in cash for WATL-TV, Tribune's television station in Atlanta. And the companies are partners in several Internet-based businesses meant to replace the classified advertising disappearing from their newspaper pages: CareerBuilder.com, ShopLocal.com and Topix.net.

One consideration that might give Gannett pause in looking at Tribune's properties is the depressed state of the industry, which it knows as well as anybody.

Gannett, which also owns 23 television stations, is highly profitable—it earned $1.2 billion last year on revenues of $7.6 billion. But like every other traditional media company, it has been feeling the pressure of an anemic ad market for newspapers and local television stations, as well as declining readership and viewership. In the third quarter, the company reported a 12 percent decline in earnings stemming partly from expensing of stock options, but also because of "very challenging advertising environments that softened as the quarter progressed," Gannett Chief Executive Craig Dubow told analysts.

Mdoneal@tribune.com

PhilRosenthal@tribune.com

DOJ_NMG_0093109

Microsoft Jury Pool Faces Long Survey (DMR)

Des Moines Register, November 12, 2006

The class-action lawsuit against the software giant could be one of the longest in Iowa history.

It's not until question 61 that the 31-page survey begins to get to the point.

Do you find subjects dealing with computer technology:

___ Interesting

___ Boring

___ Somewhere in between

Those of you ready to check "boring" should count yourselves lucky if you are not scheduled to report for jury duty Monday in Des Moines.

About 450 registered voters, in two shifts, will converge on the Polk County Courthouse to begin what could be the weeks-long process of picking a jury for a class-action, antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp. The trial is expected to last several months and could be worth up to $450 million for lawyers and four named plaintiffs, who contend that the giant computer software company used anti-competitive practices to drive up the cost of its Windows operating system, as well as its Microsoft Office, Word and Excel programs.

Potential members of the class include any person, business or other large organization that bought those programs between May 18, 2004, and June 30, 2006.

Microsoft has denied overcharging its customers and insists that consumers received fair and reasonable prices.

The trial is expected to be one of the longest in Iowa history.

The pool of prospective jurors - several times larger than the number of people typically summoned by court officials for a week's worth of trials - will be dedicated completely to the Microsoft lawsuit.

Lawyers plan to require each would-be juror to fill out the questionnaire mentioned earlier, then use those answers as a first-round screening before posing any additional questions face to face.

The questionnaire asks would-be jurors to provide typical information about their background and employment history, as well as detailed responses about their history of computer use and their level of comprehension.

Lawyers will also seek insight by quizzing the potential jurors about their favorite TV programs, movies, newspapers and books and their political philosophy.

District Judge Scott Rosenberg will preside. Roxanne Conlin, a noted Des Moines lawyer, is among the attorneys representing the plaintiffs.

Sports Artist Sued For Mix Of Crimson And Tide (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

TUSCALOOSA, Ala., Nov. 7 — In the solemn cathedral of college football devotion and instruction that is the Paul W. Bryant Museum here, a large painting dominates the main chamber. It is called “The Sack,” and it shows an encounter between a Notre Dame quarterback and a human locomotive in crimson and white.

“I’ve never been hit like that before,” the quarterback, Steve Beuerlein, said after his near-lethal sack by Cornelius Bennett in 1986, in the University of Alabama’s first victory ever over his team.

Daniel A. Moore, who painted “The Sack” and scores of other renditions of signal moments in Alabama football history, said he felt something similar last year, when his fax machine began to spit out a lawsuit from the university.

Mr. Moore’s paintings, reproduced in prints and on merchandise, violated the university’s trademark rights, the suit said. It asked a federal judge to forbid him to, among other things, use the university’s “famous crimson and white color scheme.”

Athletes, sports leagues and universities around the nation have become increasingly aggressive in protecting what they say is their intellectual property, and their claims have met with a mixed response from judges and fans. But almost no one here thinks the suit against Mr. Moore is a good idea.

“This lawsuit is the equivalent of the Catholic Church suing Michelangelo for painting the Sistine Chapel,” said Keith Dunnavant, an Alabama alumnus and the author of “Coach: The Life of Paul ‘Bear’ Bryant.”

A university spokeswoman, Cathy Andreen, declined repeated requests for interviews with university officials and lawyers, on what she said was the advice of counsel.

James Glen Stovall, who taught journalism at the university for 25 years, said only one sort of person would support the suit.

DOJ_NMG_0093110

"I can see why, if you're sitting in a roomful of lawyers, you might come to that conclusion," Mr. Stovall said. "But no one outside of that room would say: 'Hey, that's a good idea. Let's sue Daniel Moore.' "

At his gallery in Birmingham, surrounded by prints and paintings reflecting his more than 25 years as a sports artist, Mr. Moore said he remained a loyal Alabama alumnus. He graduated from the university with an art degree in 1976; two of his daughters go there now, and a third is a recent graduate.

"I still love Alabama," he said. "I still love Alabama football. Obviously, I haven't yanked my daughters out of school."

But there is bitterness, too. For two decades, the university gave him sideline passes. Now he is not welcome on game day.

"As an artist," he said, "it helps to be there, to feel the emotion and excitement and strategy from an on-field perspective."

He said he did not understand why his work, copies of which have a place of pride in the dens of thousands of Alabama football fans, should not receive the same First Amendment protection that newspaper photographs do. "Artists," he said, "were the first journalists."

In its legal papers, the university's lawyers are grudging in their assessment of Mr. Moore's talent. "Though skillfully prepared," the lawyers wrote, Mr. Moore's art conveys nothing beyond the raw facts of football. Mr. Moore, the suit says, "literally replicates even the expression on the players' faces in his prints and he adds no message whatever not conveyed by the play itself."

That is not fair, Mr. Moore said. Though he uses photographs for reference, he said that his compositions and his style were his own. He calls his approach "photofuturism," which he describes as "five parts realism to one part motion."

Over the years, Mr. Moore said, his paintings and prints have cumulatively sold "in the low millions." An 8-by-10 reproduction sells for $25 retail, or $35 if it is signed. An original watercolor might go for $22,000, an oil for $65,000.

The university's lawyers seemed to take particular offense at Mr. Moore's use of his paintings on merchandise like coffee mugs and calendars.

In response, Mr. Moore did not hesitate to invoke his own intellectual property rights. "Because I own the copyright," he said, "it's my opinion that I can put it on anything I want to. I can put it on a tattoo on someone's backside."

Mr. Moore has asked Judge R. David Proctor of the Federal District Court in Birmingham to dismiss the case on First Amendment grounds. His brief cited a decision of the federal appeals court in California ruling that a trademark owner "does not have the right to control public discourse" if "the public imbues his mark with a meaning."

After the citation, Mr. Moore's lawyer, Stephen D. Heninger, added a parenthetical aside. "Who could argue with a straight face," he asked, "that the cultural significance of Alabama football has not assumed such a role?"

A ruling on the motion is expected in the next few months.

Other courts have also tried to balance the rights of the owners of intellectual property against that of free expression. The cases, which involve a variety of legal theories, generally turn on whether consumers are apt to be confused about who produced the works in question and on whether artists managed to add something meaningful to the bare facts.

At one end of the legal spectrum, a federal judge in Louisiana had no difficulty in July in enjoining a company that sold shirts bearing the school colors and initials of four football powerhouses.

At the other, the federal appeals court in Cincinnati in 2003 rejected an effort by the golfer Tiger Woods to stop an artist named Rick Rush from using Mr. Woods's image in a painting commemorating his victory at the 1997 Masters in Augusta, Ga.

That painting, a panorama that included likenesses of six past winners, "communicates and celebrates the value our culture attaches to such events," the majority in the divided three-judge panel decision found. "It would be ironic indeed if the presence of the image of the victorious athlete would deny the work First Amendment protection."

In the middle of the spectrum is a 2001 decision of the California Supreme Court. It expressed great solicitude for the rights of artists under the First Amendment. But it ruled against an artist who had created a simple charcoal drawing of the Three Stooges and sold it on T-shirts.

The court attached no significance to the fact that the artist, Gary Saderup, reproduced his art on clothing. "First Amendment doctrine," Justice Stanley Mosk wrote for a unanimous court, "does not disfavor nontraditional media of expression."

But Justice Mosk found that the image itself contained "no significant transformative or creative contribution" and derived its worth mostly from the Stooges' celebrity rather than Mr. Saderup's talent. Andy Warhol's celebrity portraits, by contrast, Justice Mosk wrote, "may well be entitled to First Amendment protection" as "ironic social commentary."

These decisions, Mr. Moore said, make courts into critics, a role that may not suit them.

Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., in a 1903 decision holding that circus posters may be copyrighted, appeared to agree.

"It would be a dangerous undertaking for persons trained only to the law," he wrote, "to constitute themselves final judges of the worth of pictorial illustrations."

DOJ_NMG_0093111

Mayberry Sheriff Calls The Law On Candidate (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, November 12, 2006

MILWAUKEE, Nov. 11 (AP) — Andy Griffith, the actor who portrayed the sheriff of the fictional town of Mayberry on television, has sued a Wisconsin man who unsuccessfully ran for sheriff of Grant County after legally changing his name to Andrew Jackson Griffith.

The lawsuit, filed Nov. 3 in Federal District Court in Madison, contends that the candidate, William H. Fenrick, 42, violated trademark and copyright laws, as well as the privacy of the actor when he used his new name to promote his candidacy for sheriff in southwestern Wisconsin.

Mr. Griffith, the actor, who is 80, starred in the 1960s program "The Andy Griffith Show," one of the most popular series in television history. He also played an unorthodox lawyer on "Matlock" in the 1980s and 1990s.

The lawsuit says the former Mr. Fenrick changed his name for the "sole purpose of taking advantage of Griffith's notoriety in an attempt to gain votes." It asks the court to order him to go back to his original name.

The lawsuit also asks the new Mr. Griffith to publish disclaimers and an apology in Grant County newspapers that say he has no association with the actor. It seeks unspecified damages and court fees.

"Now that the election is over, if Fenrick is willing in some fashion to clear the record, we probably could find a way to resolve it," said the actor's lawyer, Jim Cole.

The candidate argues that he did not benefit from the name change.

"During this campaign I never sold or profited even one nickel from the use of the name Andy Griffith or any item bearing the name Andy Griffith," he said. "Everything was a promotional item, and everything was given away for free."

The new Mr. Griffith, a music store co-owner from Platteville, said he spent $5,000 on his failed campaign and changed his name to garner publicity for the race.

The incumbent sheriff, Keith Govier, a Republican who has held the post for 10 years, won with 8,452 votes, followed by the Democrat, Doug Vesperman, with 6,985 votes. Mr. Griffith, an independent, had 1,248 votes.

Mr. Griffith, the candidate, described the lawsuit as "incredibly absurd" and said he did not think people actually believe he is the actor.

"For such an American icon, it's a pretty un-American thing to do to me," said Mr. Griffith, who has about three weeks to respond to the filing.

ENVIRONMENT:

Asarco Leaves Costly Environmental Mess In The City (CCCT)

By Dan Kelley

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, November 12, 2006

Residents were promised nature preserve, but the company is now bankrupt

Ruth Einkauf and her Dona Park neighbors were promised a 30-acre nature preserve behind her home in 1999 as part of an Environmental Protection Agency settlement with a nearby recycling plant.

Before the settlement, announced as part of an enforcement action by the state and federal governments, she and neighbors tended the area. Now, weeds and tall grass on the lot provide cover for varmints that invade Einkauf's home.

It is unclear if the project ever will be completed. Dona Park residents are neighbors to one of the largest bankruptcies in the country, a vast and tangled affair that encompasses century-old mining giant Asarco and its subsidiary Encycle Texas.

"I really thought they'd do what they promised," said Zilma Champion, who lives nearby.

Tom Aldrich, vice president for environmental affairs at Asarco, said the company established a conservation trust at the 30-acre parcel and performed some environmental studies as a prelude to building the park. It has not built the walkways nor planted the promised vegetation that was required. With the company in bankruptcy, the future of that conservation trust is murky.

"We do not intend to put those walkways in at this time," Aldrich said.

Neighbors of other Asarco plants across Texas have yet to see more than $1.75 million in supplemental environmental projects - plans approved by the government as part of settlement agreements.

"The dilemma with Asarco has been that there's been no cleanup in any areas listed in the settlement," said Neil Carman, Clean Air Program director of the Lone Star Chapter of the Sierra Club. "They are skirting their commitment."

Other Encycle supplemental environmental projects include:

$1.8 million to pave a road in El Paso;

$260,000 to restore a four-acre wetland near Coy Mines in Knoxville, Tenn.;

Asarco's bankruptcy threatens an estimated $1.3 billion in environmental cleanups across the country, according to U.S. Justice Department claims. Asarco's parent company Grupo Mexico established a $100 million trust for all of the those cleanups as a condition of being allowed to transfer ownership of copper mines in Peru.

The local project is about 40 percent complete.

The faltering pace of the construction of the nature preserve isn't the first time the neighborhood has tangled with its industrial neighbors.

About a decade ago, tests in Dona Park and another nearby neighborhood, Manchester Place, showed high levels of soil contamination.

State and federal agencies investigated. Neighbors filed suit alleging that a former copper company that operated nearby from 1942 until about 1982, when the plant shut, spewed heavy metals into the air. The matter was later settled out of court.

Asarco reopened the plant in 1984, and it sputtered along until 1985, when it was shuttered again. In 1989, Asarco again reopened the facility in a recycling project through a subsidiary called Encycle Texas. Encycle became ensnared in a government investigation into what regulators referred to as "sham recycling," resulting in a formal settlement with the state and federal governments. The company agreed to build a 30-acre nature preserve behind Einkauf's house in 1999 to settle the legal proceedings with the government.

There is also a question of whether taxpayers could end up paying for some of the cleanups through the Superfund program, according to the EPA. With Asarco in bankruptcy, other companies, including suppliers to the plant and successor corporations, face claims under broad liability provisions in EPA rules.

Encycle Texas sought protection under Chapter 11 of the bankruptcy code to reorganize in August 2005. It was later forced into Chapter 7 bankruptcy and is now undergoing liquidation.

The bankruptcy trustee overseeing that liquidation, Michael Boudloche, said the Encycle plant at 5500 Up River Road is for sale and has applied for The Texas Commission on Environmental Quality voluntary cleanup program. Total remediation costs are uncertain, with estimates from $2 million to $20 million. Consultants have been hired to calculate the total environmental costs.

That settlement also ignited controversy recently, when environmentalists in El Paso uncovered an EPA memo to the Justice Department detailing what regulators referred to as the "sham recycling" enterprise in which hazardous waste was trucked from Corpus Christi to El Paso for smelting. Though the settlement was announced, neighbors in Corpus Christi and El Paso were never informed of the claims.

The company claims there is nothing new to those allegations.

Contact Dan Kelley at 886-4316 or kelleyd@ caller.com

IMMIGRATION:

Boot Nazi Guard, Pol Says (NYDN)

By Derek Rose, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, November 12, 2006

A U.S. congressman rallied alongside hundreds of Jewish teenagers outside the home of a former Nazi camp guard - but some of the man's Jackson Heights neighbors say they should just leave the old man alone.

Jakiw Palij, 84, was stripped of his U.S. citizenship three years ago by a judge who ruled that Palij lied when he applied for an immigrant visa in 1949.

But he has not been deported because the government can't find a country to accept him - which the activists said was unacceptable.

"No one is going to hide in our midst," declared U.S. Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-Queens). "Thousands and thousands of people were murdered by this monster. He's not paying for his crimes by living here in a peaceful block in Jackson Heights."

Several hundred students from Rambam Mesivta High School in Lawrence, L.I., chanted, "We will not be silent!" and "Show your face!" outside Palij's home on 89th St. on Thursday.

It was the 68th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the organized riots in Nazi Germany that marked the beginning of state-sponsored terror against Jews.

"He's a Nazi criminal. He killed thousands of Jews. He doesn't deserve to be here," said David Zafarani, 17, a senior at the Jewish day school.

DOJ_NMG_0093113

But several of Palij's neighbors, who describe him as quiet and frail, disagreed with the protesters.

"It's wrong; why don't they just leave the people alone?" said Abraham Pabon, 48, a truck driver. "Everybody has a life to live. It's like they say, God forgives. It's very, very wrong what they're doing here."

Another neighbor, who would only give her first name, Ismelda, said, "Sometimes you have to forget.

"The guy that lives there is very, very old."

Earlier, students from the same school demonstrated outside the German consulate in midtown, demanding that the German government accept Palij's deportation and try him as a war criminal.

Palij did not answer the door Thursday, but has told the Daily News he was forced to serve at age 18 and would have been killed if he refused.

"I was nowhere near to any camp," he said in August. "I didn't hurt any Jews, anybody from Ukraine, Poland. Anybody."

Justice Department officials have acknowledged there's no evidence Palij engaged in atrocities - but say that the mere act of guarding prisoners sealed their fate. More than 6,000 Jews at Trawniki were shot to death on Nov. 3, 1943, in one of the single largest massacres of the Holocaust.

A retired draftsman, Palij received his immigrant visa in 1949 by falsely claiming he worked on his father's farm during the war.

Immigrant Protection Rules Draw Fire (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 9 — Dr. Stephen B. Turner built a profitable business here by providing low-cost "immigrant medical exams," including immunizations and blood tests, to hundreds of newcomers to America. Many of his clients did not speak English, but they paid in cash, spending a total of nearly $250,000 at Dr. Turner's practice from 2003 to 2005.

It was only later, after a tip from a suspicious client, that the San Francisco police and the district attorney's office learned the truth: Dr. Turner had been throwing out his clients' blood samples and injecting them with "inoculations" of saline.

Kamala D. Harris, the San Francisco district attorney, said the case, which led to a seven-year prison term for Dr. Turner, was one of many her office had been able to pursue under San Francisco's so-called sanctuary policy, which forbids police and city officials from asking people they encounter in the course of an investigation about their immigration status. It is a protection Ms. Harris says has made immigrants — legal and illegal — more willing to come to forward about crimes.

With immigration continuing to flare and frustrate as a national political issue, sanctuary cities like San Francisco may soon be the next battlefront. Critics argue that sanctuary policies discourage the police from enforcing laws, though about 50 cities and counties have enacted variations on sanctuary, according to the National Immigration Law Center. They include Detroit, Los Angeles, New York and Washington. A handful of states have similar policies, including Alaska, Maine and Oregon.

Conservative legal groups and politicians have begun to challenge such policies. Yet on the other side, cities like Chicago have announced they will avoid involving their police in issues that smack of federal immigration enforcement. And while a federal proposal to punish sanctuary cities recently failed to become law, some states have passed laws discouraging sanctuary policies.

"To say to a law enforcement official, if you encounter a foreign national who is in this country illegally and you believe that information would be of use and benefit to federal authorities, that you can't call them, that's just wrong," said Representative John Campbell, Republican of California, who authored a provision in the federal Homeland Security bill that would have denied federal antiterrorism money to cities with sanctuary policies. The provision passed the House, but was not part of the bill eventually signed by President Bush.

But even with Democrats in control of Congress, immigration hard-liners say the issue is here to stay.

"It's mind-blowing for us to see taxpayer dollars spent to subsidize criminal activity — that's the end result," said Christopher J. Farrell, director of research for Judicial Watch, a conservative legal group that is suing the Los Angeles Police Department over its sanctuary rule.

Some states have also taken up the issue. In Colorado, a law signed by the governor in May prevents localities from passing ordinances that stop officials or police from communicating or cooperating with federal officials on immigration.

Other states have taken up larger immigration issues involving local cooperation with the federal authorities. A Georgia law enacted in April authorizes the state to enter into an agreement with federal officials to train and certify state law enforcement officials to enforce immigration. The Georgia law also requires the police to make a "reasonable effort" to determine the legal status of those they arrest for felonies or drunken driving.

Both the Colorado and Georgia laws include some protections against and stiffer penalties for exploitation of illegal immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0093114

In September, a sanctuary debate erupted in Houston after an illegal immigrant was accused of killing a police officer. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, a Republican city councilwoman who ran for Congress as an unsuccessful write-in candidate in place of former Representative Tom DeLay, called on the mayor to declare the city off-limits to illegal immigrants.

"Terrorists, drug runners and cartel members could be among us, and police officers are not allowed to check their identities," Ms. Sekula-Gibbs wrote in an e-mail message to supporters. "Why? Because some politicians fear that asking people who have no ID about their legal status might intimidate all illegals into not reporting crimes. This policy of appeasement must be stopped."

Craig E. Ferrell Jr., general counsel for the Houston Police Department, said the city did not have a formal sanctuary policy. But he said a tangle of laws — police codes and legal decisions, including those involving racial profiling and the Fourth Amendment guarantee against unlawful search and seizure — required caution by police officers.

"We're not just trying to be obstructionist or not trying to help," Mr. Ferrell said. "What we're against is the federal government mandating that local enforcement be initiated without addressing these issues."

Sanctuary supporters have pushed back. In San Francisco, Supervisor Gerardo C. Sandoval — who authored a resolution affirming the city's policy, which dates to 1989 — said the federal government was simply trying to pass the buck for failing to secure federal borders.

"If they want to enforce the law," Mr. Sandoval said, "they should put troops on the ground to do that."

Lt. Paul Vernon, a spokesman for the Los Angeles Police Department, which has operated under sanctuary guidelines since 1979, said, "We didn't want people to fear cooperating with police." Lieutenant Vernon added, "And the local police department job is not to enforce the federal immigration law."

An organization of police chiefs, the Major Cities Chiefs Association, said that requiring the local police to enforce immigration policy did not "take into full account the realities of local law enforcement dealing with this issue on the ground." The association said its concerns included a lack of authority, training, and resources, as well as risks of liability.

Advocates for illegal immigrants, meanwhile, said they feared that getting rid of sanctuary rules would encourage immigrant communities not to report crime, including human and drug trafficking, prostitution, domestic violence, and even terrorism.

"Once the police are seen as agents of the immigration service, it discourages and deters immigrant communities from going to the police," said Lucas Guttentag, the director of the Immigrants' Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union. "There's a whole mixture of people in these communities — some recent, some illegal — and its going to cause the entire community to fear going to the police if they feel going to the local cop is essentially going to the immigration service."

But opponents say localities should be forced to participate in solving some of the problems that accompany illegal immigration.

"You can't have it both ways," said Ira Mehlman, a spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which lobbies for stronger immigration enforcement. "If you want to harbor people who are in the country illegally, you can't expect to have federal funds for issues that arise from having illegal people in your community."

Sanctuary policies are often less sweeping than opponents make them out to be. In San Francisco, for example, where resources cannot be used in immigration investigations, the police can inquire about immigration status in felony or drug cases.

Joan Friedland, an immigration lawyer for the National Immigration Law Center, said the concept of sanctuary cities was often misunderstood and that it gave the impression that such cities were lawless havens for illegal immigrants.

"It's not like people, if they are charged with a crime, they just escape immigration," Ms. Friedland said. "Even the cities that have ordinances limiting inquiries about immigration status cooperate and are in touch with the Department of Homeland Security when a serious crime is involved."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Poll: Bush Hits New Low (NSWK)

By Marcus Mabry

Newsweek, November 11, 2006

Nov. 11, 2006 - President George W. Bush's response was swift and decisive—if a little late. After voters gave Republicans "a thumpin'" at the polls, handing Democrats control of both houses of Congress, Bush banished his contentious defense secretary; invited the presumptive leaders of the new House and Senate to lunch (would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi had pasta; the president ate crow, a Bush aide joked); and suffered through two pained photo-ops with Pelosi and Harry Reid, the Nevada Senator expected to become Majority Leader. And what did the president get for listening to the voice of the American people? The worst approval rating of his presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0093115

President Bush's job approval rating has fallen to just 31 percent, according to the new NEWSWEEK Poll. Bill Clinton's lowest rating during his presidency was 36 percent; Bush's father's was 29 percent, and Ronald Reagan's was 35 percent. Jimmy Carter's and Richard Nixon's lows were 28 and 23 percent, respectively. (Just 24 approve of outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's job performance; and 31 percent approve of Vice President Dick Cheney's.)

Worst of all, most Americans are writing off the rest of Bush's presidency; two-thirds (66 percent) believe he will be unable to get much done, up from 56 percent in a mid-October poll; only 32 percent believe he can be effective. That's unfortunate since 63 percent of Americans say they're dissatisfied with the way things are going in the country; just 29 percent are satisfied, reports the poll of 1,006 adults conducted Thursday and Friday nights.

But the new poll carries sobering news for Democrats, too, still on their post-victory high. Just about everyone believes the Republicans lost the 2006 midterms more than the Democrats won it. Presented with a list of factors that may have contributed to the Democrats' success, 85 percent of Americans said the "major reason" was disapproval of the administration's handling of the war in Iraq, 71 percent said disapproval of Bush's overall job performance, 67 percent cited dissatisfaction with how Republicans have handled government spending and the deficit, 63 percent said disapproval of the overall performance of Republicans in Congress, 61 percent said Democrats' ideas and proposals for changing course in Iraq. Tellingly, just 27 percent said a major reason the Democrats won was because they had better candidates.

That means the new Congressional majority may be kept on a short leash. A majority of Americans, 51 percent, believe it's a good thing that the Democrats regained control of Congress, including 18 percent of Republicans, while only 17 percent think it is a bad thing. (When the Republicans won the 2002 midterms, 30 percent thought it was a good thing that the GOP kept control, while 34 percent thought it was a bad thing.)

But the public is worried the Democrats will move too fast on Iraq and too slow on national security. For instance, 51 percent of Americans are very concerned that Congress will push too hastily for the withdrawal of U.S. troops in Iraq. (Only 20 percent say they are not too concerned or not at all concerned.) And 43 percent are very concerned that the new Congress may keep the administration from doing what is necessary to combat terrorism. Only 29 percent are not too concerned or not at all concerned.

The good news for Democrats is that voters believe they know their mandate is limited. Half of all Americans, 50 percent, say Democrats will take a moderate approach, compared to 34 percent who believe they will try to take the country in a more liberal direction. Not surprisingly, Republicans are most skeptical: 52 percent believe the Democrats will try to push America to the left while 37 percent believe they will be more moderate.

And there's massive support for much of the Democratic Congress's presumed agenda. For instance, 75 percent of Americans say allowing the government to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies to lower drug prices for seniors should be a "top priority," including 67 percent of Republicans. Increasing the minimum wage comes next (68 percent) on the public's list, followed by investigating government contracts in Iraq (60 percent).

There's less support for rolling back Bush's tax cuts: 40 percent say that should be a top priority and 24 percent say it shouldn't be done at all. And since the election, Americans have become slightly less interested in investigating impropriety and wrongdoing by members of Congress. The number of Americans who think this should be a top priority has dropped from 62 to 55 percent.

Overall, however, the public wants Congress and the president to put Iraq and national security before domestic issues like the economy and health care, by a margin of 51 to 33 percent. Fifteen percent say they should be equal priorities. But the public is not overly optimistic: 54 percent of Americans say partisan bickering will likely prevent important work from getting done, while 40 percent say the two sides will be able to work together.

With just two years before the next presidential election, the Republicans have some rebuilding to do. Today 48 percent of registered voters would generally like to see a Democrat elected in '08 (including 10 percent of Republicans and 37 percent of independents); compared to 28 percent who want a Republican (including just 3 percent of Democrats and 20 percent of independents). Twenty percent say they don't know.

When it comes to specific potential candidates, the ladies have it. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton registers the highest level of strong support, with 33 percent of registered voters saying there's a good chance they would vote for her and 20 percent saying there's some chance. But she also has high negatives: 45 percent of registered voters say there's no chance they would vote for her. Similarly, 24 percent of registered voters say there's a good chance they would vote for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and 27 percent says there's some chance; but 43 percent say there's no chance.

Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Arizona Sen. John McCain have lower negatives: 24 percent of registered voters say there's a good chance they would vote for Giuliani, 30 percent say there's some chance, and 32 percent say there's no chance. Twenty percent say there's a good chance they would vote for McCain, 34 percent say there's some chance, and 32 percent say there's no chance.

DOJ_NMG_0093116

Twenty percent of voters also say there's a good chance they would vote for Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, while 19 percent say there's some chance and 24 percent say there's no chance. More than a third of voters, 34 percent, say they've never heard of him.

Also-rans include former Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry (16 percent good chance, 24 percent some chance, and 55 percent no chance) and Newt Gingrich (10 percent good chance, 17 percent some chance, and 58 percent no chance).

And therein lies some good news for President Bush as he faces the final two years of his Presidency. At least he's not John Kerry.

The NEWSWEEK poll, conducted Nov. 9-10, has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points. In conducting the poll, Princeton Survey Research Associates International interviewed 1,006 adults aged 18 and older.

At Home And Abroad, Things Are Not Going Bush's Way (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — For a relentlessly optimistic President George W. Bush, this is a season of disappointment, surprise and setbacks.

At home and around the world, things are not going his way. With Bush's legacy-building time running out, Americans sent a clear message in Tuesday's election that they were angry at him and wanted change. Though Bush's name was not on the ballot, voters took revenge on the Republican Congress and put the Democrats in charge of both the Senate and House of Representatives.

In an awkward bit of timing, Bush will be globe-trotting when Congress returns to town next week to open its lame-duck session, taking up business the White House deems vital.

Departing Tuesday, Bush will be away for eight days at a summit of Asia-Pacific rim leaders in Vietnam and stops in Singapore and Indonesia. Back just before Thanksgiving, he will jet off again a few days later for a NATO summit in Latvia and a stop in Estonia.

World leaders will be watching to see if Bush, politically weakened at home, acts differently on the world stage.

Across the globe, the U.S. president is on the defensive about problems ranging from the mess in the Middle East to the nuclear standoffs with Iran and North Korea. Even in his own backyard, there is a growing camp of leftists in Latin America, from Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez to Nicaragua's newly elected Daniel Ortega.

And then there is Iraq.

Four years into an unpopular war that has defined his presidency, Bush thought that by this point he would be bringing some U.S. troops home. Instead, he had to sack his gruff secretary of defense, open himself to a new Iraq strategy and worry about pressure to pull out before he thinks the war is won.

Leaving the polls, a majority of voters said they disapproved of the war and the U.S. should withdraw some or all of its troops from Iraq. Bush meets Monday with members of a blue-ribbon commission looking for a new way forward in Iraq.

Victorious at the polls, Democrats put the White House on notice to expect tougher scrutiny of the war. "Let's find out what's going on with the war in Iraq, the different large federal agencies that we have," said Sen. Harry Reid, the incoming Senate majority leader. "There simply has been no oversight in recent years."

The election was a sobering splash of cold water on the president and political strategist Karl Rove, both of whom had insisted Republicans would win.

On election night, Bush had a dinner of beef loin and squash with Rove, Republican National Committee chief Ken Mehlman, chief of staff Josh Bolten, and friends Brad Freeman, a California venture capitalist, and Don Evans, former commerce secretary. Other officials joined later. The mood was businesslike as people read their Blackberrys and took cellphone calls, one participant said.

Bush is not a man given to second-guessing, self-analyzing or doubts. By the next morning, associates said, he was bouncing back.

"He's not one to get mired in kind of the shoulda, woulda, couldas," said Bush counselor Dan Bartlett. "I saw him coming to grips with it that night and by the time he came walking into the Oval Office Wednesday morning he was looking forward. We had to hold him back from calling Nancy Pelosi (the incoming House speaker) because it was still 6:55 in the morning."

"Why all the glum faces?" Bush said, opening a postelection news conference where he said he shared blamed for the Republican losses.

Later that day, Bolten pulled together several hundred White House staffers in the Old Executive Office Building for an unannounced visit by the president. Bush revved up the troops, told them they were there not to mark time but to get things done, Bartlett said.

DOJ_NMG_0093117

"Obviously he's disappointed," Bartlett said, "but his mind's already racing forward, saying, 'All right, we've got to come at the same problems but from a different angle."

The big question is whether Bush, after six years of largely ignoring Democrats, really will be willing to work with the political opposition. Or whether his last two years will be clouded by partisan gridlock. Bush invited the new Democratic leaders to the White House and both sides pledged to cooperate.

"I think he's doing the right things now, right tone," said Republican strategist Ron Kaufman, who worked in the White House under Bush's father. "We'll see how long it lasts on both sides."

Kaufman and others recall how Bush, as governor of Texas, took a bipartisan approach to work with a legislature controlled by Democrats. Of course, many of them were conservatives and saw eye to eye with Bush.

"I think he liked the way he governed in Texas," Kaufman said. "I think he really enjoyed it. And somehow he's gotten away from that. ... I think he'd be relieved to go back to that."

Leon Panetta, a former Democratic congressman who was chief of staff in the Clinton White House, said Bush would have to change the way he does business if he wants to succeed.

"He's going to have to understand he can't do this by the old playbook," Panetta said. "The Rove playbook is not going to work. If he's going to govern, it means he probably has got to go back and remember what it was like to govern in Texas with a Democratic legislature and the deals that he had to make."

There are doubts Bush will bend on issues dear to conservatives. "The fact is, to work with the Democrats requires him ... to basically say to a quarter or a third or more of his party, 'Sorry, you're out,'" said Norm Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Bush Uses Veterans Day Speech To Thank U.S. Troops For Dedication And Bravery (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. (AP) — President Bush marked Veterans Day by praising U.S. troops for fighting tyranny and oppression, yet touched only briefly on the war in Iraq, where U.S. commanders are rethinking strategy.

Three days after announcing the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Bush hailed members of the armed services, past and present, for their dedication and bravery. His seven-minute speech at Arlington National Cemetery contrasted sharply with the strong rhetoric he used to defend the war on Veterans Day a year ago.

On Saturday, Bush did not cite Iraq and Afghanistan by name, though he did say, "From Valley Forge to Vietnam, from Kuwait to Kandahar, from Berlin to Baghdad, our veterans have borne the costs of America's wars — and they have stood watch over America's peace. The American people are grateful to the veterans and all who have fought for our freedom."

Kandahar is Afghanistan's second-largest city. Baghdad is the Iraqi capital.

Cannons fired a 21-gun salute and soldiers, clasping rifles with bayonets, stood at attention as Bush's motorcade wound through rows of white tombstones. The president laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns, holding his hand over his heart as a bugler played taps.

Paying tribute to American troops, the commander in chief said, "They've brought down tyrants, they've liberated two nations, they have helped bring freedom to more than 50 million people" — a reference to Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Through their sacrifice, they're making this nation safer and more secure — and they are earning the proud title of veteran," Bush said.

On Veterans Day last year, Bush rebuked congressional critics of his Iraq war policy. Speaking at an Army depot in Tobyhanna, Pa., he accused opposition lawmakers of being "deeply irresponsible" and sending the wrong signal both to America's enemy and to U.S. troops.

Last year's speech was part of a coordinated White House effort to bolster the president's waning credibility and dwindling support for the war. At the time, the U.S. death count had exceeded 2,000. Today it tops 2,840.

In Baghdad on Saturday, police reported gunmen ambushed minibuses, killing at least 10 passengers and kidnapping about 50, and a pair of car bombs tore through a downtown shopping district killing eight people

Democrats, who took control of the House and Senate in Tuesday's voting, read the elections as a demand for change in Iraq.

"Americans across the country made it clear that they want a new direction in Iraq and in the war on terror, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said in his party's weekly radio address.

Democrats have not coalesced around one alternative strategy for Iraq.

"We will listen to the military, take their advice, and ensure that our troops and agencies have the tools and equipment they need to defend our freedom," Dean said.

DOJ_NMG_0093118

In the presidential radio address, broadcast before his visit to the cemetery, Bush said America's enemies should not read the election results as a sign of U.S. weakness. During the campaign, he contended Democrats would undermine national security.

"The elections will bring changes to Washington," Bush said. "But one thing has not changed: America faces brutal enemies who have attacked us before and want to attack us again.

"I have a message for these enemies: Do not confuse the workings of American democracy with a lack of American will," the president said. "Our nation is committed to bringing you to justice, and we will prevail."

Bush and his national security team planned to meet Monday with members of the Iraq Study Group. The bipartisan panel, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, was expected to report its recommendations by the end of the year.

Meanwhile at the Pentagon where former CIA Director Robert Gates has been nominated to replace Rumsfeld, changes in Iraq are being evaluated by the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq; and Gen. John Abizaid, the head of the command that oversees U.S. forces in the Mideast.

"At this moment, more than 1.4 million Americans are on active duty, serving in the cause of freedom and peace around the world," Bush said, standing under a marble archway inscribed with a passage from President Lincoln's Gettysburg Address: "We here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain."

Bush Hails Bravery, Dedication Of Troops (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Steve Kowaleski has made a Veterans Day pilgrimage to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial for each of the past 14 years, and the experience never gets any easier.

More than 35 years after he served, he said yesterday, standing a few yards from the Wall, he still grapples with the reality that his friends never made it home.

They were comrades he knew from growing up in Bristol, Conn., and men he met in Vietnam. Altogether, Kowaleski said, he knew more than 20 people whose names are inscribed on the memorial.

"It's a place of saying goodbye -- still saying goodbye," he said softly, hands clasped at his waist, sunglasses concealing his eyes. "That's why I come back every year."

On a day when the country saluted the military with somber ceremonies and small-town parades, thousands of veterans and their families gathered at the Vietnam memorial to pay homage to the 58,249 missing and dead whose names are etched on the Wall.

At Arlington National Cemetery, President Bush laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns and praised members of the armed services, past and present.

"From Valley Forge to Vietnam, from Kuwait to Kandahar, from Berlin to Baghdad, our veterans have borne the costs of America's wars, and they have stood watch over America's peace," the president said. "The American people are grateful to the veterans and all who have fought for our freedom."

Referring to Iraq and Afghanistan, Bush hailed U.S. troops, saying, "They've brought down tyrants. They've liberated two nations. They have helped bring freedom to more than 50 million people."

At the ceremony at the Vietnam memorial, a bagpiper performed a rendition of "Amazing Grace," and a bugler played taps.

Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne laid a wreath for his brother, Patrick, who died in Vietnam on Aug. 8, 1966. It was the same day the secretary graduated from West Point and reported to the Air Force.

"This wall tells the story of those who fought in Vietnam, and it links us to future generations of American soldiers," Wynne said. "As Air Force secretary, I think daily of our forebears and the legacy of sacrifice and valor."

Elizabeth Lopez, who served in Iraq, told the crowd of the kinship she felt with Vietnam veterans when her tour of duty ended and she returned to her native El Paso.

Until then, she said, she never understood the true meaning of the words "welcome home."

"Every time I hear it, that knot in my throat is still there," she said. When Lopez's remarks ended, the audience rose from their seats and applauded.

Standing with a few friends in the back of the crowd, Ray Heikkila, 58, an Army veteran, said he looks forward to Veterans Day because he sees people who understood what remains a defining part of his life.

"It's like a healing," he said. "You get to sit down with other vets and get things off your chest."

His pal, Jim LaManna, 59, wore a camouflage jacket with an American flag stitched to the back. He said he knows veterans who refuse to make the trip because "they don't want to hear about the war."

DOJ_NMG_0093119

But LaManna said he has never felt that way, if only because of an innate sense of duty to recognize the fallen. "I was there. I know the guys who died there," he said. "It's a brotherhood, a camaraderie thing."

He tapped his fist on his chest.

"It's here," he said, "in the heart and soul."

For Vets And President, A Day Of Remembrance (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, November 12, 2006

President Bush yesterday attended Veterans Day ceremonies at Arlington National Cemetery to praise U.S. troops who have fought oppression around the world.

"This day is dedicated to all who answered the call to service," Mr. Bush said, "whether they live in honor among us or sleep in valor beneath this sacred ground."

The ceremony was one of many that took place yesterday at war memorials around the country and the region, including sites of honor for World War II and Vietnam veterans.

At Arlington yesterday, Mr. Bush laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns and paid homage to the more than 1.4 million Americans on active duty, calling them "our nation's finest citizens."

"They confront grave danger to defend the safety of the American people," Mr. Bush said. "They've brought down tyrants. They've liberated two nations. They have helped bring freedom to more than 50 million people."

At the U.S. Navy Memorial, the Naval District of Washington laid a wreath at the Lone Sailor Statue. The French War Veterans of Washington, D.C., also laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns in Arlington.

During a ceremony at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, thousands paid respects to the men and women who were killed while serving in the armed forces during the war in Vietnam.

"The memorial ... holds a special place in our nation's heart," said U.S. Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne, who graduated from the U.S. Military Academy and served in the Air Force for seven years.

Mr. Wynne's brother, Maj. Patrick E. Wynne, was killed in Vietnam in 1966. He was declared missing in action until his remains were discovered in 1974.

"Today is very much a day of remembrance and reflection," Mr. Wynne said.

A long line of people waited to lay flowers and wreaths at the base of the black granite wall, which is engraved with 58,249 names honoring the Americans who died in the war.

The scene at the wall alternated between solemn and celebratory, as families remembered loved ones and soldier buddies reunited.

John Reichenberg, an Army veteran from Annapolis, his fiance and a group of fellow military veterans visited the memorial -- a trip that Mr. Reichenberg for years had found too difficult to make.

"Up until '89, I couldn't even think about coming here," said Mr. Reichenberg, 61, who served two years in Vietnam beginning in 1968, almost immediately after graduating from college, "but they say it's a 'wall of healing.' It's really hard, but once you do it, it feels like a weight's been lifted."

Since he began attending the annual ceremonies at the memorial, Mr. Reichenberg has searched unsuccessfully for soldiers with whom he served.

"I've probably brought at least a half-dozen vets down here," he said, "and every time, whoever I bring, they meet someone that was in [Vietnam] with them, and I haven't done it yet."

Yesterday was also the anniversary of the Vietnam Women's Memorial, dedicated in 1993.

"Three months ago, I walked through this national park for the first time, and while facing different monuments, I was overwhelmed at every stop," said Elizabeth Lopez, a construction mechanic 2nd Class in the naval reserves.

Miss Lopez, of El Paso, Texas, also served in the Army seven years ago as a Patriot missile crew member in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia.

After completing her enlistment, she became a reservist in a Seabee Naval Reserve unit. She was recalled to active duty last year to serve in Iraq as a gunner.

She returned home earlier this year to El Paso, where she is a readjustment counseling specialist at a veterans center.

"I am very humbled to be here, in this sacred place of healing that pays tribute to many generations of veterans," she said. "While I may not share the same battles that many of these great men and women have encountered, I do share a common connection with them."

Vote Won't Lessen Resolve, Bush Tells Terrorists (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0093120

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush warned U.S. adversaries around the world Saturday that Republican losses in the midterm congressional election didn't signal a weakening of American resolve to win the war on terrorism.

"America faces brutal enemies who have attacked us before and want to attack us again," the president said in his weekly radio address. "I have a message for these enemies: Do not confuse the workings of American democracy with a lack of American will. Our nation is committed to bringing you to justice, and we will prevail."

Democratic Party Chairman Howard Dean said in a response to Bush that voters made it clear they wanted "a new direction" in Iraq and his party intended to use its control of Congress to try to deliver that.

Bush also went to Arlington National Cemetery on Saturday to join in solemn observances of Veterans Day. On a sunny, spring-like morning, the president laid a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknowns and delivered brief remarks honoring the bravery of American troops.

"They are our nation's finest citizens," he said. "They confront grave danger to defend the safety of the American people."

Since the March 2003 start of the Iraq war, 2,845 U.S. service members have died, according to the Associated Press. And 288 have been killed in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Uzbekistan since the U.S. invaded Afghanistan in 2001 to oust the Taliban and attempt to capture Osama bin Laden.

In his radio address, Bush also praised outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who had become a lightning rod for critics of the war. After the Republicans lost control of Congress in an election that turned into a referendum on the war, the president announced that Rumsfeld would resign. Rumsfeld will serve until his replacement, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates, is confirmed.

Bush also said that Iraq, where about 145,000 U.S. forces remain in a struggle to squelch violence between Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militias, is "the central front in this war on terror."

Giving the weekly Democratic response to the president, Dean appeared to draw a distinction between Iraq and the war on terrorism.

"On Tuesday, Americans across the country made it clear that they want a new direction in Iraq and in the war on terror," he said. "Voters also made it clear that they want defense policies that are tough and smart. Our agenda includes a new direction for defending America at home and around the world."

Democrats in Congress, said the former Vermont governor and 2004 presidential contender, "will listen to the military, take their advice, and ensure that our troops and agencies have the tools and equipment they need to defend our freedom."

Since Tuesday's election, the president has met with the Democrats who will lead the next Congress and signaled he intended to work with them to find a solution on Iraq. In the midst of the campaign, he spoke harshly of the desire of many Democrats to get out of Iraq, saying it would mean "the terrorists win and America loses."

On Monday, Bush is scheduled to meet with members of the Iraq Study Group, a committee of policy elders that is seeking to develop bipartisan proposals for a shift in the conduct of the Iraq war.

The group is led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who served under the president's father, and by former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), a longtime foreign policy expert.

Chief among the recommendations the group is said to be considering: that the U.S. declare its commitment in Iraq not to be open-ended. That would be coupled with increased pressure on the Iraqi government to seek political solutions to the sectarian strife that threatens to tear the country apart.

Members of the group are also said to favor involving other nations in the search for political solutions in Iraq. That could mean reaching out to Iran and Syria, which the Bush administration has branded as supporters of terrorism.

At Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia, Bush singled out the 1.4 million active-duty members of the military for praise.

"They've brought down tyrants, they've liberated two nations, they have helped to bring freedom to more than 50 million people," he said.

"Through their sacrifice, they're making this nation safer and more secure — and they are earning the proud title of veteran."

Spinning Out Of An Electoral Beating (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

AT HIS NEWS conference after Tuesday's elections, President Bush struck a note of reassurance. "I have a message for those on the front lines," he said. "To our enemies, do not be joyful. Do not confuse the workings of our democracy with a lack of will…. To our brave men and women in uniform: Don't be doubtful. America will always support you."

DOJ_NMG_0093121

Why would terrorists or U.S. soldiers think electing Democrats would suggest a lack of will or support for the troops? Oh, right. Because Bush had been saying so. "However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win, and America loses," he told a GOP crowd in October. "That's what's at stake in this election."

I guess if I were a terrorist, I would have been joyful to learn that the people who were going to help me win had prevailed in the elections.

It's a political tradition for candidates on both sides to immediately change their tune after an election. Last week, Democrats were ripping Bush to shreds, and now they're promising to work with him. Still, even by these standards, the Republican turnabout has been unusually abrupt. Suddenly they're all but admitting that everything they had said before the election was a lie.

Even beginning as early as election night, the conservative spin asserted that Democrats had won by running as ideological ciphers.

"Democrats, in my mind, don't have a mandate because they stood for nothing," said conservative radio host Laura Ingraham. And from a Wall Street Journal editorial: "While a thumping defeat for the GOP, the vote was about competence, not ideological change."

Of course, the Journal, and every other Republican organ, has been insisting for months that Democrats are a bunch of left-wing tax lovers. They have endlessly repeated a quote by incoming Democratic House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charlie Rangel of New York — who, when asked which Bush tax cuts he'd extend, replied that he couldn't think of one. Bush repeated this quote as recently as two days before the election. Presumably, some people actually believed the president when he said this.

Now they tell us that a vote for the Democrats was really a vote to continue Republican policies. It's kind of cruel to have the rug pulled out from under us. Hey, I was supporting the Democrats precisely because I thought they'd jack up taxes!

To be fair, the conservatives are right that there were plenty of nonideological reasons for the Democratic victory. People were frustrated about Iraq, the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Republican corruption and scandals and (though conservatives won't admit this last one) an economy that isn't raising most people's living standards.

So it's perfectly true that the election should not be interpreted as a line-item endorsement of the Democratic agenda.

Yet that's almost always the case.

Four years ago, George W. Bush won reelection in large part because he happened to be in office Sept. 11, 2001 (and also because nobody could stand John Kerry). That didn't stop conservatives from insisting that voters had signed up for his domestic and foreign agenda in its entirety. The Journal's 2004 postelection editorial called Bush's victory "a decisive mandate for a second term" and proceeded to explain why voters had endorsed measures such as privatization of Social Security.

Possibly the funniest about-face in last week's elections came from Rush Limbaugh, who gleefully declared that, with the elections over, "I no longer am gonna have to carry the water for people who I think don't deserve having their water carried."

Other conservative talk-show hosts offered up similar sentiments. It's nice for Limbaugh to concede that up until this point he had simply been a GOP mouthpiece. But maybe he should have let his listeners in on the secret before.

Incoming Democrats Put Populism Before Ideology (NYT)

By Robin Toner, Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 — The newly elected Democratic class of 2006, which is set to descend on the Capitol next week, will hardly be the first freshmen to arrive in Washington promising to make a difference.

The last time Congress changed hands, the Republican freshman class of 1994 roared into town under the leadership of Newt Gingrich as speaker and quickly advanced a conservative agenda of exceptional ambition.

Many in the class of 2006, especially those who delivered the new Democratic majorities by winning Republican seats, show little appetite for that kind of ideological crusade. But in interviews with nearly half of them this week, the freshmen — 41 in the House and 9 in the Senate, including one independent — conveyed a keen sense of their own moment in history, and a distinct world view: they say they were given a rare opportunity by voters, many of them independents and Republicans, who were tired of the partisanship and gridlock in Washington.

Now, they say, they have to produce — to deal with long-festering problems like access to affordable health care and the loss of manufacturing jobs, and to find a bipartisan consensus for an exit strategy in Iraq, a source of continuing division not only between but also within the parties.

Many of them say they must also, somehow, find a way to address the growing anxiety among voters about a global economy that no longer seems to work for them. There is a strong populist tinge to this class.

DOJ_NMG_0093122

In general, they set themselves an extraordinary (political veterans might say impossible) task: to avoid the ideological wars that have so dominated Congress in recent years, to be pragmatists, and to change the tone in Washington after a sharply partisan campaign.

"I see myself, hopefully, as a bridge builder, a consensus person," said Harry Mitchell, 66, a longtime state senator and former mayor of Tempe, Ariz., who defeated Representative J. D. Hayworth, an emblematic member of the class of 1994. "I can't be a rabid partisan Democrat and represent this district."

Nancy Boyda, who defeated Representative Jim Ryun, the legendary track star, in a district in Kansas that President Bush carried by 20 percentage points in 2004, summarized her mandate this way: "Stop the gridlock, stop the nastiness, get something done. People are tired of excuses."

Claire McCaskill, who defeated Senator Jim Talent of Missouri in a fiercely competitive race, said: "I'm not from a blue echo chamber. I'm from a state that's really like America — it's divided."

"The problem with Washington," Ms. McCaskill added, "is you have so many senators who are from bright blue and bright red states; they're not interested in common ground. They're interested in making each other look bad."

These attitudes could lead to tensions with the party's liberal base in Congress — many of the party's expected committee chairmen are traditional liberals — and thus occasional headaches over the next two years for the Democratic leaders, Representative Nancy Pelosi and Senator Harry Reid.

But Democratic strategists say both leaders recognize that the new Democratic majority was elected, in large part, from Republican-leaning districts and states. If those new members vote in a purely partisan way, they — and the majority — will quickly be put at risk.

Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who recruited many of these candidates as head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, described the group as "moderate in temperament and reformers in spirit." Conservatives tend to highlight the conservatism in the new class as a sign that Democrats are essentially ceding ground to the right on issues like gun control and abortion.

But many of these freshmen Democrats are hard to pigeonhole ideologically. Even among the most socially conservative, there is a strong streak of economic populism that is a unifying force.

Heath Shuler, for example, the former professional football player and newly elected House Democrat from North Carolina, is anti-abortion and pro-gun, but sounds like an old-style Democrat on economic issues.

"I was taught at a very, very young age about faith and personal responsibility, and through that, that responsibility was about helping those who cannot help themselves," Mr. Shuler said. "If you look at what the Democratic Party stands for, it is about helping others who can't help themselves."

Like other Democrats, he supports legislation to increase the minimum wage and make college tuition tax deductible. He also opposes trade agreements that he says have led to a 78 percent loss in textile industry jobs in his state.

Similarly, Ms. Boyda of Kansas, a first-time office holder who relied on lengthy newspaper inserts to make her case to the voters, said, "The rural economy has been left out." She added: "A lot of my district feels a great deal of insecurity about their jobs, their health care, their business, their family farm. They feel like they're just kind of hanging out there."

Carol Shea-Porter, a social worker and new House member from New Hampshire who considers herself a populist, said, "The theme of my campaign was, I'm running for the rest of us." She added that no matter how much the Bush administration boasted of job growth, her voters "understood those were Wal-Mart jobs." And, she said, "They understood when they talked about the stock market boom, that half of Americans aren't even in the stock market."

Jim Webb, who defeated Senator George Allen of Virginia, campaigned heavily on the idea that the middle class was increasingly at risk in an age of growing inequality. Bob Casey, who overwhelmingly defeated Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, said he looked forward to "a really intensive focus on health care that I hope to be a part of."

That economic populism extends, for many candidates, to a new emphasis on expanding health coverage. Congressional Democrats who lived through the Clinton administration's failed effort to create a national health insurance plan, which many believe was a crucial factor in the Democrats' losses in 1994, have been wary of broad health legislation for years. (And being in the minority, they were unable to do much about it, regardless.) But the class of '06 is adamant that something major can, and will, be done.

Dave Loebsack, a political science professor in Iowa who unseated the veteran Republican moderate, Representative Jim Leach, said he intended to sign on to proposed legislation to create a single-payer, national health insurance program "as one of the first things I will do when I get to Congress."

"I have no idea where it's going to go next year," Mr. Loebsack said, "but at least we can give it a fair hearing."

DOJ_NMG_0093123

Steven Kagen, an allergist who won a Wisconsin district that has been represented by a Republican for much of the past 30 years, campaigned on a "No Patient Left Behind" plan. Mr. Kagen won despite doubters who called it "the Hillary hot potato," a reference to the first lady turned New York senator who was the architect of the Clinton plan.

"This issue has blurred the lines between the two parties," Mr. Kagen said. "You don't have to be a Republican or a Democrat to be ill, and to understand that the health care system doesn't work."

Mr. Kagen is one of several new House members urging a renewed commitment to the more than eight million uninsured children in the United States, an issue that will move to the forefront when the State Children's Health Insurance Program comes up for renewal next year.

Most of these new Democrats said they were also committed to changes in the new Medicare prescription drug program; in fact, giving the government the power to negotiate prices with drug companies is one of the first items of business in the Democrats' "Six for '06 Agenda." The agenda also includes an increase in the minimum wage and expansion of embryonic stem cell research.

Ron Klein, a state senator who defeated the veteran Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida, said he had often heard both from retirees who fell into the gaps of the new Medicare drug plan and from "taxpayers who were really put off that this was something that could have been done a lot better."

Democrats, of course, had their chance to resolve the prescription drug problem in the past — their party held the Senate for a brief period in 2001-02 — and few issues have been more divisive on Capitol Hill.

But the new Democrats say they have high hopes of building bipartisan coalitions for these changes in Medicare, for expanding embryonic stem cell research, and for other parts of their agenda. "I'm still scratching my head" over Mr. Bush's veto of last year's stem cell bill, said Ed Perlmutter, a former state senator who won a House district in the Denver suburbs.

Representative Sherrod Brown, who is moving to the Senate from the House after beating Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, argued: "Tell me a whole lot of Republicans won't work with us on finding a way for middle-class kids to get a college education, to vote for embryonic stem cell research, to raise the minimum wage. John McCain is already out there talking about prescription drug issues."

The flip side to this, Democratic strategists say, is that Republicans could peel off a critical mass of conservative Democrats on certain issues. Some veterans on Capitol Hill remember the Democratic Congress of the early Reagan years, when conservative Democrats regularly broke ranks on tax cuts.

The true challenge to any new climate of bipartisanship will most likely come over Iraq. Many of the freshmen said they looked to the bipartisan Iraq Study Group — led by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton — as an invaluable vehicle for consensus building.

"I pray, and I mean that literally, that their recommendation can be seen as a way forward," Ms. Boyda said.

They also said they were pleased that Mr. Bush announced, the day after the election, that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would be replaced. Gabrielle Giffords, newly elected to a House seat in Arizona, said she had rarely given a speech without calling for Mr. Rumsfeld's removal.

But there are still divisions in the Democratic caucus over an exit strategy for Iraq, although many of the freshmen come to Washington with a keen sense of the voters' desire for change. Joe Sestak, a former Navy vice admiral who won a House seat in Pennsylvania, said: "I honestly believe this nation in its vote has said: 'What are we doing in Iraq? We can't stay there.' I think they are rightfully leading the leaders to say, 'Set a date; move toward it.' "

Others stop short of suggesting a fixed timetable. As they headed to Washington for their orientation, many of the incoming freshmen still spoke like outsiders. Tim Walz, a Minnesota teacher, retired National Guardsman and newly elected House Democrat, described himself as "a farm state Democrat-soldier who's concerned about the environment and civil liberties."

He has seen how ugly the partisanship can get in American politics, Mr. Walz said, and is adamant about changing it. "I'm convinced that what we need to do is heal," he said. "Tuesday was not a Democratic referendum; it was an American referendum. It's not that the American people are so enamored with the Democratic vision, but what they believed is what we said about cleaning up corruption, having some real open debate. It just seems so broken."

Democrats Find Lessons In GOP Reign (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Democrats preparing to take control of Congress for the first time in over a decade are looking to the Republican takeover in 1995 as an object lesson of what to emulate and what to avoid. They hope to match the legislative energy of the Newt Gingrich era while avoiding at all costs the partisan pitfalls that eventually soured voters on the GOP.

DOJ_NMG_0093124

The majority party that takes control of the House and Senate in January will look significantly different from the party that was swept from power in the 1994 elections. The old-guard liberals and staunch union supporters in control then are giving way to a new generation of moderates with more temperate legislative ambitions.

Democrats last week picked up six seats in the Senate and at least 28 seats in the House en route to victory. Eleven of those House districts were solidly Republican in the 2004 presidential election, while new Democratic senators from Montana, Missouri, Virginia and Ohio will have to be mindful of their traditionally Republican constituents.

Led by a feisty Nevada senator and the first woman in history to claim the House speaker's post, the long-banished Democrats hope to prove their bona fides as lawmakers and challenge a president from the other party to accept their agenda, a game plan taken straight from the Gingrich era's "Contract With America." They also intend to challenge President Bush to change course in Iraq and consider their demands for a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops.

But Democrats say they will avoid the overreaching, arrogance and rancorous partisanship that left them virtually powerless on Capitol Hill and spawned an era of political corruption and influence-peddling. Democratic leaders vowed last week to pass major ethics reforms early in the new 110th Congress, and to offer Republicans seats at the negotiating table and ample opportunities to amend bills on the floor -- opportunities that were denied their party.

"What they did was very effective in pulling up all the ladders for any other party to gain the majority," incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said last week of the Gingrich revolutionaries. "They just shut the doors to debate on the floor, to amendments coming, to even how special orders [speeches] were conducted. Everything they were effective in using to gain the majority they shut down."

"We're going to do the opposite," she pledged.

"This country has spoken loudly and clearly," Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), slated to become the new Senate majority leader in January, told a Capitol Hill rally last week. "There must be a change of direction in Iraq. We have to have results in doing something to make health care more affordable and more available. We have to do something to create energy independence."

House Democratic leaders have put forward an ambitious opening salvo for January, a 100-hour legislative blitz that includes raising the minimum wage, boosting alternative-energy research and repealing tax breaks for oil companies. They also want to beef up seaport screening, expand college tuition assistance, boost stem cell research and allow the federal government to negotiate lower drug prices under Medicare.

House Democrats also hope to approve rules changes to limit the influence of lobbyists, offer the minority party more input on legislation, curb home-state pet projects in spending bills and, possibly, give the District of Columbia voting rights on the House floor.

But once the 100 hours or so pass, pressure will mount on Democrats to confront what many liberals see as the misdeeds of Bush and the Republican Party. The party's base is clamoring for Democrats to repeal tax cuts skewed to the affluent, to revisit the new law authorizing military tribunals for terrorism suspects and to investigate the run-up to the Iraq invasion.

To some Democrats, such calls raise memories of the aggressive -- and ultimately self-destructive -- stance that House Republicans took when they stormed to power in the 1994 election and later voted to impeach President Bill Clinton, only to see Clinton acquitted in the Senate.

"They're under great pressure to placate the base, to be hard-line and in some ways to pay back the Republicans," said former senator Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.), the last Democratic Senate majority leader. "But they're also under tremendous pressure to produce and show they can govern. Finding the balance, that's going to be the big challenge."

"It's one thing to oppose and obstruct. It's another to try to govern and legislate," said Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), a moderate Republican who is urging bipartisan cooperation. "How they set in gear the motions for governing and legislating will clearly set the tone for the duration."

The ranks of the new Democratic leadership will include Reid, who once called Bush a "loser" and a "liar"; Pelosi, who bitterly remembers the power shift to the Republicans; and a new Democratic Caucus chairman, Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), who confronted Gingrich's revolution as an aide in the Clinton White House.

"Newt ran in and said, 'I'm basically the prime minister,' " Emanuel recalled. "We didn't do that. Nancy said we won an election. The president won an election. We have to respect the results of both 2004 and 2006."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, agreed: "We should always be mindful that there was a little bit of God and a lot of bit of luck here. A 4,000-vote shift and we would have four new senators, not the U.S. Senate."

If all voters see is interest-group politics and "a lot of shouting," Schumer added, "our victory could be ephemeral . . . more ephemeral than Gingrich's one was. Everyone has to be cognizant of the fact that keeping the majority helps all of us achieve far more of our goals than if we undermine it."

DOJ_NMG_0093125

But there are limits to such sentiments. In the 1990s, Republicans shifted the number of committee seats allotted to the majority and minority parties to virtually ensure that no cross-party collaboration would be needed to draft and pass legislation. When asked whether she may change those ratios as a goodwill gesture, Pelosi last week snapped, "I don't see a scenario where there is going to be much appetite for that."

And regardless of leaders' intent, conservative Democrats worry that Democratic old bulls, returning to chair committees after so long in the minority, could drive a partisan agenda. Some fear that Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), at the helm of the education panel, and Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, may be too quick to pick fights before Democrats can cement their gains.

"We increased our market share by going where the market was, to moderate, even Republican districts," said Rep. John S. Tanner (Tenn.), a leader of the conservative Blue Dog Democrats, which has grown to become one of the largest House Democratic factions. "If we're going to hold and consolidate that, we have to understand the reality that the face of the Democratic Caucus has changed from where it was in late '80s and early '90s."

Similar dynamics may be at play in the Senate, where Democrats will hold a one-vote majority. The incoming class of senators includes two economic populists in Reps. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) and Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.), a classic centrist with a slender mandate in Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), and a cantankerous conservative in Jim Webb (D-Va.).

"It's going to be an interesting year," quipped one Senate Democratic leadership aide.

Once Democrats have exhausted their consensus agenda, a legislative priority list they call "6 for '06," they will have to decide whether they need to become more ambitious -- balancing the budget, overhauling immigration policy, or tackling problems of poverty and the uninsured, for instance -- or focus on the nuts and bolts of governance to prove competence ahead of the 2008 campaign.

Schumer said they need to be aggressive: " 'Six for '06' is enough to establish a beachhead, but it's not enough for '08."

William Howell, a political scientist at the University of Chicago's Harris School of Public Policy and the co-author of a forthcoming book on the balance of power between Congress and the presidency, disagreed. There may be nothing in the Democrats' agenda beyond the opening salvo, he said, and there probably does not have to be. The election of 1994 brought to power a Republican leadership that campaigned on a specific platform, along with a huge freshman class of ideological conservatives. That was not the case in 2006.

"Everyone woke up Wednesday saying America wants change, but they didn't say, 'Americans want the following five legislative items,' " he said.

Howell said Democrats should pass new ethics laws to distance themselves from the scandal-ridden 109th Congress, push a few broadly popular initiatives such as a minimum wage increase and then concentrate on the business of governance -- passing spending bills on time, taking up nominations and confronting national issues as they arise.

Partisan energies should be channeled to hearings, especially on the conduct of the war in Iraq, which would be far more effective in marshalling public pressure on Bush than any legislation, he said.

Douglas MacKinnon, an aide to then-Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) during the 1990s, said Democrats must learn from Republican mistakes.

"Number one, you don't have a mandate," he said, addressing Democrats. "The American people were just sick of the other side, so don't turn things upside down, because they won't put up with it. . . . And guess what, the American people do want you to work with the other side. Republicans didn't. They let arrogance rule the day, and it hurt them in the end."

Reid, An Ex-boxer, Hasn't Forgotten Bush's Punches (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

In the coming months, it will probably be useful to remember that as a young man, Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) spent some time as an amateur middleweight boxer. Reid understands one reason his job title is changing from leader of the Democratic minority to Senate majority leader is that many voters recoiled against the unrelenting combat between the parties that has characterized George W. Bush's presidency.

But it's also apparent that Reid has not forgotten the punches thrown by the White House and GOP congressional leaders over the last six years, and that he considers more than a few of them low blows.

President Bush, at his morning-after-the-deluge news conference Wednesday, grandly declared inoperative his slashing campaign-trail claim that the Democratic agenda on national security and Iraq could be reduced to a single equation: "The terrorists win and America loses."

DOJ_NMG_0093126

Reid talks about turning the other cheek, but he also seems to remember exactly where that blow landed and how much it stung. "Some of the things that have been said by [Vice President Dick] Cheney and [the president] are hard to comprehend," Reid told a small group of reporters late last week.

It was only a single jab from Reid, tight and targeted, but it was also a signal of how much Bush's life will change during the next two years. Notwithstanding occasional dissent, the GOP Congress saw itself as a supporting member of the White House team, almost as if both were part of a parliamentary system. In that role, Capitol Hill Republicans allowed Bush to set the national agenda and minimized congressional oversight that might have embarrassed the administration.

With Reid and incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, Bush will face two pugnacious Democrats determined to challenge his agenda and to force him to react to their own goals. Bush could count on congressional Republicans to repeatedly schedule votes on his priorities, such as legislation to abolish the estate tax. Reid dismisses that idea with barely a shrug. "We wasted so much time on it," he says. Is Bush's goal of eliminating the estate tax dead? "It better be," he says.

Instead, Democrats want to force the national debate onto a very different agenda. Reid says he expects the Senate "pretty quickly" to pass legislation raising the minimum wage. He's also optimistic about quick action allowing Medicare to negotiate directly with drug companies for lower prescription prices — an idea the White House and the pharmaceutical industry blocked in 2003 when Congress passed the drug benefit for seniors.

Reid anticipates more aggressive congressional oversight, starting with Iraq. Outgoing Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.), a close White House ally, slow-walked a promised investigation into whether intelligence data supported the administration's prewar public claims about Iraqi weapons of mass destruction. Roberts also structured the inquiry in ways that constrained the danger to Bush; most important, the committee did not compel senior administration officials to answer questions under oath.

Now Reid expects John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), who will head the Senate Intelligence Committee, to briskly conclude a comprehensive study. "I think not only as part of good government, but as part of history, that investigation should be completed," he says.

The biggest question facing the incoming Democratic majorities in both chambers is how hard to push Bush on Iraq. Almost all Democrats are comfortable with examining the administration's performance through tough oversight and exhorting Bush to change course.

Reid, for one, has a crisp set of preferences on Iraq. He wants Bush to personally convene a regional conference with Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Syria (the latter has been on the president's do-not-call list) to search for political solutions. Reid also wants to reexamine the reconstruction process — which, he says pointedly, has consisted of "throwing bundles of hundred-dollar bills to" Halliburton Co.

And he wants Bush to reduce the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and shift their focus from frontline fighting to training Iraqi forces. "We don't need our people patrolling the streets, walking down and being shot," Reid insists.

Reid, like almost all Democrats, hopes that the bipartisan commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) that is studying Iraq policy will push Bush in this direction when it reports this winter.

But if the commission doesn't recommend big change, or if Bush rejects it, congressional Democrats will face a momentous decision: whether to attempt to pass legislation compelling the president to begin withdrawing from Iraq.

It's already clear that Democratic activists are expecting more than kibitzing about Iraq from the party's new congressional majority. The message from Democratic voters about Iraq "wasn't just that it's a mess, it was 'We are hiring you ... to lead the country out of it,' " says Eli Pariser, executive director of the MoveOn.org political action committee. An election-eve poll for the group found that two-thirds of voters who supported Democrats expected them to reduce or withdraw troops from Iraq.

Reid hears the message, but he's cautious. An earlier generation of congressional critics who sought to cut off funding for the Vietnam War faced charges of undermining the troops. Reid says, "You have people being shot up, blown up [in Iraq], and we want to make sure that there is never a question that we aren't supportive totally of them."

Attempting to legislate an accelerated disengagement from Iraq clearly isn't Reid's first choice but, tellingly, he doesn't rule it out. "It may come to that," he says.

In other words, Reid isn't trading haymakers with Bush on the war, but he's taping his hands and edging closer to the ring.

Ascending To A National Platform (LAT)

By Faye Fiore, Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The phone rang at 7:15 the morning after Nancy Pelosi and the Democrats swept into power. It woke her up.

DOJ_NMG_0093127

"Do we have a baby?" Pelosi asked without pausing for hello. Her youngest daughter, Alexandra, was pregnant and six days overdue. Who else would call so early?

It was the president of the United States, holding.

"Leader Pelosi?" a confused switchboard operator asked, as President Bush waited to congratulate the woman who helped engineer the election-day "thumping" of his party.

As a member of the Democratic House leadership for five years, Pelosi has been an important Washington player. But this week, she awoke to a celebrity of a whole other order.

Her near-certain ascension as the nation's first female speaker of the House had networks lining up for interviews and newspapers placing her picture on the front page. Blogs were abuzz.

Overnight, a woman who was scarcely known to the nation moved into a world of constant public attention. The morning after the election, she left her condo in Washington's Georgetown neighborhood without makeup on — she likes to apply it in the car — and walked into an ABC News stakeout.

Later last week, she lunched with Bush, shaking his hand at an Oval Office appearance where, in a postelection ritual familiar in Washington, the two leaders jointly vowed to end the partisan bickering. She met with Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming Senate majority leader, to map out the agenda for the first 100 hours of the Congress that convenes in January.

A Washington power shift would have been big news by any measure, but Pelosi's historic elevation handed her a larger megaphone to sound the themes her party hopes to build on. She began spelling out her agenda before the victory confetti was swept up: a new direction in Iraq, a higher federal minimum wage, lower prescription drug costs, more civility and improved ethics in Washington.

As the only daughter of late Maryland congressman and Baltimore Mayor Tommy D'Alesandro, Pelosi was nurtured in a political environment. There were always constituents in the living room, many of them looking for jobs or other help, their names kept in a "favor file" for consultation at election time.

Married and settled in San Francisco, she raised her five children in a similar atmosphere, enlisting them to stuff envelopes while she juggled laundry, meals and Democratic fundraising, ultimately as California party chairwoman and a major national fundraiser. Her efforts helped lure the party's presidential convention to San Francisco in 1984 and helped Democrats regain control of the Senate two years later.

She was 47 — her youngest child a senior in high school — before she sought elected office, winning a seat in Congress from San Francisco. It was a late start in a Capitol filled with people who had lusted for political power since running for student-body president.

Now 66, Pelosi both embraces her status as the nation's senior elected woman and bristles when pigeonholed as the first female this or that.

She demands to be regarded as a lawmaker who happens to be a woman, not the other way around.

Yet she never missed a chance to use gender to political advantage in the closing weeks of the bruising midterm campaign. "It will take a woman to clean up the House," she told audiences time and again.

She likes to say that motherhood taught her to be organized, broker disputes and do a dozen things at once.

Family and colleagues speak of her inexhaustible energy, then and now. Pelosi's daughter Christine, 40, doesn't remember her mother sleeping much.

Pelosi does not exercise regularly and is a confessed chocoholic; there are bowls of it in her office. (The White House tactically served Chocolate Freedom, a souffle, for Thursday's luncheon dessert.)

In two months of campaigning, Pelosi made 37 visits to 18 states and raised millions for more than 70 candidates.

Even during the most hectic days, she balanced work with family. A stop in Arizona meant a visit with two of her five grandchildren in Phoenix. The same in Texas, where the other three live. She carries two cellphones, one for business and one for family members, who try not to call frivolously because, no matter what, she always answers.

The downside of that energy and organization is a tendency to micromanage, which sometimes stymies her staff and frustrates allies. She tinkers with stagecraft at news conferences, fussing over backdrops and the like.

She can be gracious and ruthless. She threw an ice cream social for Rep. Jane Harman when the Venice Democrat returned to Congress after a failed 1998 bid for governor. But more recently, Pelosi signaled she would pass over Harman for leadership of the House Intelligence Committee for allegedly being too conciliatory to Republicans.

Well known for harboring grudges, Pelosi makes no apologies. "I have a reptilian approach," she once said, describing how she determined which candidates were deserving of support. "You have to be very cold-blooded in how you allocate resources."

Tuesday's election bore out Pelosi's velvet-hammer approach. She whipped together Democrats and achieved a level of party unity that had not been seen in decades, all the while traveling virtually nonstop to raise record sums of money.

DOJ_NMG_0093128

After lunch at the White House last week, Pelosi sat with Bush in the Oval Office for a brief media blitz. Cameras fired. The bitter rivals shook hands.

"There's a natural phenomenon to be pitted against the president," said Norman Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington think tank. "But the speakership of the House is not the presidency. She can't make decisions like the president. She leads a collective body. And the more it gets framed in personal terms, the more dangerous and difficult it's going to be."

Pelosi has to show she can unify the famously fractious Democrats in her charge, help lay the foundation for the party's 2008 presidential nominee, and give colleagues a record to tout when they fight to preserve their majority in the next election.

Only then, if she wins a second term as speaker, will Pelosi prove as successful in the House as she was in the home.

Speaker Clout Benefits District (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill secured down payments for Boston's Big Dig. Sam Rayburn sent gushers of cash back to Texas, along with tax breaks that helped its oil industry. Hospitals, schools and nonprofits in J. Dennis Hastert's hometown of Aurora, Ill., have seen millions roll in during his reign.

Now Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco is poised to follow them as speaker of the House -- a perch predecessors used to channel big cash to pet projects back home.

"There's a long tradition where, not only can you bring back your average pork as a member of Congress, but speaker pork gives you a lot of money, a lot of influence over the purse," said Julian E. Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University.

Mrs. Pelosi, a Democrat, will be the first Californian to hold the post, and congressional watchdogs say they'll be observing her new spending clout with great interest.

There are "a lot of peeping chicks everywhere," said Tim Ransdell, executive director of the California Institute for Federal Policy Research in Washington.

Aides to Mrs. Pelosi don't dispute that the state will benefit from a changing of the guard at the Capitol.

"From the speaker's chair to committee chairs, Californians in Congress will have additional clout to help the home state," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Mrs. Pelosi. But less than a week after the election, Mrs. Pelosi has no specific wish list for her district, Miss Crider said.

As she has moved up through the ranks of spending committees and the Democratic leadership, Mrs. Pelosi already has helped send millions of dollars home.

According to Citizens Against Government Waste, a federal spending watchdog, in the past two fiscal years Mrs. Pelosi has helped obtain:

·$6.7 million for the Presidio Dental Clinic.

·$2.1 million for the San Francisco Maritime National Historic Park.

·$388,000 to the Filipino Cultural Center in San Francisco for "rehabilitation."

Now, as she prepares to assume one of the most powerful posts in Congress, the pressure to funnel money to the San Francisco Bay Area is bound to increase, Mr. Ransdell said.

"The transportation crowd will want rebuilding of freeways or the Bay Bridge access, or else more money for a transit project here or there," he said. "The social-services community will want additional funding perhaps for a welfare program, or else maybe construction of additional low-income housing or homeless housing."

As she considers requests for hometown projects, Mrs. Pelosi has powerful partners: Democratic Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, also from the Bay Area.

With Democrats taking over the Senate, Mrs. Feinstein likely will assume leadership of an influential spending subcommittee. Mrs. Boxer will become chairwoman of a committee key on transportation projects and climate-change research.

In September, the House changed its rules to end secret pork-barrel projects. The resolution banned a practice in which lawmakers anonymously insert "earmarks" -- narrowly tailored spending that often helps a specific company or project in their district -- into bills.

The measure required lawmakers to identify the special projects they slip into legislation. Mrs. Pelosi voted against it. Miss Crider said Mrs. Pelosi wanted a more stringent package of rules, but that measure ultimately failed.

One of Mrs. Pelosi's first actions in January will be to try again to pass "a strong rules package" that would among other things renew and strengthen the ban on secret earmarks, Miss Crider said.

Bush's Bipartisan Experience In Texas May Not Translate (HC)

By Julie Mason

DOJ_NMG_0093129

Houston Chronicle, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush's rude awakening Wednesday morning to a newly elected Democratic-led Congress stirred up all kinds of nostalgia — and questionable impressions — about his days as Texas governor.

Bush told reporters he could easily manage the challenge of working with a majority in the other party; that after all, he did it in the 1990s with the state's Legislature.

"As governor of Texas, I had successfully worked with both Democrats and Republicans to find common-sense solutions to the problems facing our state," Bush said at his post-election news conference.

It was the prevailing White House line the day after Republicans lost the House and Senate. White House counselor Dan Bartlett did a round of morning news shows, saying the same thing.

"Well, he did talk about a record in Texas where he was able to work with Republicans and Democrats," Bartlett told CBS News.

One difference between the two eras: Bush did not spend six years bashing Democratic state lawmakers as bad for the state before taking over as governor. When he became president and was complemented by a Republican-controlled Congress, he often was on the attack against the opposing party for the next six years.

Also, some back in Texas are rolling their eyes at the White House's resurrected bit of myth-making, saying that the late Lt. Gov. Bob Bullock deserves the credit for forging bipartisan cooperation.

"Bullock didn't allow partisanship because he thought everyone should put the best interests of Texas first," said Claudia Stravato of Amarillo, a longtime aide to the legendary Texan.

Noting that in Texas the lieutenant governor as chief of the Senate wields more power than the governor, Stravato said Bush and Bullock, a Democrat who died in 1999, got along in part because both were "Bubbas" of the old school.

"Bullock liked the kid, and was letting him take credit for stuff," she said. "And to get along with Bullock, everyone else had to do the same."

What Bush needs now, Stravato said, is a similar Democratic mentor to clear a path for him through Congress.

But it's not likely he will find one. Washington is a far more partisan atmosphere than Bush was used to back in Texas, and it's not in the interests of either party to work together. Both are already fixing their prospects for the 2008 presidential campaigns.

Even so, the motions are being observed. Bush invited Democratic congressional leaders to the White House and had lunch with presumptive House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California.

After the harsh partisan rhetoric of the campaign, Bartlett speculated about one likely item on the menu: "For the president," he said, "it's probably a little crow."

White House tries to explain about-faceAfter the abrupt resignation Wednesday of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the White House spent the rest of the week trying to explain away why Bush had insisted a week earlier that Rumsfeld was staying.

Bush first had said in an interview with wire service reporters that he wanted Rumsfeld to remain in place for the rest of his administration.

On Wednesday, he admitted that at the time, the decision for Rumsfeld to go essentially had been made already. But, he said, the choice of a replacement was not final.

"The reason why is I didn't want to inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign," Bush said at a news conference. "And so the only way to answer that question and to get you on to another question was to give you that answer."

In the same pre-election interview with wire service reporters, Bush also said he wanted Vice President Dick Cheney to stay on for the rest of his term.

Does this mean Cheney is definitely stepping down?

Evidently not.

Govern, Don't Gloat (NYT)

By Leon E. Panetta

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WE govern our democracy either by leadership or by crisis. Last Tuesday, the American people sent a clear message that they are sick and tired of government by crisis. They elected Democrats to the House and Senate not to prolong gridlock, but to govern.

There are those who believe that the best political strategy for 2008 is for the Democrats to continue to confront President Bush and seal his fate as a failed president. The danger, however, is that if the Democrats become nothing more than a party of obstruction, it will be only a matter of time before they too will lose the trust of the American people. The lesson of this election is that the public will no longer tolerate incompetence and gridlock, whether it comes from the Republicans or the Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0093130

Twelve years ago, President Clinton suffered a similar defeat when Republicans captured both houses of Congress. As chief of staff to the president at the time, I was asked to comment on the implications of that midterm election for the president and the future of the nation. My response was that the real question was whether a party that had been a minority in Congress was now prepared to work with the president to govern the nation.

Today it is fair to ask the same question of the Democrats.

In 1994, the Republicans decided they would directly challenge the president with their Contract With America. The result was the shutdown of the federal government. Badly damaged by the public outrage over such antics, Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich decided that Republicans had to work with the president if they were to survive. This led to a period of cooperation that produced, among other achievements, a balanced federal budget and welfare reform. The Republicans held their majority in 1996.

In the wake of this election, the Democrats and the president face the same choice: gridlock or cooperation?

While both sides are speaking the words of reconciliation, nothing will really change until they can trust each other. After six years of partisan trench warfare, that will not be easy. It begins with a cease-fire on the rhetoric of cheap shots and ultimatums. Karl Rove and other political consultants need to take a long vacation. Both sides need to speak honestly with each other and be willing to compromise.

The legislative work can begin on areas where there is likely consensus: immigration reform, lobbying and ethics reform, and education with the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind.

If that works, Congress and the administration can move on to negotiate tougher issues like establishing long-term budget discipline, expanding energy alternatives, fixing the prescription drug benefit and increasing the minimum wage.

And, finally, on the war in Iraq, despite the bitter differences, both the Democrats and the president face the same brutal reality. We need a new strategy to stabilize Iraq so that our troops can begin to come home without leaving a disaster behind. The president took an important step by replacing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld with Robert Gates. The Iraq Study Group led by James Baker and Lee Hamilton, of which I am a member, will soon make its recommendations, which we hope will provide the beginning of a unified strategy.

Democracy needs the trust of the people. But that can only occur if our elected leaders can trust one another. That is not only good politics, it just happens to be good for the country.

Let The Investigations Begin (NYT)

By Stanley Brand

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

THE Democrats' victory has stoked the fire beneath an already brewing debate within the party regarding the need for investigations of the executive branch during the Bush administration's two remaining years. Some Democratic members of Congress are reluctant to pursue investigations into war profiteering, detainee interrogation or other controversial issues, fearing that such scrutiny of the administration will make Democrats appear petty and partisan and cost them electoral support in 2008.

A vigorous examination of the administration's conduct, however, is not only the appropriate action as a matter of constitutional prerogative, it is the politically necessary response to voters' overwhelming rejection of the current Congress's failure to assert itself in this area.

Nothing is better established in constitutional history and jurisprudence than Congress's power to investigate the executive. Centuries of precedents in Parliament, colonial legislatures and United States law endorse it. In 1742, William Pitt the Elder summarized the powers of Parliament: "We are called the grand inquest of the nation, and as such it is our duty to inquire into every step of public management, either at home or abroad, in order to see that nothing has been done amiss."

Indeed, the very first example of congressional oversight in our history was an inquiry into President George Washington's deployment of the military. In that case, a committee appointed by the House in 1792 was authorized to investigate the disastrous defeat the year before of Gen. Arthur St. Clair by Indians in the Ohio Territory, with the power to issue subpoenas for "persons, papers and records as may be necessary to assist their inquiries."

Congress is a coequal branch with explicit power to declare war, raise armies and navies and appropriate money for such activities. The Supreme Court has also repeatedly ratified Congressional authority to investigate executive departments. Congressional powers to probe "into departments of the federal government to expose corruption, inefficiency or waste," the court has stated, are "as penetrating and far reaching as the potential power to enact and appropriate under the Constitution."

For the past six years, Congress's oversight function has atrophied in a unitary Republican landscape. To be sure, investigative power should be exercised carefully, thoughtfully and with due regard for the rights of a coordinate branch. But

DOJ_NMG_0093131

Congress should not shrink from its duty to investigate a reluctant or recalcitrant executive, especially one that, while cloaking itself in secrecy, has boldly asserted unprecedented powers in the initiation and conduct of war — with disastrous consequences that the electorate has now repudiated.

By performing their constitutional obligations, the new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate will surely do right by the Constitution and the country. But they will also no doubt do very well for themselves.

Democrats Now Look To Sustain Majority (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — It's the question Democrats would rather not ask in their moment of revelry: Are their new majorities in the House and Senate sustainable?

What if the war in Iraq is over by 2008? Or what if it is still being waged despite Democratic pledges to change the course? What if voter anti-pathy toward President Bush is irrelevant in two years? After all, he will be on his way out.

"Who knows whether these things are long-term trends or not," Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., said last week.

Voters gave Democrats control of Congress but did not undergo an ideological conversion. The Democrats' success had more to do with anger toward President Bush, weariness over the war and contempt for the corruption and scandal in Congress — a confluence of negatives that became a political force.

As some Democrats begin looking to 2008 and beyond, the challenge is how to turn anti-pathy toward Republicans into affection for Democrats.

"You can't count on that kind of a wave in every election by any means," Democratic pollster Mark Mellman said.

Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the chairman of the Senate Democratic campaign committee, acknowledged that the Democrats' 51-49 majority in the Senate was the result of the narrowest of victories in six race. "Had 10,000 votes flipped we would have four seats not six," he said.

Democrats do see opportunities ahead.

In 2008, there are 21 Republican Senate seats up for election and only 12 Democratic seats. Eight of the Republicans in those seats won their last election with 55% or less of the vote.

In the House, where Democrats held 230 seats and appeared to be in line to win two more, all 435 members face re-election in 2008.

"The good news for Democrats is that we don't need a wave to keep the seats we have," Mellman said.

Democrats came into power calling for a change in course in Iraq. They promised to clean up government, create better economic conditions for the middle class and ensure cheaper drugs for the elderly.

"People are open to a longer term Democratic majority," Schumer said, "but we have to seal the deal."

Schumer proposed a three-step plan for Democrats.

It would begin with modest plans to increase the minimum wage, provide more tax breaks on college tuition, encourage greater energy independence and require drug companies to negotiate for lower Medicare drug prices.

Democrats then must work in bipartisan fashion to confront the war in Iraq and government deficits, Schumer said.

"Thirdly, we have to try our best to come up with a full vision and platform that points toward '08," he said.

To some Democrats, the party's biggest task is maintaining credibility on national security.

Since the Vietnam War, Republicans have held an advantage with voters on defense and security issues. But the Iraq war soured many voters on Republicans. By early fall, polls showed the public trusted Democrats more on resolving Iraq and trusted them equally with Republicans in combating terrorism.

Susan Rice, a foreign policy expert who was a senior adviser to Democrat John Kerry's presidential campaign in 2004, said Democratic candidates improved in the polls when they directly challenged Bush's war policy with more pointed ads and public statements

"Somewhere along the line in the last few months, the Democrats got some spine and got the courage to say out loud what they had been saying behind closed doors, which is that the president's national security policy has been an utter failure, has made us less safe, and that Iraq is Exhibit A for that failure," she said after Tuesday's vote.

But Rice said the Democratic gains on national security "are very tenuous" and the party should proceed cautiously on Iraq.

She said Democrats "won an early scalp in the form of Donald Rumsfeld" that will help them claim an initial victory and keep them from taking positions that might hurt their standing on national security.

DOJ_NMG_0093132

Some Republicans say the GOP did not simply lose ground on national security. Wes Anderson, a Republican strategist who consulted in some of the closest Senate races, said that before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, voters identified the GOP as the party of fiscal conservatism, middle-class economics, national security and ethical reform.

"Our problem is our brand is broken," Anderson said. "Voters didn't walk away from the core principles of the brand. They just didn't think we represented them effectively."

A poll that Anderson's firm conducted in 12 of the most contested congressional races on Nov. 5-6, right before Election Day, showed the depth of voter anger. When voters were asked which party was "controlled by big corporations," 8% said Democrats, 51% said Republicans and 25% said both.

But the difficulties had been evident for weeks and the voters who were taking flight were independents. Indeed, exit poll surveys by the Associated Press and the networks found that 26% of voters who were with Bush in 2004 went for Democrats this election.

"In late September or early October we came to the rude conclusion that there was little we could do on the air or in the mail that would change people's minds," Anderson said.

While that could be good news for Democrats, Republicans take heart in the idea that voters still seem to adhere to conservative values.

"I don't think what you saw on Tuesday was a major political realignment," said Sen. John Thune, R-S.D. "A lot of people are saying Republicans stayed home. I think we really lost it among independents. The takeaway from it is you have to have a motivated base and you have to have a strategy to get to those independent voters."

How Rahm Emanuel Helped End An Era Of Republican Rule (CHIT)

By Naftali Bendavid

Chicago Tribune, November 12, 2006

Rahm Emanuel was seething.

He was hurtling down an asphalt road in upstate New York on the 47th trip of his ferocious campaign to win back the House. A lecture, even from his friend James Carville, was the last thing he needed.

In just 12 days, Emanuel's quest would end in a historic victory—a triumph that almost no one believed possible when he accepted the challenge nearly two years ago—or in colossal failure.

And here were Carville and pollster Stan Greenberg telling him he had to make each of his handpicked candidates shift from attack mode and strike a conciliatory note in their final campaign ads.

"James. No James, YOU LISTEN," Emanuel barked into a cell phone, about to release a string of profane invectives more intense than usual. "Can you listen for one [expletive] minute? I'm working these campaigns all the time. The campaigns all have different textures."

His wiry body tensed, his voice breaking with stress. Emanuel shouted, "If you don't like what you see, I highly recommend you pick up the … phone and do it yourself."

The moment captured Rahm in full, a portrait in power of a brutally effective taskmaster.

During the past year, the Tribune had exclusive access to the strategy sessions, private fundraisers and other moments that shaped this victory. The newspaper agreed not to print any of the details until after the election. Now that the votes have been counted, the story of how Emanuel helped end an era of Republican rule can be told.

He did it, in large measure, by remaking the Democratic Party in his own image.

Democrats had never raised enough money. Emanuel, a savvy fundraiser who shaped those skills under Richard M. Daley and Bill Clinton, yelled at colleagues and threatened his candidates into generating an unprecedented amount of campaign cash.

Democrats had a history of appeasing party constituencies. Emanuel tore up the old litmus tests on abortion and other issues. With techniques that would make a Big Ten football coach blush, he recruited candidates who could mount tough challenges in some of the reddest patches of America.

Democrats had blanched at hardball. Emanuel, jokingly called "Rahmbo" even by his mother, muscled weaker Democrats out of races in favor of stronger ones, and ridiculed the chairman of his own party.

In January 2005, when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi asked Emanuel to head the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, or DCCC, experts predicted that the party would take perhaps three seats. On Tuesday, it picked up at least 28, changing the course of the Bush presidency.

In a world where congressmen refer to each other as "my distinguished colleague," Emanuel, 46, is sometimes unable to get through a single sentence without several obscenities. His politics are centrist, but his style is extremist. The top of his right middle finger was severed when he was a teenager, adding to his aura of toughness—especially when he extends that middle finger, which he does with some regularity.

DOJ_NMG_0093133

For all his forcefulness, Emanuel was not responsible for the political climate, either the failing war or the sex and corruption scandals racking the Republican Party. But with creative recruiting, unremitting fundraising and a national message, he positioned the Democrats to exploit that collapse.

In doing so, Emanuel had to be familiar with roughly 50 individual races—the candidates, the interest groups, the voting blocs. It resembled a game of three-dimensional chess, in that what happened in one district could affect dozens of others.

From the outset, there could be only one measure of success: the number of seats the Democrats won. Bill Paxon, a former New York congressman who held Emanuel's job for the Republicans when they seized the House in 1994, explained the unforgiving math.

"Unlike a lot of things in government where there is compromise, there is only one result—you either win or you lose—and you are judged on that," Paxon said. "You can look at fundraising, candidate recruitment and other things, but they are meaningless. The only thing that matters is if you win or lose."

This is the story of how Rahm and the Democrats won.

KILLER INSTINCT

The Republicans always had killers on their side, ruthless closers like Karl Rove, Tom DeLay and Lee Atwater, the late mudslinging mastermind credited with getting the first President Bush elected.

In Emanuel, Democrats had their counterpart, a tactician of a caliber the party had not seen since the young Lyndon Johnson converted the DCCC into a power base.

Emanuel's thin, unimposing frame still hints at the teen and college years devoted to ballet; his voice sometimes screeches, and his words can get jumbled in public speeches.

But his political style—honed in Chicago and on the presidential campaign trail with Clinton—isn't gentle or uncertain. His reputation as a political street fighter inspires respect and more than a little fear.

Some Republicans coped by employing humor. Spotting Emanuel in the House gym last July, Rep. Christopher Shays of Connecticut told him he knew that he'd been targeted. Emanuel was planning to spend $3 million to defeat the popular moderate.

"I'll tell you what," Shays said. "Just give me the $3 million, and I'll retire voluntarily."

Emanuel's strategy was to keep the opposition uncomfortable. If a Republican congressman took a vote that he hoped no one in his district would notice, such as supporting a Bush budget cut, Emanuel immediately issued a press release and sent it to the Republican's hometown newspaper. He then sent it to the lawmaker's office to, as he said, "[mess] with their heads."

He had the DCCC designate one Republican as the "rubber stamp of the week" and another as the "crony of the week," a gimmick that generated a surprising amount of local coverage. Republicans who received money from drugmakers or oil companies were ridiculed as lackeys of special interests.

Last fall, a Democratic takeover of the House was laughable. Emanuel faced a merciless political map. Computer-assisted gerrymandering had made it possible for Republicans to draw congressional boundaries with increasing precision, ensuring a maximum number of GOP-leaning districts.

And yet Emanuel worried the GOP. "I think there is a lot of angst on our side," Rep. Tom Cole, an Oklahoma Republican, said late last year.

The popularity of the war in Iraq already was declining, and the president's poll numbers weren't good. If things got worse, GOP strategists sensed that Emanuel was someone who could take advantage of the opportunity. "If you are in a lead-pipe cinch Republican district, it's easier. But if you are in a marginal district, it's tough," Cole said. "The shark looks beautiful when you are outside the tank. But inside, it's a little different."

One of Emanuel's top targets, Rep. E. Clay Shaw of Florida, was 67, had served in the House for a quarter-century and had no desire to end his career with an embarrassing loss. One day last summer, when Emanuel was walking from his office to the Capitol, he passed Shaw. He nodded, saying "Clay" by way of greeting. Shaw stared ahead icily and kept walking. "See how he didn't say hello?" Emanuel asked.

He knew he was despised. "Look, this is not for the fainthearted," Emanuel said. "Their job is important to them, and I am seen as a threat to their job security. And that's life. And I didn't come here to win a popularity contest with them."

He added, "I wake up some mornings hating me too."

None of Emanuel's relationships with Republicans was testier than the one with Rep. Tom Reynolds, the upstate New Yorker who was his Republican counterpart. A stocky 56-year-old, Reynolds sometimes flinched when Emanuel's name was mentioned. Reynolds tried to be sportsmanlike, even when Emanuel targeted him for defeat—breaking the usual gentlemen's deal not to go after whoever was running the other party's campaign.

"If this was a tennis game, I would say he's a good tennis player and he makes my game better," Reynolds said grudgingly late last year. "He's a good pol. He's from Chicago." Then Reynolds added that he was a good pol too, from New York.

DOJ_NMG_0093134

INTENSE, EVEN IN TIGHTS

Central to Emanuel's ability to unnerve his political enemies is his fierce intensity, a quality that wasn't initially apparent as he grew up on the North Shore of Chicago. He played peacemaker between his older brother Ezekiel and his younger brother Ari, and he pirouetted around the house. "Ari would be wrestling, Zeke would be pondering deep thoughts, and Rahmmy would be leaping down the stairs and doing ballet dance twirls," his mother, Marsha, recalled.

Ari even got the top bunk bed when he and Rahm shared a room, even though Rahm was older and could have laid claim to it. "I was physically stronger," Ari Emanuel explained.

But when their parents sent Rahm to study ballet, his single-mindedness emerged. "Intense would be a word I would have used even then," said Kerry Hubata, his former ballet teacher. "I've seen kids with physical talent but didn't work as hard. Others, who weren't as gifted physically but had the desire and didn't mind the pain, succeeded more. He had the drive."

That drive only increased when Emanuel suffered an accident just before his 1977 graduation from New Trier West High School. Working at an Arby's, Emanuel badly cut the middle finger of his right hand. He insisted on going to prom festivities anyway, including a swim in Lake Michigan, and the finger became badly infected. Emanuel, his family recalled, lay near death in Children's Memorial Hospital with a fever of 106 degrees, as antibiotics were pumped into him. In the end, doctors removed half his finger.

"That was a big turning point in Rahm's life," said his mother, sitting in the kitchen of the Emanuels' modest two-story home in Wilmette. "It was touch-and-go, and finally when he came out of it he was more serious. … I honestly think that was his existential moment of near-death and realizing that you have to do something with life."

Emanuel was not the only brother with a drive to succeed. Ezekiel, the eldest, became an oncologist, joined the faculty at the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute and Harvard University, and is now a prominent medical ethicist at the National Institutes of Health. Ari went to Hollywood and has become an enormously wealthy agent, not to mention the inspiration for the bombastic Ari Gold character on HBO's "Entourage." (Emanuel, too, partly inspired a TV character: Josh Lyman on "The West Wing.")

The accomplished brothers came from parents with strong personalities. Emanuel's father, Benjamin, worked for the Jewish underground in pre-state Israel—he was smashed on the head by a British officer's baton, which left a dent in his skull—and became a well-known pediatrician in Chicago. Emanuel's mother was a civil rights activist who sometimes did not come home at night because she had been arrested. The Emanuels also adopted a daughter, Shoshana, who had a difficult youth and has kept a low profile.

Ezekiel Emanuel attributes the congressman's drive to their father. "He was notorious for seeing twice as many patients as the next guy on this list," Ezekiel said. "He would be personable, but just 'Get to the meat of things and get it done.'

"That obviously is a trait that people can see in Rahm, and it's quite clear where it came from, in my opinion."

Personable, however, is not a word many would use to describe Benjamin Emanuel's middle son. White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen once said of catcher A.J. Pierzynski: "If you play against him, you hate him. If you play with him, you hate him a little less." Though Emanuel has his die-hard loyalists, he could be the Democratic Party's A.J. Pierzynski.

PARTY CRASHER

On a late-spring day in 2006, Emanuel and Charles Schumer, the New Yorker in charge of winning the Senate for the Democrats, walked into the office of party Chairman Howard Dean.

Emanuel, once again, was ready for a fight.

For months, he and Schumer had been imploring the iconoclastic former presidential candidate to channel more money into congressional campaigns. Dean had been pushing a "50-state strategy" to build a Democratic operation in every part of the country.

The national party usually spent millions to help House candidates, but Dean was instead using the money to build this far-flung operation, to Emanuel's immense frustration. He felt Dean's strategy wasted money in unwinnable places.

According to Emanuel, the meeting devolved into a confrontation over resources. Emanuel said that the Republicans planned to heavily fund key races and that if Dean refused to do the same, it would amount to unilateral disarmament. Dean replied that he was fielding activists in every corner of every state.

Ridiculing the effort, Emanuel told Dean that he had seen no sign of it. "I know your field plan. It doesn't exist," he recalled saying. "I've gone around the country with these races. I've seen your people. There's no plan, Howard."

The tongue-lashing was another example of how Emanuel took a sledgehammer to intraparty niceties, making plenty of enemies along the way.

The gravitational center of Democratic antagonism toward Emanuel was the Congressional Black Caucus. Many of the caucus' 43 members complained that Emanuel had not hired enough African-American staffers. They also protested that when he harangued lawmakers to pay their DCCC dues, he did not recognize how hard it was for black politicians, many of whom represented poorer areas, to raise money. The protests often erupted into shouting matches. "If a person says, 'Danny Davis, where are your dues?' I may have a particular difficulty getting my dues that you don't know about or you don't relate to," Rep. Danny Davis, the West Side Democrat, said last summer. "Rahm don't take no prisoners."

DOJ_NMG_0093135

Emanuel was privately contemptuous of such complaints. He saw the Black Caucus as one more party faction, like conservative Democrats, that would rather complain than work. Asked about the number of black staffers at the DCCC—two African-Americans were on his senior staff of about 10 people—he waved his hand dismissively. "You know that every [DCCC] chairman has faced the same criticism?" he said. "OK. So I don't give a [expletive]," he added, literally spitting.

Then he began ranting about his conservative party colleagues. "They hate me too, because I'm arrogant and pushy with them. … Because they've never, ever WORKED! NOBODY! NONE OF 'EM!"

Little enraged Emanuel as much as a fellow Democrat who didn't share his unrelenting drive to win. In January 2006, Rep. Alcee Hastings, a Florida Democrat, was quoted in a local newspaper speaking sympathetically of Republican Clay Shaw. Because of his longtime friendship with Shaw, Hastings pointedly declined to endorse Shaw's Democratic challenger.

Hastings was a colorful figure. A former federal judge, he was removed from the bench by Congress in 1989 for corruption and perjury, only the sixth U.S. judge in history to suffer this fate. He took revenge by winning a seat in Congress. A forceful speaker, Hastings chastised Emanuel in a closed meeting of House Democrats for not recruiting more candidates.

"He's great on lectures," Emanuel said later. "Phenomenal lecturer. I'm getting a lecture on recruitment when A, you haven't done a … damn thing, and B, we've got a [Republican] target and you're out there kissing his [behind] in the press?"

Hastings refused to back down, saying he was close to both Shaw and his Democratic rival, Ron Klein, and could not in good conscience take sides. "Ron Klein is my friend. I have known Clay Shaw for nearly 40 years," he said. "Far be it from me to insert myself in a race of that kind."

Hastings was hardly the only Democrat who Emanuel thought was not pulling his weight. Many of his colleagues were doing great work, he said, but dozens of others declined to help him take on their Republican friends.

"You've got to have a thirst for winning," he said. "You know what our party thinks? 'We're good people with good ideas. That's just enough, isn't it?' Being tough enough, mean enough and vicious enough is just not what they want. … They just want to be patted on the back for the noble effort. No."

This no-holds-barred politics came naturally to Emanuel. In the 1980s he joined the campaigns of Sen. Paul Simon and Mayor Daley, proving adept at raising money. (Daley would later return the favor by fielding city patronage workers to help Emanuel win his first congressional election in 2002; that get-out-the-vote operation is now part of a federal investigation.)

Political consultant David Axelrod remembers Emanuel as a young Chicago political operative. "The first word that comes to mind is chutzpah," Axelrod said. "He redefined the term."

Emanuel brought that chutzpah to Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton's improbable presidential run. "He was then a little more brash and less polished than now, but he clearly had loads of ability and drive," the former president recalled in an e-mailed response to questions. "My first impression was, 'This guy is going to help us win.' And he did. I doubt we could have done it without him, especially in those critical early months."

When Clinton did win, Emanuel became his White House political director. But this time, his confrontational style failed him, as he clashed with other staffers and was quickly demoted to "director of special projects." The humiliation tempered his sharpest edges.

"He was devastated by what happened," said his mother, Marsha. "He told us that he had to sit back and rethink his methodology. And like with the finger, he took a deep breath and saw what direction he should go in."

Something of the relationship between the undisciplined president and his hard-hitting aide can be gleaned from an inscription on a photo Clinton gave Emanuel on his 38th birthday. Clinton signed it as though he were Emanuel: "Now Mr. President, how many times do I have to tell you, say it this way?" Clinton wrote. "And, by the way, wish me a happy birthday. Always gently, Rahm 11/29/97."

Emanuel's passion and loyalty won him the allegiance of others as well. Stan Greenberg's daughter Anna, a friend of Emanuel's as well as his pollster, asked him to officiate at her wedding earlier this year. Emanuel studied hard, read sacred texts and consulted a rabbi.

He could not resist cracking a few political jokes at the ceremony. But the wedding highlighted Emanuel's attachment to Judaism. "It's not as much about going to synagogue," Greenberg said. "But having ritual and tradition and teaching Jewish values are really, really important to him."

It was a side of Emanuel not seen by many people, including many of his fellow Democratic congressmen.

On a warm night last May, Emanuel summoned them to a colorless conference room at Democratic headquarters. He had walked a fine line for a year and a half, hoping to excite Democrats without unduly raising expectations. But now he felt the time had come to convince them that they could actually win.

DOJ_NMG_0093136

As several dozen House members settled into hard chairs, Emanuel cited polls suggesting that voters were ready for change. He also showed a video that included a quote from Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio confessing, "These numbers are scary." Images of Tom DeLay and other Republicans felled by scandal flashed on the screen to the pumping rhythm of the Queen song "Another One Bites the Dust."

Demoralized by defeat, many Democrats had begun to think that they would lose no matter how favorable the political winds. Al Gore and John Kerry appeared to have the momentum in their races, only to suffer crushing losses. The GOP had more money, armies of social conservatives and an entire region of the country, the South, almost uniformly in its camp.

But with his mastery of details, Emanuel gradually convinced even his most jaded colleagues that the Democrats could reach more than the 15-seat net gain they needed to seize the House for the first time since 1992.

Emanuel was constantly on the phone to candidates—coaching, reassuring, tormenting. In an August call to candidate Joe Sestak of Pennsylvania, Emanuel promised that Bill Clinton would help him raise money. "Joe Sestak, this is your rabbi, Rahm," he intoned playfully. "Clinton. I'm close to having him do an event for you in Philly. … Clinton will put his arm around you and say, 'He's my man.'"

In a fairly typical sign-off, he concluded another call to Sestak: "Don't [mess] it up or … I'll kill you. All right, I love you. Bye."

He warned another Pennsylvania hopeful, Chris Carney, about negative ads the GOP was about to unleash. "They're going to come after you," Emanuel said. "You haven't said anything stupid on the hustings, have you?

"Well, don't waste your time with me. Go raise some more money."

A MACHO MAKEOVER

All of Emanuel's scolding and cajoling would have meant nothing if he fielded weak candidates. After yet another devastating loss in 2004, he and other Democratic leaders quickly determined that the party needed a machismo implant. Emanuel looked for candidates with strong backgrounds, from sheriffs to soldiers, to counteract a Democratic image of softness.

This is why he badly wanted Heath Shuler, a former football star, to run for Congress as a Democrat in North Carolina. An evangelical Christian who opposes abortion, Shuler couldn't easily have his views caricatured by the GOP.

But Shuler was worried that if he ran and won, he would never see his two young children. To prove that congressmen do spend time with their children, Emanuel started calling Shuler in early 2005 whenever he was with his own family.

Shuler would pick up the phone and hear, "It's Rahm. I'm at a soccer game with my kids. Just wanted you to know that." Or "It's Rahm. I'm at a kindergarten play now. Talk to you soon." Shuler received perhaps 10 such calls. Of course, this also illustrated that whenever Emanuel was with his family, he was working.

In any case, Shuler agreed to jump in the race, challenging a 16-year incumbent and becoming one of the Democrats' hottest candidates. "I was recruited from high school to play college football, I was recruited by almost every college in the country, and then I was recruited into the NFL," said Shuler, a former Washington Redskins quarterback.

"I know all the angles that people use to recruit you," he added. "Nobody does it as well as Rahm Emanuel."

Emanuel believed in being tough. In September 2005, he described a Vietnam veteran he was trying to recruit this way: "I don't know if he's going to win, but I'll tell you this: I don't want to cross [him]. I think he would take out a knife and kill you. I think he would kill you." Emanuel viewed this as an asset.

His goal was to recruit 50 credible challengers. He had one criterion: people who could win. That may sound obvious, but it's not. Many Democrats did not believe in recruiting overly conservative candidates, no matter how promising. In the past, those like Shuler who opposed abortion were not welcome in the party.

"We don't have an ideological purity test," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen of Maryland, Emanuel's top lieutenant for recruiting. "If you believe in the basic gut principles of the Democratic Party—opportunity, fairness for all—we're not going to hold people to a litmus test."

Emanuel's recruiting effort had its share of failures; his top two candidates to challenge Rep. Richard Pombo, a vulnerable California Republican, turned him down, and his third candidate lost in the primary. (Pombo lost anyway, reflecting the magnitude of the Democratic victory.) Republicans mocked many of his recruits as "B-list."

But in the election's aftermath, it is clear that Democrats won several races, including Shuler's, that they would have lost if not for Emanuel's tireless recruiting. He had put enough legitimate challengers in place to exploit the unexpected opportunity.

Eclipsed by the election night euphoria was the fact that one of Emanuel's few disappointments came in his own back yard. Tammy Duckworth, a captain in the Illinois Army National Guard, lost to state Sen. Peter Roskam despite being one of the Democrats' highest-profile candidates.

Initially recruited by Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), Duckworth was the only wounded Iraq war veteran running for Congress. And she proved an irresistible news story, as Emanuel knew she would: A brave woman volunteers to serve in Iraq, loses both legs in combat and returns to seek office.

DOJ_NMG_0093137

Her candidacy also showed Emanuel's sometimes-callous pragmatism. When Duckworth entered the race, another Democrat, Christine Cegelis, was already running for the same seat. Cegelis had run two years earlier, done surprisingly well and built a loyal following. But Emanuel and Durbin did not believe she was working hard enough or raising sufficient money, and they settled on Duckworth as better-suited to the centrist district.

Between the appeal of her story and the power of her patrons, Duckworth won the backing of nearly every influential institution in Illinois. The state AFL-CIO announced its support for Duckworth — even though Cegelis, not Duckworth, was a former union member.

Emanuel used his connections to get Duckworth an appearance on the Sunday talk show hosted by George Stephanopoulos, his friend and former colleague in the Clinton White House. Another Emanuel ally, Axelrod, became Duckworth's media consultant. Cegelis could not compete with this, losing 44 percent to 40 percent to Duckworth in the March primary, with a third candidate getting the rest.

In the general election campaign, Roskam cast Duckworth as a puppet of Emanuel. "My opponent, in her name-calling, has called me a rubber stamp," Roskam said during one debate. "But I challenge my opponent to come up with one issue on which she differs from Congressman Rahm Emanuel."

Days before the election, Roskam's campaign gave Emanuel and the Duckworth camp a little of their own business. Just as organized labor had supported her in the primary even though Cegelis was the former card-carrying union member, the VFW endorsed Roskam even though Duckworth was the wounded war veteran.

Ultimately the district was too Republican, and Duckworth was too green, to pull off a win.

'DIG DEEP DOWN'

Emanuel walked into the offices of Prince, Lobel, Glovsky & Tye, a top Boston law firm, early one morning last August. The mission: extract as much money as possible from the 20 lawyers chewing bagels around a 30-foot conference table.

"I've been in politics for 20 years. This is the first time I've seen the stars aligned like this," Emanuel told them. "People know the party in power has messed things up."

Despite his phrasemaking, Emanuel was not a great speaker; he could lapse into a confusing shorthand on politics or legislation. But his message on this day was clear. He held up a $12,000 check he had just written to New Hampshire Democratic candidate Jim Craig. "I'm in for 12, folks," Emanuel said. "I want you to dig deep down. … For the first time, this is within our grasp."

Several listeners pulled out checkbooks on the spot, and the event raised $20,000. Someone asked Emanuel how he planned to spend the money he was raising nationally. He would not distribute funds based on which candidates he liked, he said, nor on who were the most loyal Democrats.

"I'm cutthroat about this," he said. "I don't give a crap where I pick up seats. I plan on winning. There is no emotional attachment."

Emanuel had arrived at the DCCC with a reputation as a world-class fundraiser. As finance director for Bill Clinton's first presidential run, Emanuel jumped on a table to exhort his staff to work harder. He yelled at donors, refusing to accept checks he considered too small. He probably saved Clinton's candidacy by keeping the cash flowing even after embarrassing reports of Clinton's affair with Gennifer Flowers.

Democrats always trail Republicans in fundraising, but in his fight for the House, Emanuel was determined to keep the money race close. No matter how good candidates were, it meant little if they did not have cash to advertise and pay campaign workers. Emanuel's first goal, as he traveled the country asking for money, was to raise $95 million. But as the Democrats gained momentum, contributions surged and Emanuel raised his target to $105 million. By the campaign's end, the Democrats had brought in close to $120 million, easily surpassing all previous records.

Emanuel and his staff judged a candidate almost entirely by how much money he or she brought in. If the candidate proved a good fundraiser, the DCCC would provide support, advertising and strategic advice. If not, the committee would shut him or her out.

Emanuel's demands were specific. Democratic challengers, for instance, had to raise $320,000 by March 31. At a staff meeting a year ago, talk turned to a Pennsylvania Democrat named Andy Warren who had raised a meager $38,662 in the previous three months.

Emanuel ordered the staff to drop Warren and back his Democratic opponent. "Eliminate him," Emanuel said curtly.

As for other candidates who had not met their goals, Emanuel said, "We'll just take three hours tomorrow, and I'll call the idiots who need to be pushed."

THE FINAL SPRINT

The story of the 2006 campaign was ultimately that of an overreaching Republican coalition that imploded over sex and corruption scandals as well as Iraq's descent into chaos. With astounding speed, Republicans found themselves out of sync with the voters, falling from grace in nearly unprecedented fashion. Emanuel did not know that would happen any more than anyone else did. His goal at the outset had been simply to win more seats than expected.

DOJ_NMG_0093138

The effort exacted a toll on Emanuel, a father of two girls and a boy. After he voted for himself in the Illinois Democratic primary in March, his 8-year-old daughter Ilana had said she hoped he would lose so he would not travel so much. She could imitate Emanuel's conversations with people such as Schumer, New York's senior senator.

"Chuck," she would say. A pause, and then, louder, "CHUCK!" Emanuel's son, Zach, 9, stopped talking to him when he called from the road. When Emanuel was home, Zach implored him to stop talking on his cell phone while they were tossing a football.

Emanuel called his wife, Amy Rule, several times a day from the road. They had met on a blind date in 1990 and married four years later. An MBA from Wharton, Rule worked at the Art Institute of Chicago but is now a stay-at-home mom, raising their children on the North Side.

In the car after an August fundraiser in Boston, Emanuel told her that he hadn't slept much the night before, kept awake by all the details of the campaign.

"How are the kids?" he asked.

After listening to her response, he said wistfully, "I'm so sorry I'm missing two little girls in the bathtub. Sounds peaceful."

His hair turned whiter during the campaign and he lost 14 pounds, his clothes hanging on a scarecrow frame. As Election Day neared, he awoke every morning at 3, agitating and strategizing. By day's end, his fingers would be trembling and his nose running from fatigue.

Most stressful for Emanuel was his lack of control over certain decisions. Campaign finance laws required him to create an "independent expenditures" group to oversee the vast majority of Democratic TV ads. Its independence was limited because it was run by John Lapp, who had spent much of the campaign as Emanuel's top aide. But Emanuel had to dump half the $120 million he had raised into the group's coffers, with no say over how it was spent.

As the campaign drew to a close, Lapp and his deputy, Ali Wade, were signing off on dozens of advertisements each day in an office across the street from the DCCC. The office was filled with chaotic activity—phones ringing, staffers charging in, ads playing on computers. A board on the wall listed districts where the DCCC was airing TV spots. One day in October, another call from James Carville prompted Wade to say in exasperation: "Can we change our number so he doesn't keep calling?"

This was a fast-moving game, especially for Emanuel. He took his 48th and final campaign trip to Las Vegas five days before the election. This visit to Nevada candidate Tessa Hafen was symbolic of how the landscape had shifted; just weeks earlier, her cause was thought to be hopeless, but now she had a chance, albeit a slim one.

Emanuel careened between overwhelming anxiety and giddiness. At a fundraiser for Hafen that night, Emanuel seemed tense. But by the next morning, preparing for his final news conference, he was in an expansive, almost joyful, mood as he gulped two cups of black coffee in the lobby of Las Vegas' monstrous Mandalay Bay hotel and casino.

"We have a seat in New Hampshire we are going to … steal," he chortled.

And in a final spurt of generosity, Emanuel ordered a gift sent to all the Democratic candidates he had been coaching for nearly two years. Back in early 2005, when he was recruiting candidates, Emanuel sent cheesecakes to particularly desirable prospects. So on the eve of the election, 70 cakes went out from Eli's Cheesecake in Chicago to Democratic challengers from Nevada to Connecticut.

BIG NIGHT

A large erasable board, divided into some 80 squares for various House districts, dominated one wall in the DCCC offices on election night. Interns rushed to update results, prompting cheers or moans from the assembled staffers.

When a winner was declared in a race, the interns outlined the square in red marker. As the number of red squares grew, the magnitude of the Democratic gains became clear and an unfamiliar mood of jubilation overtook the staffers.

For Emanuel—ensconced in an office with friends and family—the board represented the culmination of two years' work. Every number reported the fate of a candidate he had helped recruit, cultivate and had come to know.

Televisions were scattered throughout the DCCC offices and common areas. At 11:08, CNN's Wolf Blitzer intoned, "We can now project that the Democrats will be in the majority in the House of Representatives."

Emanuel seemed momentarily dazed, hugging his brother Zeke and kissing Amy. Six minutes later, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, looking jittery and happy, walked from the room where she had been watching the returns into Emanuel's office.

He roared, "Fellas—Madame speaker!" Pelosi and Emanuel hugged, rocking gently together for a few seconds. Brian Wolff, a staffer who worked for both Emanuel and Pelosi, called out, "Mission accomplished!"

At that moment, Sen. Barack Obama, who had campaigned relentlessly for House candidates, called to offer congratulations. "Barack," Pelosi said. "Thank you, thank you, thank you for all that you did." She walked back to her office muttering, "I gotta call my brother."

DOJ_NMG_0093139

As Pelosi made her way through the DCCC staffers, some applauded, then more joined in and everyone rose in a whooping standing ovation. "This is so much better than losing," a staffer said to no one in particular.

Emanuel walked out of his office into the ecstatic throng and hopped on a desk.

In a few minutes, in front of the cameras, he would strike a conciliatory note about his opponents, and in the days that followed he would stress how both parties needed to work together for what was best for the country.

But at that moment, Emanuel would not, could not censor his glee, or restrain his distaste for the defeated Republicans.

For weeks they had been boasting that their program for turning out voters in the campaign's final 72 hours would swamp all his work. The voters had made those statements look ridiculous.

"I'll tell you this," Emanuel shouted out to his staff. "The Republicans may have the 72-hour program. But they have not seen the 22-month program!

"Since my kids are gone, I can say it: They can go ---- themselves!"

Maybe You Did Vote Your Pocketbook (NYT)

By Daniel Altman

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SOMEWHERE, deep in the consciousness of American voters, is the idea that the representatives they send to Washington can affect their economic well-being. Candidates surely share this conviction. Otherwise, why would they bother to make promises about jobs, incomes and taxes?

It follows that if those representatives fail to bring economic benefits, they risk losing their own jobs. So politics affects economics, and vice versa — at least that's the widely held theory. But what was the reality in last week's election?

To paraphrase a Clinton-era mantra, it really might have been the economy, stupid. More than 80 percent of voters in an exit poll, conducted for The Associated Press and television networks by Edison Media Research/Mitofsky International, said the economy was a very important or extremely important issue. That percentage was the highest for any issue, including Iraq and terrorism.

Furthermore, electoral data and government economic statistics suggest that the economy played a role in the outcome: if your state wasn't among the best economic performers in the last six years, judged by the growth of personal income, it appears that you were three times as likely to vote to throw the bums out.

That's the conclusion from an early look at the figures, and it may even be true. But the actual relationships between politics and economics are hard to pin down empirically, and some experts may even theorize that they don't exist.

Plenty of economists would argue, for example, that your local representative doesn't really have much control over your economic well-being. In the long run, the nation's capacity to produce is controlled by factors like educational attainment and the development of new technologies — factors that are difficult to change in a short period.

Moreover, your representative can't do much, as an individual, to sway the world economy. The amount of your state's exports demanded by Europe, Japan and other economic giants relies on millions of other dynamics, even though your representative may take the occasional rainmaking trip abroad.

Then there is pork-barreling. As a member of the ruling party in Congress — the Republicans, in recent times — your representative might have been able to funnel federal construction money your way, or perhaps to add a few pet projects in your district to assorted spending bills. In addition, your representative might have contributed to writing big legislation, like tax cuts, so that it favored people like you.

Yet something like pork-barreling could have a measurable economic impact at the local level, even if its effects are dwarfed by those of globalization. And the data suggest that voting for Republicans in 2000 did help some states economically. In general, personal income rose faster from the end of 2000 through the second quarter this year in states that elected a higher share of Republicans to their House delegations. On average, states that elected no Republicans to the House could have expected nine percentage points less growth in personal income than states that elected all Republicans. The average state's income grew by 29 percent, so an additional nine points wouldn't have been anything to sneeze at. During that same six-year period, the states' economic experiences were hardly uniform. In rural states like Wyoming and South Dakota, for example, personal income rose by well over a third. In other states, like Michigan and Ohio, it grew less than a fifth. So there is a logical next question: Did voters hold their agenda-setting Republican representatives responsible for poor performance by voting them out?

It's easier to answer this question if you leave out the six states that didn't elect any Republicans in 2000; after all, they didn't have any to throw out. If you also remove New Hampshire and South Dakota, where the percentage of Republicans elected dropped to 0 from 100 — each state only has one seat in the House — a pattern starts to appear.

DOJ_NMG_0093140

It suggests that differences in economic performance could have had a big political impact, even though the overall changes to the delegations were small. In the 10 states where personal income grew the most, the Republican share of the states' House delegations dropped only 2 percent, on average. In the other 32 states, the Republican share fell an average of 7 percent.

None of this proves a correlation between economics and politics, or, for that matter, any causality. To be sure of any of these statistical relationships, you would have to adjust for anything else that might have affected the economy differentially across states from 2000 to 2006: things as diverse as changes in tax policy or demographic shifts. Then you could tell whether the correlations were robust. And it's by no means certain that they would be: looking at unemployment rates instead of personal income, it's tough to pick out any patterns in the raw data.

Still, both parties have a clear incentive to learn whether these relationships exist. Winners who figure out why they won stand a better chance of winning again; losers who know why they lost won't repeat the same mistakes.

Statistics or no, the Democrats already seem to be convinced. They have promised a raft of economic legislation during their first weeks in power, proposing to raise the minimum wage to $7.25, to cut the interest rate on student loans in half and to require any new spending to be paid for by cuts to other spending or new tax revenue.

Without a Democratic president, of course, it will be much harder to turn these bills into law. For that reason, voters might not hold the Democrats responsible for economic performance the way they apparently did with the Republicans. Then again, if personal income doesn't rise, they might blame the Democrats — and the statistics might just tell the tale.

How The Hammer Fell On His Own Party (HC)

By Bennett Roth, Michael Hedges

Houston Chronicle, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - The legacy of the once powerful Republican Tom DeLay of Sugar Land cast a long shadow over last week's elections, in which voters shrank the ranks of a party accused of being too partisan, too cozy with special interests and too fond of big spending.

As majority whip and later majority leader of the House, DeLay helped build a Republican political empire that he tried to make immune from erosion by pushing the 2003 Texas redistricting plan that threw several veteran House Democrats out of office.

For years the former pest exterminator ruled with an iron hand that brought his party legislative victories but also intensified the poisonous partisan mood in Washington.

DeLay's combative style indeed was one of the factors in turning the electorate away from the GOP, said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University.

"I don't think Tom DeLay as an individual was in the minds of many voters. But the election was very much a reaction to the kind of bare-knuckles politics he practiced," Baker said. "People thought this extreme, destructive partisanship had gone on long enough."

Conservatives, independent political observers and officials from both parties also said last week that the close ties between lobbyists and lawmakers that DeLay nurtured, and which led to the political scandal involving convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, cost Republicans some seats as Democrats took over the majority in the House and Senate.

Party principles

The decision by DeLay and others in the GOP leadership to boost federal funds for programs, thereby helping lawmakers get re-elected by benefiting many of their constituents, alienated fiscal conservatives. They felt the party had betrayed its principles of smaller government.

"When Tom and his bunch first ran, they campaigned against the cesspool in Washington. After a while they looked around and said, 'Hey, this isn't a cesspool, it's a hot tub,' " said seasoned conservative activist Richard Viguerie. (As a state lawmaker, DeLay was nicknamed "hot tub Tom" because of his penchant for enjoying the good life).

A CNN poll conducted Tuesday found that 42 percent of voters nationwide said that ethics was an extremely important factor in their vote.

DeLay did not return calls for comment for this article. In television appearances after the election last week, DeLay conceded that corruption had been an issue but dismissed the idea that voters had just rejected the type of government he advocated.

"I think the corruption issue was really important in about nine or ten different seats," he said on CNN. "Those of us and those Americans that want to win the war on terror, want fundamental tax reform, want to stop the culture of death, want to stop judicial activism, we're going to have to wait now until '08.

"This country is still right of center," he said. "There are more conservatives in this country than liberals."

DOJ_NMG_0093141

But Viguerie said DeLay was a symbol of the GOP abandoning its core principles, leaving some conservatives sitting out last week's election.

DeLay's leading role in lining up Republican votes for Bush's Medicare prescription-drug plan, a major new entitlement program, was a prime example of his betraying conservatives, Viguerie said.

District goes to Dems

Adding irony to injury, DeLay's Houston-area 22nd Congressional District seat was won Tuesday by a Democrat, Nick Lampson, who was turned out of office two years ago essentially because of the new DeLay-inspired election map that made more Texas districts lean Republican.

A major factor in Lampson's victory was that DeLay won the Republican primary this year, then quit Congress and declined to run in last week's general election, leaving the Republican Party unsuccessfully going to court to get a replacement candidate on the ballot. GOP write-in candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs' spirited campaign to become the first write-in contender in Texas history to win a congressional seat fell short.

Marshall Wittmann, a former Republican who works for the Democratic Leadership Council, a centrist Democratic group, said the election served as a referendum on DeLay's methods as a congressional leader.

"It was complete rejection of DeLay, from cronyism to corruption to ideological polarization," Wittmann said.

DeLay resigned last spring in part because of his indictment by a Texas grand jury on charges of violating state election law on campaign financing.

Even the Wall Street Journal's conservative editorial page said Friday that DeLay had undercut the 1994 Republican revolution spearheaded by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, whose stated goals were to make "government smaller and smarter."

"Somehow, over the years, that conviction was replaced by Tom DeLay and the quest for permanent incumbency," the editorial stated.

Ties to lobbyists

Viguerie criticized the so-called K Street Project, in which DeLay demanded Washington's big-business lobbyists, who have offices along that street, hire GOP staffers and contribute to Republican candidates in return for access to Congress.

"DeLay tied the Republican Party to the interests of corporate lobbyists," Viguerie said. "He changed the concept of small-government conservativism. He turned the focus from the interests of small businesses to big business."

DeLay, who has never been charged with wrongdoing over Abramoff, accompanied the lobbyist on several trips, including an expensive golf outing to Scotland.

Two former aides, Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon, were convicted for their roles in helping Abramoff, who lavished gifts and trips on lawmakers in return for legislative favors.

The federal probe of Abramoff's activities resulted in the conviction of GOP Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, whose seat was won by a Democrat. Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana, who had received major contributions from Abramoff and his clients, also lost his election. He was defeated by Democrat Jon Tester, who made ethics an issue in the campaign.

New strategy

In dissecting reasons for his party's losses, Ken Mehlman, outgoing Republican National Committee chairman, pointed to Congress' failure to adopt tougher rules on ethics and earmarks, the funding for special projects often inserted into spending bills by lawmakers at the behest of lobbyists.

"I think reform ought to be a big focus. Obviously you need to raise money to win in politics, but you should never, in exchange for raising money, change your principles or your policies," Mehlman said.

G.O.P. Collapse In Indiana Emblematic Of Larger Loss (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

EVANSVILLE, Ind., Nov. 10 — As he campaigned for re-election, the Republican who lost his seat in the House of Representatives here on Tuesday threw several incendiary barbs suggesting that the opposition was beyond the mainstream of these placid southern Indiana environs: “Homosexual agenda”; “San Francisco liberal Nancy Pelosi”; “New York liberal Charlie Rangel”; “Detroit liberal John Conyers.”

The attack backfired, and the Republican incumbent, John Hostettler, lost, as did two other incumbent Indiana Republicans in what proved to be a crucial state for Democrats in winning the House.

The mechanics of those defeats offer insights into the larger loss, and point to traps that Republican candidates appeared to have unwittingly entered: In all three cases, to demonstrate being a Washington insider was to court doom, no matter how much the incumbents railed against the ways of the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0093142

Nowhere was that dynamic more striking than in Evansville, an old industrial city on the Ohio River, with its stolid manufacturing plants at the edges and its seasoned red-brick neighborhoods downtown. Mr. Hostettler had fashioned a determinedly unconventional image for himself over 12 years, from his contrarian vote against the Iraq war to his claim that abortion and breast cancer were linked.

Mr. Hostettler was a principled "citizen legislator," a "Mr. Smith," his press secretary said, and when it came time to run for re-election in a district that President Bush won by 24 points in 2004, the congressman tried associating his Democrat opponent with the worst of Washington's taint, at least in conservative eyes.

"Eighth District voters are concerned about the homosexual agenda," Mr. Hostettler was quoted as saying. Ms. Pelosi was certain to "put in motion her radical plan to advance the homosexual agenda," a Hostettler radio advertisement said.

The flaw in that strategy was that Nancy Pelosi was hardly the household name on the banks of the Ohio that she was on the banks of the Potomac. Mr. Hostettler knew who she was, of course, but in Evansville and the little towns stretching up to Indianapolis, that was less of a sure bet, said Brad Ellsworth, the Democrat who beat Mr. Hostettler.

"The question I get the most is, 'Who is Nancy Pelosi?' " Mr. Ellsworth said. "People to this day don't know who Pelosi is."

In any case, he said, attacks on Ms. Pelosi "offended a lot of women in this area."

In the end, Mr. Hostettler ended up tarring only himself by demonstrating his superior knowledge of and close association with Washington. Mr. Ellsworth, by contrast, came across as the ultimate outsider: he appeared to struggle to remember whom he voted for in the 2004 presidential election, or whether he voted at all.

Mr. Ellsworth, 48, the easygoing sheriff of Vanderburgh County, was also nearly as conservative as his Republican opponent. He said he became a Democrat only because Republicans on the County Council voted against paying for bulletproof vests for sheriff's deputies in the early 1980s.

A similar chain of events unfolded elsewhere in Indiana.

East along the Ohio in the neighboring Ninth District, supporters of Representative Mike Sodrel, the freshman Republican who lost his race for re-election, routinely described him as a nonpolitician inured to Washington's ways.

"For most of us, we don't look at Mike as a politician, we look at him as a patriot," said Jan Whittenberg, the outreach director at Graceland Baptist Church in New Albany.

Yet the wealthy but down-home Mr. Sodrel, a self-made trucking magnate, was among the most assiduous of all House candidates in enlisting campaign support from Republican power brokers. President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Laura Bush and various cabinet members made repeated visits to Indiana on Mr. Sodrel's behalf — "essentially the entire Republican establishment," said Abby Curran, the campaign manager for the Democratic candidate, Baron Hill.

Mr. Sodrel's campaign came out with the usual Republican talking points, jabbing at Mr. Hill on gay rights, flag-burning and "Hoosier values." A billboard on Interstate 65 in southern Indiana proclaimed Mr. Hill's support for abortion, though Mr. Sodrel's campaign said it was paid for by a third-party group.

But as in the other race, Mr. Sodrel found it virtually impossible to outflank his conservative Democrat. Outside Graceland Baptist two days before the election, Stephen Baldwin, a Sodrel supporter, said of his candidate: "He's a member. He's no politician."

Yet the message conveyed by the cavalcade of Republican stars through southeastern Indiana was exactly the opposite.

"I think there was a perception out there, Who's going to be the Washington insider?" Mr. Hill said. "He created an impression that he was going to be beholden to all these people."

In the Second Congressional District, which contains northern industrial precincts, Representative Chris Chocola, a two-term Republican, saw his re-election bid fail under similar tactics. Mr. Bush made the district his first stop in a House race this election season, in February, and candidate and president formed a tight bond from the start.

"Chocola followed the Rovean line early on, to stick as close as possible to Bush," said Peri E. Arnold, a political science professor at Notre Dame, which is in the Second District, in a reference to Mr. Bush's adviser Karl Rove. "There was no effort to separate himself from Bush, and in this district he paid a significant price for that."

Katie Nee, the campaign manager for the winning Democrat, Joe Donnelly, put it this way: "There was just a general feeling that Washington was not working for the people in this district."

Days after the election, Republican operatives here continued to express bitterness and bewilderment at Tuesday's outcomes, insisting that the best men — the experienced ones — had not won. Yet of Indiana's three Democratic winners, the candidate with easily the biggest margin, Mr. Ellsworth, had the weakest ties to politics. Both of the other Democrats had run for elected office before (Mr. Hill, in fact, had served two terms in the House before he was defeated in 2004 by Mr. Sodrel).

But Mr. Ellsworth was such a novice that when Steny H. Hoyer, the House minority whip, called to recruit him to run, Mr. Ellsworth said he called Washington back and asked to speak with "Congressman Steny."

DOJ_NMG_0093143

Though national Democrats may have nudged Mr. Ellsworth into running, he insisted on a grass-roots, on-the-ground campaign up and down the district. “That’s the only way I knew how to run this thing,” he said. “Get out and meet people.”

His new constituents took note. Rick Wahl, a technician for Terminix pest control, finishing up a job at the First Avenue Diner here, did not vote for the incumbent and expressed gratitude at his demise.

“We’re the people who do the electing,” Mr. Wahl said. “He’s a servant of the people. And he seems to have forgotten who the people are.”

Rove Remains Steadfast In The Face Of Criticism (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

For a man still climbing out of the rubble, Karl Rove seemed in his usual unflappable mood. He roamed around his windowless West Wing office decorated with four Abraham Lincoln portraits, joking with his staff, stuffing copies of "The Iliad" and "The Odyssey" into his bag and signing the last paperwork of the day.

The Architect, as President Bush once called him, has a theory for why the building fell down. "Get me the one-pager!" he cried out to an aide, who promptly delivered a single sheet of paper that had been updated almost hourly since the midterm elections with a series of statistics explaining that the "thumping" Bush took was not such a thumping after all.

The theory is this: The building's infrastructure was actually quite sound. It was bad luck and seasonal shifts in the winds that blew out the walls -- complacent candidates, an ill-timed Mark Foley page scandal and the predictable cycles of history. But the foundation is fine: "The Republican philosophy is alive and well and likely to reemerge in the majority in 2008."

The rest of Washington might think Tuesday's elections were a repudiation of Rove's brand of politics, but Rove does not. For years, he has been the center of hyperbolic attention -- called the genius, the electoral mastermind, the most powerful presidential adviser in a century, Bush's brain, the master of the dark arts of wedge politics, the Republican Moses leading conservatives out of the desert.

The mythology grew to such an outsized degree that when Rove insisted again and again during the campaign that Republicans would win despite the odds, fearful Democrats convinced themselves that he must have known something they did not and waited for an October surprise to spring. Rove encouraged that with supreme confidence. "You are entitled to your math, and I'm entitled to the math," he told a National Public Radio interviewer who suggested Democrats might win.

It turns out that Rove is mortal after all, and not always so good at math. And his critics are crowing. If he tuned in to CNN or NPR last week, here's a sampling of what he would have heard about himself.

Richard Viguerie, the conservative direct-mail pioneer: "Clearly a loss for George Bush, Karl Rove."

Andrew Sullivan, the conservative writer: "Shows him not to be a genius, but to be a real failure as a political strategist."

Bill Maher, the political satirist: "Karl Rove has led this Republican Party down a hole."

David Gergen, ex-presidential adviser: "He went off to hardliners, and that left an awful lot of moderates . . . feeling alienated."

Even Bush seemed to be jabbing at Rove in the aftermath of the elections, which handed Congress back to the Democrats. At a news conference Wednesday, Bush was asked about his ongoing book-reading contest with Rove. "I'm losing," Bush said tartly. "I obviously was working harder in the campaign that he was."

But those who interpret that as anything more than an affectionate, if edgy, dig misunderstand the president's sense of humor and his relationship with his chief strategist, according to officials. Bush likes to needle Rove, even nicknaming him "Turd Blossom," but aides said he does not blame his adviser for the loss, and few believe Rove will lose his job. Instead, he will turn to figuring out a policy and political agenda that can salvage the last two years of the Bush presidency.

"From everything that I've heard, Karl will be around till the end," said Michael J. Gerson, a former White House adviser. "The reason is simple: People who view him as a campaign operative whose usefulness ends when the last vote is counted are wrong."

Asked about his plans, Rove fell back on his standard line: "I serve at the pleasure of the president with the agreement of my wife."

Allies argued that without Rove, the losses would have been worse. "He deserves a good bit of credit for victories and probably he would admit he should take a little blame for the failure," said Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.). "That does not make him any less of a strategic thinker because he had a loss. If I was taking advice outside of the box from anyone, he would probably be the first person I call."

Mary Matalin, an adviser to Vice President Cheney, said Rove is still "the Zen master of movement politics" but envious rivals are eager to gloat over a single defeat. "Karl has done a lot of things that he had to do that were necessary, and if you've been around that long you make enemies," she said. "They used to call it the green-eyed monster. It's the nature of the town."

DOJ_NMG_0093144

Rove's brand of politics aims to sharpen differences with the opposition, energize the conservative base and micro-target voters to pick off selected parts of the other side's constituency. As he has in past elections, Rove designed a strategy to paint Democrats as weak on national security and terrorism, the "party of cut and run."

In an expansive interview last week, Rove said that strategy was working until the House page sex scandal involving ex-representative Foley (R-Fla.) put the Republican campaign "back on its heels," as he put it. "We were on a roll, and it stopped it," he said. "It revived all the stuff about Abramoff and added to it."

The various scandals surrounding convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and other ethics allegations, Rove said, had as much, if not more, to do with the defeat than the Iraq war. In Rove's analysis, 10 of the 28 House seats Republicans lost were sacrificed because of various scandals. Another six, he said, were lost because incumbents did not recognize and react quickly enough to the threat. That leaves 12 other seats lost, fewer than the 15 that Democrats needed to capture the House. So without corruption and complacency, he argued, Republicans could have kept control regardless of Bush's troubles and the war.

"It plays some role, but if Iraq is the determining factor and it is a dominant opinion, then in a blue state like Connecticut you should not have 60 percent of the voters vote for one of the candidates who said, 'Stay, fight and win,' " Rove said, referring to Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman's victory as an independent. "I don't deny that it's a factor, but it is hard to declare" that it is the overriding factor.

The "one-pager" outlines why, in his view, the losses were not particularly extraordinary and therefore not a repudiation of Bush: The loss of 28 House seats and six Senate seats is roughly comparable to losses suffered by the party in the White House in the sixth year of other presidencies and the same as the average wartime midterm. Moreover, it says, 23 races were decided by two percentage points or less, and it credits the "GOP Ground Game," the Rove-devised turnout machine. Overall, a shift of 77,611 votes would have kept the House in Republican hands.

Others point to different statistics -- voters nearly 2 to 1 casting ballots to express opposition to Bush; one in five conservatives voting for Democrats; fewer Hispanics, Catholics and evangelicals supporting Republicans; most voters favoring withdrawal of some or all U.S. troops from Iraq. Some dismiss Rove's historical comparisons as a rationalization for failure, especially since the gerrymandering of House districts has made it harder to oust incumbents than in past midterms.

Without referencing Rove specifically, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman called it a mistake to compare last week's defeat to past trends. "If we simply say there were historical problems we could not overcome, and that we did not have a chance to win, then we have a real problem," said Mehlman, a Rove protege. If Republicans recommit themselves to reform and smaller government, this election will be a "brief interruption in a generational effort to build a center-right majority.

Rove seconds that last thought and believes his turnout campaign actually beat the odds of history, ticking off a dozen races that were supposed to be closer. "What happened in all those? It may have been that the tactical work done by the White House, the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee had a big impact."

The lesson, he added, is that "if you're not complacent and you're prepared and you are driving and have a good game," you can win even in a tough political year. And so now it's back to the drawing board for the Architect.

Holding To The Center, Losing My Seat (NYT)

By Lincoln D. Chafee

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

LAST Tuesday, I was one of the many moderate Republican casualties of the anti-Bush virulence that swept the country. Despite my having voted against the Iraq war resolution, my reputation for independence, the editorial endorsement of virtually every newspaper in my state, and a job approval rating of 63 percent, I did not win. Why?

Back in December 2000, after one of the closest elections in our nation's history, Vice President-elect Dick Cheney was the guest at a weekly lunch meeting of a small group of centrist Republicans. Senators Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine, Senator Jim Jeffords of Vermont, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and I were honored to have the opportunity to visit with him on the eve of a session of Congress in which, because of Republican defeats, the Senate would be evenly divided at 50-50.

As we sat in Senator Specter's cozy hideaway office and discussed the coming session, I was startled to hear the vice president dismiss suggestions of compromise and instead emphasize an aggressively partisan agenda that included significant tax cuts, the abandonment of international agreements and a muscular, unilateral foreign policy.

I was incredulous. Instead of a new atmosphere of cooperation and civility which, after all, had been the promise of the Bush-Cheney campaign, we seemed ready to return to the poisonous partisanship that marked the Republican-Congress — Clinton White House years.

In response to the vice president's comments I quickly sent him a letter to reinforce the views I expressed at the lunch. Excerpts follow:

As a follow-up to our meeting, I would like to pose a few thoughts.

DOJ_NMG_0093145

In my view, one of the most popular refrains expressed by Governor Bush during the presidential campaign was, “I am a uniter, not a divider.” I believe moderate Republicans can help the new administration develop a unifying agenda in the next session of Congress.

We are on an encouraging course toward reducing the national debt, and I believe we must maintain discipline both in discretionary spending and in proposals for significant tax cuts. This time of continued relative prosperity and peace is an extremely important opportunity for our country to stay on a firm pathway toward elimination of the debt.

Majorities from both parties in Congress expressed support in the past year for reform of the estate tax and repeal of the so-called marriage tax penalty. This appears to be an area of great promise for early bipartisan cooperation.

Progress on environmental issues could do much to enhance the new administration’s program. I hope the new administration will be open to proposals to reduce the country’s reliance on foreign oil through energy conservation and greater investments in mass transit.

I hope we can work together to resolve some of the controversial subjects that Democrats exploited during the campaign. If we could take such issues off the table in the early part of the new administration, I believe it would strengthen public support for the work ahead.

Obviously, my suggestions were not heeded. Our country faces daunting challenges. I believe my letter of six years ago is worth reviewing as the administration prepares for its last two years in office and as Republicans contemplate the direction our party will head in the future.

Do I have any regrets about Tuesday’s outcome? Yes. I regret that I will not be able to participate in the difficult, but critical, healing process that must take place in our government if Democrats and Republicans are going to solve the serious problems facing this great nation.

I hope the new Congress and the administration that received, in the president’s words, “a thumping,” can find common ground for the common good.

Webb May Be Senate Maverick (WP)

By Tim Craig, Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

James Webb walked into the Fish Market restaurant in Alexandria in December and wanted longtime Democratic strategist Steve Jarding to answer just one question: What were his chances of defeating Sen. George Allen (R), one of Virginia's most popular politicians?

"Give me a number. What are my odds?" Webb, who had never run for elective office, asked.

"I said, 'Jim, they are really low,' " Jarding recalled. Webb shot back, "Give me a number."

After Jarding said "15 percent," Webb confidently said, "If I have that much of a chance, I will take it and win."

Webb's long shot paid off last week as he unseated Allen after a bruising campaign, giving Democrats control of the Senate.

With the campaign having centered on Allen's gaffes as much as it did on Webb's views on issues, few know what to expect when the former Marine and novelist enters the nation's most exclusive club, where the art of the deal rules the day.

But Webb, a former Republican and Reagan administration official, said he might be a bit of a maverick in the Senate, which could frustrate Democratic leaders who poured more than $6 million into his campaign.

"I have my own views, and I have a lot of experiences, and I think I can bring the experiences I had to issues rather than having to read off a party briefing sheet," Webb said Friday in an interview.

Webb said he will model himself after former New York senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D), whom he described as someone "who had government experience that was shaped by the intellectual world."

But being a senator can be as much about politics as policy, and Webb on the campaign trail was almost the antithesis of the typical politician.

Webb was nervous in front of large crowds, couldn't understand why people wanted to shake his hand and hated asking people for money. He even turned down checks from people he didn't think could afford to give up, as he called it, "their gas money."

Until a few months ago, he would walk down the center of the street during a parade instead of zigzagging the route to shake hands. When he got tired, he refused to make fundraising calls or he took time off. That's what he did when he decided not to visit churches the Sunday before the election.

But for at least the next six years, Webb will have to be the politician and deal-maker that he never was during the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0093146

His life might become filled with ribbon-cuttings, Rotary Club dinners and town hall meetings. In Washington, the lobbyists and corporate executives he railed against during the campaign will be vying for his attention around the clock.

"He was the ultimate outside candidate," said Mark Rozell, a politics professor at George Mason University. "The trouble is, an outsider can run successful campaigns running against Washington, running against incumbents, but once elected they have to learn the task of government and taking responsibility of governing."

"Not only does he lack legislative experience, he lacks any electoral experience," Rozell said. "I think everyone will say his victory is an anti-Allen vote."

Webb's record in Washington was mixed, and he developed a reputation for being abrasive and difficult to get along with. He quit as secretary of the Navy during the Reagan administration because he objected to congressional efforts to cut the Navy's budget.

But those who know him say Webb should fit in well on Capitol Hill, where he worked as a staffer during the 1970s.

"My perspective is Jim will be a much better and happier senator than senatorial candidate," said former Virginia lieutenant governor Donald S. Beyer Jr. (D). "I don't think he is a natural candidate, but he is very bright, strong-principled and apparently fearless. I think he can be a very strong voice in the Senate. He will be very comfortable working with 99 other senators to solve problems."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said Webb has "a keen intellect" and will do fine in the Senate, once he understands its frustrations.

"It will test his patience, as it does all of us," said Davis, who has known Webb since the two coached Little League games together in Fairfax County.

Webb, an early opponent of the war in Iraq, might make his mark in the Senate in foreign and military affairs. Current and former politicians said they expect him to become the face of the Democratic Party's antiwar movement.

"It will make him a very important person," said former Nebraska senator Bob Kerrey (D), who had urged Webb to run. "If the question is how you structure our military for the future, he is going to come with a lot of knowledge."

Kerrey said Webb will become a magnet for senators who want him to co-sponsor their foreign-policy bills to give them credibility.

A Vietnam War hero, Webb can also be expected to take the lead on veterans issues. He will be representing a state that has among the highest percentage of veterans in the nation.

He said he immediately wants to introduce bills to give tax breaks to soldiers and educational assistance to veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, similar to the World War II-era GI Bill.

As a former Republican, Webb will become a swing voter and play a role similar to that of his Senate buddies Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.). Webb, Hagel and McCain, as well as Virginia Sen. John W. Warner (R), could form an important voting bloc on issues related to foreign policy, political analysts say.

Webb, however, said it would be unfair to cast him as solely a foreign policy wonk. Despite conventional wisdom that he abandoned the Republican Party because of the Iraq war, Webb said economic issues are what drove him to the Democrats.

On the campaign trail, Webb talked about the "three Americas" -- rich, poor and middle-class -- and how society was breaking down over "class lines." Webb, who vows to never change what he believes for a "dollar or a vote," said he wants to close corporate tax loopholes and pay closer attention to escalating salaries for chief executives.

Webb also has an affinity for the labor movement, even though Virginia is a right-to-work state. He plans to push to raise the minimum wage and said that "organized labor is very important because everyone needs an agent."

Webb might also try to steer federal dollars into southwest Virginia, where his ancestors settled. Speaking to coal miners last weekend in Grundy, Webb said, "You have given your loyalty, and you will have my loyalty, and I will work to bring fairness back to the economic system."

Voters also should prepare for Webb's libertarian views on such issues as his support for abortion and gun rights and concern about some of President Bush's tactics in the war on terrorism, including the domestic wiretapping program.

"Government does not belong in people's private lives unless there is a compelling reason," Webb said.

Despite a desire to be portrayed as independent, Webb plans to become engaged with the state's Democratic Party. He said he plans to start helping Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) with his effort to elect more Democrats to the General Assembly next year.

"I want to do what I can to bring people back into the party," Webb said.

Del. L. Scott Lingamfelter (R-Prince William) said it would be a mistake for Webb to conclude that his victory Tuesday was a mandate.

"If he goes in tooting in there and jumps on the Hillary Clinton agenda, he'll be a one-term senator," Lingamfelter said. "Virginians won't take it."

DOJ_NMG_0093147

Webb said he understands that he beat Allen by less than 10,000 votes and that, in fact, he might not have won if Allen had not made a last-minute attack on sex-laced passages in his novels.

Allen's attack, 10 days before the election, appeared to take a toll on Webb's staffers, who began doing yoga in the hallways of his campaign headquarters to calm their nerves. But Webb said the accusations, which appeared on the Drudge Report Web site and then in newspapers and on television, backfired.

"I got 170,000 hits on my Web site in 24 hours," Webb said. "That is when I said, 'I think I am going to win.' "

I Am Macaca (WP)

By S.R. Sidarth

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

This past summer, between my third and fourth year of college, I decided to volunteer for the campaign of Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb in my home state of Virginia. For most of the summer, I worked behind the scenes at the campaign headquarters in Arlington, helping set up field offices statewide and performing other odd jobs. In the second week of August, I was dispatched by the campaign to serve as Republican Sen. George Allen's tracker on a "listening tour" across the state. Tracking was a rather solitary pursuit; I videotaped Allen's public appearances whenever I was admitted into an event and killed time between stops in places I had never been to before.

Then, on Aug. 11, my experience took a strange -- and now famous -- turn. On that day in Breaks Interstate Park, located on the Kentucky border, Allen acknowledged my presence for the first time in one of his stump speeches. I was singled out at a GOP picnic, identified as "macaca or whatever his name is" -- despite the fact that Allen knew my name, as we had been traveling the same route for five days -- and then "welcome[d] to America and the real world of Virginia."

Allen's actions that day stood out because they were not representative of how I was treated while traveling around the state. Everywhere I went, though I was identifiably working on behalf of Allen's opponent, people treated me with dignity, respect and kindness. I cannot recall one event where food was served and I was not invited to join in the meal. In southwest Virginia, hospitality toward me was at a high point.

The night before the incident in Breaks, I stayed at the home of Jewel Jones, Webb's aunt, in Gate City on the Tennessee border. I was treated like family even though I was a guest for only half a day, and I received a grand tour of the area where Webb's ancestors have lived for more than a century. The following day, at the picnic in Breaks, even after Allen's comments highlighted my outsider status, I was not allowed to depart without eating, because as one woman put it, "Political differences are set aside at the dinner table." In the same spirit, I was given accurate directions to Allen's next event, held in Bluefield the following morning.

After Allen's remarks, my heritage suddenly became a matter of widespread interest. I am proud to be a second-generation Indian American and a practicing Hindu. My parents were born and raised in India and immigrated here more than 25 years ago; I have known no home other than Northern Virginia. The hairstyle inflicted upon me by two friends late one night also became newsworthy; for the record, it was intended to be a mullet and has since grown out to nearly the appropriate length.

The larger question that this experience brings up is: How far has society progressed on the issues of race and openness? By 2050, according to most projections, the United States will be a minority-majority nation. But the fact that Allen believed I was an immigrant, when in fact I am a native Virginian, underlines the problems our society still faces.

Then again, Webb's victory last week gives me hope that Virginia will not tolerate playing the race card. It is still hard for me to accept that I could have had a pivotal role in the election results; I would not wish the scrutiny I received on anyone. But I am also glad to have helped Webb. Every little bit counted, especially in an election decided by about 9,000 votes out of nearly 2.4 million cast.

The politics of division just don't work anymore. Nothing made me happier on election night than finding out the results from Dickenson County, where Allen and I had our encounter. Webb won there, in what I can only hope was a vote to deal the race card out of American politics once and for all.

A Survivor Reflects On Political Casualties, And Real Ones (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

Bridgeport, Conn.

Sitting in the sun on the balcony of his house overlooking the Long Island Sound on Thursday, Representative Christopher Shays rubbed his eyes, rubbed his temples, jumped up to take a congratulatory call from Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, and plopped back wearily into a white plastic chair.

Like the only survivor of a hotel fire, he was a little hesitant to draw too many conclusions but glad he was alive.

DOJ_NMG_0093148

"I'm only two days into this," said Mr. Shays, after narrowly beating Diane G. Farrell to keep the seat in Congress he has held since 1987. "The first day you try to get your sleep. The second day you try to think about what happened to your friends."

Many of them were the Republicans who were washed out to sea in the Democratic tide. Mr. Shays was one of the few Republicans among perhaps two dozen seen as vulnerable back in September who managed to survive. He was the only one of the three Republican incumbents from Connecticut who won re-election. When he went to Congress, he was one of nine Republican representatives from the six New England states. In the next Congress, he will be the only one.

And he won the race the hard way. He had a highly regarded, well-funded opponent. He supported the war in Iraq, if not the way it was executed. He agreed to take part in 11 debates. He did not run negative ads. He lost most of the key newspaper endorsements. His district, the Fourth, was solidly antiwar.

Some things you can learn from a guy who bucked the tide and won. Some you can't. Mr. Shays no doubt benefited from his reputation for being an effective congressman and for a maverick's image going back to the State Legislature in the mid-1980s. He has burnished that image in Congress ever since he got there.

He showed up at every campaign event with a 54-page booklet of positions, votes, achievements and federal spending in the district — not sexy but informative. He was able to convince people, in a way that the state's two other Republicans, Nancy L. Johnson and Rob Simmons, were not, that if they wanted change, he was still enough of an outsider to offer it. He ran without apology on the war, saying it was a noble effort that had been botched but could still be saved. And he rejected the notion of a consultant-driven, cookie-cutter campaign with the requisite attack ads. He ran the campaign his way, and he made it work.

"By being willing to lose the election, I won the election," Mr. Shays said. "Because from the start I was willing to lose rather than to win the wrong way. And I think of some of my colleagues that have lost around the country, and I think, boy, I would never want to go out that way."

Of course, one voter's maverick may be one colleague's grandstanding egotist. It's likely that some of Mr. Shays's fellow party members were more eager to keep his seat Republican than to see the guy sitting in it be re-elected. But he figures that if ever the party needs in-house critics, it's now.

"We lost our moral authority to lead," he said. "Power in and of itself does not justify holding power."

He said that when the party looked the other way at its ethical failings over the years, it was ambling toward disaster that finally arrived in the House page scandal.

"As soon as Foley came up, I knew it. You could feel it. I said, 'We're dead.' "

BUT, of course, there were casualties that mattered a lot more than the election ones.

"I don't know how you'll react to this, but I also want to say this," he said on Tuesday night in his victory speech, interrupting the election night ritualistic hoopla with a jolt of reality. He read four names: "Wilfredo Perez. Tyanna Avery-Felder. Jack Dempsey. Nicholas Maderas. I sent them to Iraq, and they came home draped in American flags.

"I think about them almost every day of my life. And when the press talked about how tormented I must feel," he said, referring to the possibility of losing the election, "they just didn't get it. They just didn't get it. The only torment I feel is for those families. And I pray that we can make it right for these families, and that we will find a way to have our men and women come home from success not failure, but that we find a way to bring them home."

No one who knows him doubts his sincerity. But no one knows better than Mr. Shays that good intentions can be trumped by bad results. He knows in the end he will be judged more on what happens in the war fought by Specialist Perez, Specialist Avery-Felder, Corporal Dempsey and Private Maderas than on whether he ran a perfect race and held off Ms. Farrell, withstood the raging tides and kept his seat two more years.

New Democratic Majority Throws Bush's Judicial Nominations Into Uncertainty (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11 — The impending Democratic takeover of the Senate, lawmakers and administration officials agree, will produce a vast change in an area that has produced some of the sharpest partisan battles in recent years: President Bush's effort to shape the federal bench with conservative judicial nominees.

There is a strong consensus that the four most conservative of Mr. Bush's nominations to the federal appeals courts are doomed. Republicans and Democrats say the four have no chance of confirmation in the next several weeks of the lame-duck Congressional session or in the final two years of Mr. Bush's term.

The nominees are William J. Haynes II, the Pentagon's chief lawyer who was responsible for the much-criticized military interrogation policies; William G. Myers III, a longtime lobbyist for the mining and ranching industries and a critic of environmental regulations; Terrence W. Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina; and Michael B. Wallace of Mississippi, a lawyer who was rated unqualified for the court by the American Bar Association.

DOJ_NMG_0093149

For the past six years, the relationship between Senate Democrats and Mr. Bush has been marked by unremitting rancor and suspicion. The Constitution gives the Senate the power to confirm or decline a president's judicial choices; although Senate Democrats were in the minority for much of Mr. Bush's term, they took the unusual step of waging filibusters to block several of the president's nominees who they said were too conservative.

With that foundation of hostility, there is deep uncertainty now as to how Mr. Bush and the Democratic Senate will deal with each other come January.

Some Democrats say that how Mr. Bush handles judicial nominations will provide an early test of his pledge to compromise and de-emphasize partisanship. It will be significant, they say, whether he chooses to renominate his four most conservative choices in the next Congress, hoping for political reasons to paint Democrats as obstructionist, or instead drops them as hopeless and tries to reach compromises.

Ronald A. Klain, a former Democratic chief counsel for the Judiciary Committee and the White House counsel in charge of judicial nominations for President Bill Clinton, said Mr. Bush and the Republicans faced a decision with important implications.

"The Bush administration has played the game of judicial selection very hard and very far to the right for the past six years with little moderation," Mr. Klain said. "They have to make a fundamental decision now as to how they want to deal with this. Do they move to the center or stay true to the right?"

A senior Democratic strategist in the Senate said his party was eager to see which direction Mr. Bush chose on judicial nominations.

"Those guys in the White House have governed unilaterally for six years," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity as is customary among Congressional staff. "It's been their way or no way, show no quarter."

"Does he pivot and become like he was as Texas governor and work with both sides of the aisle," the official said, "or does he send up these guys again and set us up for hard votes and call the Democrats obstructionist?"

That had been a political tenet of the White House. The administration had a no-lose situation in naming staunch conservatives to the bench: their choices would either be confirmed or their defeat would provide a strong campaign issue.

The chief Republican proponent of underlining Democratic opposition to Mr. Bush's judicial choices was Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania. Mr. Santorum, as a Republican leader, once staged a round-the-clock "anti-filibuster" in 2003 in which the Senate was kept in continual session for 40 hours over two nights. Mr. Santorum was defeated in his re-election bid this week.

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said this week that he thought Democrats were overreaching in viewing Mr. Bush's actions as a test.

"The last time I read the Constitution, the president has the power to nominate whomever he wants," Mr. Specter said. "The Democrats don't have to vote for those people, but I don't see it as a sign of truculence or defiance if he nominates people they won't vote for."

Mr. Specter said he hoped to move forward on other Bush nominees who were less controversial than those four. He said Peter M. Keisler, a senior Justice Department lawyer nominated to a seat on the appeals court in Washington, should be considered quickly.

"I don't know of any substantive objection to his nomination," Mr. Specter said. "It's not good public policy to hold someone up without cause."

David A. Yalof, a political science professor at the University of Connecticut and an authority on judicial selection, said the larger political objective for the Democrats might have little to do with individual assessments of the Bush nominees.

In the last two years of a presidency, Professor Yalof said, "The priority for the party not in control of the White House is not so much in stopping candidates based on their ideologies, but keeping as many vacancies open as possible on the theory that the next president may be someone of your party and will be able to fill those slots."

If the Democrats follow that model, he said, they will be following the playbook of the Republicans, who blocked most of Mr. Clinton's appeals court nominees in his last two years in office.

Carmakers' Agenda For Bush: Hear Our Pain (FREEP)

By Justin Hyde

Detroit Free Press, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- When the heads of Detroit's automakers finally take their seats at the White House on Tuesday across from President George W. Bush, their concerns will boil down to the old Aretha Franklin song: R-E-S-P-E-C-T.

From the rising cost of retiree health care to the advantages a weak yen gives the Japanese, the Detroit automakers will press for more recognition for their issues, something industry executives say has been lacking from the president. They'll also attempt to draw distinctions between themselves and the foreign automakers whose U.S. branches generate record profits.

DOJ_NMG_0093150

But they will make clear that their concerns do not add up to another seven-letter word: B-A-I-L-O-U-T.

The meeting should "enhance the president's understanding of the importance of the domestic auto industry to the economic health of the United States," General Motors Vice Chairman Bob Lutz said in a recent interview, emphasizing the word "domestic."

Foreign automakers that build cars in the United States help the economy, "but it's not the same as a fully integrated American auto company that retains the intellectual property in the United States, has primarily American shareholders," he said, so "the wealth gets reinvested in the U.S."

Ford Chief Executive Alan Mulally said Friday of the meeting with Bush: "What I'm looking forward to is just sharing with him the state of our industry and also talking about competitiveness going forward."

All sides expect no firm commitments from the scheduled 45-minute session in the Roosevelt Room, which will include Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that Bush planned to use the meeting to "reaffirm his support for the American auto industry, and his support for its growth and success." Snow said Bush also will thank them for their progress on flexible-fuel and hybrid vehicles.

Whether or not GM Chairman Rick Wagoner, Mulally and Chrysler Group Chief Executive Tom LaSorda can get their points across to Bush, the industry does have a louder voice in Washington thanks to the rise of its most ardent backers in a Congress that, after Tuesday's election, will be controlled by Democrats.

"I hope this meeting produces some evidence that this administration finally understands the needs of the American auto industry to be treated fairly in the world marketplace," said U.S. Rep. John Dingell, a Dearborn Democrat who is pegged to reclaim the chairmanship of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which handles many issues important to the auto industry.

Added Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich.: "We need a government that's a partner with the auto industry and manufacturing sector. Our companies do not compete with foreign companies. They compete with foreign governments."

While congressional Democrats had pushed several pieces of legislation that would help the industry, their prospects are questionable, as the party's leaders and Bush have yet to discuss their priorities in depth.

Here are the three topics that will dominate Tuesday's meeting, and the outlook for each.

Health care: Perhaps the single greatest threat to the automakers' finances, health care adds $900 to $1,400 to the cost of every vehicle GM, Ford and Chrysler make. All three spend more on health care than on steel, and GM's estimated costs for future retiree health-care benefits could wipe out the shareholder equity on its balance sheet later this year because of an accounting rule change.

Despite the gravity of the health-care issue, there's been little movement in Washington toward major health-care reform. The health-care bill closest to passing Congress aims to lower costs by setting standards for computer systems, benefits that would mainly control the rate of inflation years from now.

Democratic leaders have pledged to rework part of the Medicare drug plan benefit to allow the government to negotiate drug prices and close the so-called doughnut hole, the gap in coverage when seniors spend between $2,250 and $5,100 a year on prescription drugs.

Sean McAlinden, chief economist for the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, said such a move could save GM alone "hundreds of millions of dollars a year" by providing drugs that GM pays for today. But most observers expect Bush would veto major alterations to the Medicare plan, and closing the hole would require $200 billion over 10 years -- more than might be saved through price negotiations.

Dingell said that while broad reforms would be difficult, even changes that worked around the edges of the problem could benefit metro Detroit.

Trade and currency: A chronic complaint of the domestic automakers -- the unfair advantage of a weak Japanese yen -- has grown in Detroit's executive suites as Toyota, Honda and Nissan rack up impressive profits.

The automakers contend that Japan artificially suppresses the value of its yen, making imported goods from Japan cheaper and boosting the profits exported from American customers. The automakers might press hard on currency issues because Bush is scheduled to meet with Japan Prime Minister Shinzo Abe on Saturday during his visit to Vietnam.

Energy: "Energy independence" was the one Washington buzz phrase shared across party lines before the election, and will only gain momentum with the Democrats' elevation in Congress.

The Detroit automakers pledged earlier this year to double the number of vehicles they build annually that can run on 85% ethanol fuel, and have pushed for more incentives to spread E85 fueling stations.

Bush has proposed revising fuel economy standards for passenger cars, which the industry hasn't opposed, but has not supported the kind of higher standards many Democrats back.

DOJ_NMG_0093151

One type of proposal that could gain momentum would be some sort of industry Marshall Plan, which would give Detroit automakers help with their benefit costs in return for increased spending on new fuel-efficient technologies such as plug-in hybrids.

Some lawmakers also have called for large boosts in the federal research spending on new vehicle technology such as fuel cells, which could allow automakers to do less of the heavy lifting in that type of research themselves.

"That money they must spend on these things now comes from the bottom line," McAlinden said. "The money not used from the bottom line could be released for more prosaic product development."

The trouble for Detroit in pushing for these issues is that the automakers' concerns contradict Bush's portrayal of a vigorous U.S. manufacturing sector and a healthy national economy.

Those concerns might fall on deaf ears in Washington, where many see the domestic companies' troubles as self-inflicted rather than structural. Bush himself said last month that the automakers' accumulated health-care and retirement promises to their workers were their burden, not the government's.

"The U.S. remains a competitive place to make cars and many components, but GM and Ford labor under a $2,500 cost disadvantage thanks to clumsy management and unrealistic labor contracts," said Peter Morici, a business professor at the University of Maryland.

Consider last month's jobs report. While most measures of manufacturing output have remained strong, manufacturing jobs shrank again, accounting for the lowest share of employed workers in modern times. Part of that decline came from lost jobs in auto factories, where employment hit a 14-year-low as thousands of workers took buyouts or early retirement from GM and Delphi Corp.

Ed Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, said the decline in manufacturing jobs over the past couple of years was a result of more productive factories and that jobs lost in manufacturing were being replaced with higher-wage work in other industries.

"One of the things this economy seems to be best at is figuring out ways to produce more output with fewer resources," Lazear said. "That's a good thing because what it means is that we can release labor to work in other sectors and to be more productive in other sectors."

Bush last met with the heads of Detroit's automakers in Dearborn in 2003, as he canvassed the country to build support for his tax-cut package, which all three of the companies' then-CEOs pledged to support.

The last White House meeting with Detroit's Big Three was in 1997, when auto and union executives warned President Bill Clinton that the Kyoto greenhouse gas reduction treaty could hurt their business. Clinton also chatted with CEOs during a 2000 visit to the Detroit auto show.

None of those events carried the anticipation of this meeting, because most of the automakers were healthy at those earlier meetings. But with roughly 70,000 jobs being cut by GM and Ford, and the German-owned Chrysler Group losing money, the political pressures have risen exponentially.

With Dems In Power, Part D Could Get A Makeover (PPG)

By Bruce Japsen, Chicago Tribune

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 12, 2006

CHICAGO -- The Democratic landslide in last week's midterm elections raises the specter of federal regulation of drug prices via changes to Medicare's new prescription drug benefit -- a move that could lower costs for seniors and squeeze pharmaceutical and health insurance industry profits.

With Democrats in control of both houses of Congress, they are almost certain to seek passage of price control measures in that legislative body. And there are enough Republicans who supported price-control measures in the past that bills will gain momentum next year, analysts say, meaning members of Congress who vote against them will feel the wrath of seniors in the 2008 election.

Shares of most major drug makers and health insurers fell last week on concerns over tougher regulations on prescriptions. Democrats have said many of these firms have reaped huge sales and profits from the new drug benefit -- money that could have been passed on to taxpayers in terms of savings or seniors in terms of richer drug benefits.

The law creating the Medicare Part D drug benefit, added in 2003, did not allow the Medicare program to negotiate prices directly with manufacturers, as the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs does. The VA is known for winning price concessions from drug companies from direct negotiations.

Not only did Democrats favor such direct negotiations, but some influential Republican senators such as presidential aspirant John McCain of Arizona also supported the idea. Mr. McCain could be a critical vote for the new but ultraslim Democratic majority in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0093152

A nonpartisan study has shown costs are more than 10 percent higher by having private insurers involved in the benefit coverage rather than having the government administer the program on its own.

"The Democratic Party's takeover ... shifts the policy landscape for health-care providers," Kemp Dolliver, analyst with investment bank Cowen & Co., wrote in a report Wednesday. "The Democrats will put Medicare Part D 'in play' by proposing removal of the clause of the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003 that prohibits the federal government from negotiating drug prices directly with manufacturers."

Not to be underestimated, however, is the clout of the pharmaceutical industry, which contributes heavily to campaigns of both parties. And President Bush, a Republican, would have the authority to veto any legislation while his appointees, who run the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, can "drag their heels" on implementing provisions for negotiating directly with drug makers, Mr. Dolliver said.

At the very least, however, Democrats have won power to hold hearings about the profits that drug makers, health insurers and pharmacy benefit firms have made since the Medicare benefit became widely available to seniors this year, analysts predict.

These Democrats say insurers, pharmacy benefit managers and drugstores have the ability to pass along more savings, and bills already are being pushed to foster more transparency in price negotiations. Analysts also have mentioned Walgreen Co. as a potential congressional probe target because generics are popular with seniors and drugstores mark up prices of generics.

But the health-care industry argues that the private sector does get good prices because dozens of health plans and pharmacy benefit firms are able to play the drug makers off of one another in a free market system for better prices. These companies also say consumers have more choices because dozens of private health plans offer the drug benefit, which allows for more choice and creates price competition among the various benefit plans.

"This is the first time in history of passage of any government program where the actual costs were less than the estimates at the time of passage," said Karen Ignagni, chief executive officer of America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade group and lobby. "The government is benefiting because the costs are lower and beneficiaries are benefiting because [monthly] premiums were projected to be $38 a month and now they are $24 on average."

The drug industry also argues that regulating drug prices would hurt consumers and patients because it would harm drug makers' budgets for research and development. Pharmaceutical companies also say price controls could lead to supply shortages.

"We believe that Congress and the administration should carefully consider the impact that any legislation or regulation might have on pharmaceutical innovation," said Billy Tauzin, chief executive of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, which includes Pfizer Inc., Merck & Co. and Abbott Laboratories among its powerful membership.

"America's pharmaceutical research companies lead the world in discovering new cures and treatments for patients," Mr. Tauzin added. "The new drugs that save patient lives today are a result of the billions of dollars and years of research and development that pharmaceutical companies invest."

White House Eyes Dollars From Nevada Land Sale (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 12, 2006

The Bush administration is trying to get its hands on millions of dollars generated from sales of federally owned land in Nevada in order to help pay down the deficit.

As part of the Southern Nevada Public Land Management Act, which passed in 1998, Congress agreed to sell 13 million acres of land in Nevada. The key backers of thelaw -- Nevada Sens. John Ensign, a Republican, and Harry Reid, a Democrat -- estimated the sales would provide $350 million to improve federal landholdings, preserve endangered species, fund state education and encourage construction of affordable housing for low-income residents.

But a real estate boom in the growing city of Las Vegas has helped the Bureau of Land Management, which is in charge of auctioning the land, bring in nearly $3 billion.

"It's like the Nevada delegation pulled a lever on the slot machine, and the coins keep dumping out," a Republican Senate staffer said. "The Nevada delegation has hit the jackpot."

Money generated from the land sales has been used in Clark County -- which includes Las Vegas -- to help pay for a $52 million public golf course, $25 million in outdoor toilets, a $38 million park and to provide a safe habitat for the endangered Moapa dace, a fish that is a member of the carp family.

The administration now wants some of the money transferred to the Treasury Department to help pay down the federal deficit, which hit a four-year low of $247.7 billion for the budget year that ended in September.

DOJ_NMG_0093153

The administration submitted a proposal to Congress earlier this year to modify the act in order to specify who should benefit from the land sales, but that proposal is being ignored, the Republican staffer said.

"We've seen a lot of good come out of this, but when the price of property suddenly went up, we were looking at a whole bunch of money," an Interior Department official said. "And that's when those who do budgeting for deficit reduction said they needed a cut."

Nevada's two senators are against the administration -- or anyone else -- taking a cut of the money.

Jack Finn, spokesman for Mr. Ensign, said the land act is "one of his proudest accomplishments" and that revenues from the land sales "exceeded our expectations."

"It's not just the administration that wants to get their hands on the money. Other senators would like to get their hands on it, but it is Nevada legislation that should remain in Nevada," Mr. Finn said. "It is landmark legislation and Ensign strongly believes, and is making it clear to the administration, that funds generated should remain in Nevada as intended."

Jon Summers, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, said the Senate minority leader -- who is expected to become majority leader in January, as a result of last week's elections -- also opposes diverting the money out of Nevada.

"Just because the administration, with the help of a Republican rubber-stamp Congress, runs a record debt, doesn't mean we have to reopen the act," Mr. Summers said.

OTHER NEWS:

Liberal Groups Expect Postelection Results (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — After toppling the long-dominant Republicans in a hard-fought election, the Democratic Party's incoming congressional leaders have immediately found themselves in another difficult struggle — with their own supporters.

Some of the very activists who helped propel the Democrats to a majority in the House and Senate last week are claiming credit for the victories and demanding what they consider their due: a set of ambitious — and politically provocative — actions on gun control, abortion, national security and other issues that party leaders fear could alienate moderate voters and leave Democrats vulnerable to GOP attacks as big spenders or soft on terrorism.

The conflict underscores the challenge facing the Democrats in line to lead Congress — Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco in the House and Harry Reid of Nevada in the Senate. Each has pledged in recent days to "govern from the center," after a campaign in which anger over the Iraq war and GOP scandals helped their party attract some unusually conservative candidates and a large share of independent voters.

Turning off those new voters could undermine Democrats' hopes of solidifying their new majorities and taking the White House in 2008. But to the leaders of interest groups who are core supporters of the Democratic Party, and who had been barred under Republican rule from the inner sanctums of power, the new Congress means a time for action, not compromise.

Lobbyists for the American Civil Liberties Union, for example, are all but counting on Democrats to repeal the most controversial provisions of the Patriot Act, the anti-terrorist law pushed by the White House that some critics call unconstitutional. They also want to end President Bush's domestic wiretapping program.

"We are not going to let them off the hook," said Caroline Fredrickson, the ACLU's legislative director, of the newly empowered Democratic leaders in Congress.

"We will hold their feet to the fire and use all the tools we can to mobilize our members."

Similar vows are coming from lobbyists for abortion rights, who want to expand family-planning options for poor women and scale back Bush's focus on abstinence education, and from gun-control advocates, who hope to revive a lapsed ban on assault weapons. Labor unions, a core Democratic constituency, are demanding universal healthcare and laws discouraging corporations from seeking inexpensive labor overseas.

"It's been kind of a drought for 12 years, and there is some pent-up energy," said Bill Samuel, legislative director for the AFL-CIO, the labor federation that has long been a Democratic Party stalwart and spent millions of dollars on get-out-the-vote activities.

Several of the labor movement's less-controversial goals, such as raising the minimum wage and allowing Medicare to seek discounts on drug prices, are found both in the AFL-CIO's brochures and on a Democratic leadership wish list designed to appeal across ideological lines.

But labor officials said they expected Pelosi, Reid and others to go further.

DOJ_NMG_0093154

The day after the election, labor leaders declared a mandate for their causes and called on the new Congress to immediately reverse anti-union policies enacted by the Bush administration and promote affordable healthcare "for all."

"We're realistic about the congressional timetable, but we have our own view about why people went to the polls," said Samuel. "We think it had to do with their unhappiness with Republican inaction on the economy…. They're expecting Congress to tackle these issues, not play short ball."

Eli Pariser, executive director of the political action committee associated with the liberal activist group MoveOn.org, warned that Democratic leaders would be ill-advised to ignore the party's base.

"A huge number of people were involved in putting them over the top," Pariser said. "There's a huge group of people engaged and energized and ready to support Pelosi and company when they boldly lead — and to hold them to account if they stray."

Pressure on Democrats is especially acute to redirect U.S. policy in Iraq. Many Democrats say the issue was the most important one driving the party's victory.

Democratic lawmakers have not unified behind a single Iraq policy. If they could find common ground with Bush on a continued troop presence, they might fend off GOP efforts to label them as weak on national security — but they would probably infuriate a growing antiwar movement that helped propel the party back into power.

"American voters have done their job; now it's time for Congress to do theirs," said former Rep. Tom Andrews (D-Maine), national director of the antiwar group Win Without War. "The message couldn't be clearer. It's time to start the orderly withdrawal of American troops from Iraq. Our eyes are on the new Congress."

Other interest groups are pointing to Tuesday's results as vindication of their particular causes, and as proof that Democrats should embrace their issues rather than shun them as too liberal.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America, which advocates abortion rights, pointed to victories by like-minded candidates in conservative states and a rejection by South Dakota voters of an abortion ban. The result, the group says, should be that Democrats view their causes as mainstream, rather than part of a liberal agenda, and should devote more money to contraception and other family-planning options opposed by religious conservatives and scaled back by the administration.

"I honestly believe there was no bigger winner in this election than Planned Parenthood Action Fund and women's health," said Planned Parenthood President Cecile Richards, referring to the group's political arm.

At the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, the leading gun-control advocacy group, President Paul Helmke has high hopes for the assault weapons ban — and he can list races where candidates backed by his group defeated those supported by the National Rifle Assn.

But Helmke, a former Republican mayor of Fort Wayne, Ind., acknowledged that his challenge was to convince Democrats that his cause was not "radioactive." Many Democratic strategists have come to believe that supporting gun-control laws alienates rural voters and many independents.

"Guns are a tricky issue," Helmke said. "But the elections show there's nothing to be afraid of."

Still, the issues of abortion and guns underscore the tough decisions facing Reid and Pelosi as they try to please the party's core supporters while appealing to centrist voters.

The party's winning formula this year, after all, required candidacies from cultural conservatives such as Rep.-elect Heath Shuler in western North Carolina and Sens.-elect Jon Tester in Montana and Jim Webb in Virginia.

A preview of the tussle that awaits Reid and Pelosi has been playing out on the Internet since election day, with liberal bloggers decrying party centrists as out of touch with the Democratic majority. The complaints have been serious enough to draw Reid's attention, prompting him to host a conference call after the election with more than a dozen of the country's most prominent liberal bloggers.

Reid himself has learned to navigate these issues in order to win election in largely rural Nevada. He calls himself pro-gun and, according to a spokesman, opposes abortion except in cases of rape and incest and when the woman's life is endangered.

In the Senate, matters are further complicated by the fact that at least five Democrats — nearly 10% of the caucus — are considering presidential bids in which they may need to win the liberal base to gain the nomination but then campaign to the center in a general election.

Republicans have already said they intend to take back power in 2008 by portraying Democrats as big-government tax raisers who would rather safeguard civil liberties than interrogate terrorists.

Conservatives, though splintered over Iraq, immigration and other issues, had succeeded in keeping power since 1994 in part by forging a coalition built on compromise and shared goals — a practice that Democrats have yet to perfect.

Senior Democrats say they will figure out a way to bridge the divide.

"Tension is inherent in politics, and maybe a little bit of tension is good," said Reid spokesman Jim Manley. "But on the core, fundamental issues, everyone's in line."

DOJ_NMG_0093155

Wary that the interest groups' demands may turn off the centrist voters who put them in the majority, some Democratic pragmatists are preparing to press for greater independence.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the committee that designed the party's Senate campaign strategy, is publishing a book in January that is expected to lay out a plan for long-term Democratic dominance. He is expected to embrace a philosophy somewhere between the Democrats' old New Deal reliance on government and conservatives' outright disdain for government.

Schumer signaled as much after the election when he called on the party to "push aside the special interests and always keep our eye on the average American family."

An Uneasy Alliance (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

AMID all the post-election bliss evident within the constellation of bloggers and online Democratic activists known as the "netroots" last week, there was a note of anger and disappointment. Ned Lamont, the antiwar Connecticut businessman who defeated Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the August Democratic primary with strong support from the netroots, lost to the newly independent Mr. Lieberman on Tuesday, even as antiwar Democrats across the nation romped to upset victories.

It was the fall campaign's signal clash between the Internet grass roots, which have become a growing political force since the 2004 presidential race, and the Democratic establishment, where big-money donors and incumbency rule. In Connecticut, the establishment won. Some bloggers fumed that Beltway Democrats had abandoned Mr. Lamont.

"The D.C. Senate Democrats and D.C. lobbyists are not on our side," wrote the Lamont backer Matt Stoller on the liberal Web site MyDD, a major node for the netroots' self-organizing multitudes. "They have their own side, a side that is out of touch, immoral, and dishonest." The establishment, he wrote a few days before the election, had stuck a "knife in our back."

It was the latest round in the long battle between leading netroots activists and their critics, real and perceived, among Washington's Democratic elite. But such disagreements may soon be on the wane. As the smoke began to clear after Election Day, two things seemed clear. Though the netroots have forever changed how campaigns raise money and find votes, the results demonstrated that they cannot yet win elections on their own. But the Democratic Party cannot win major national elections without the netroots.

"The establishment needs them, and they need the establishment," said Carol C. Darr, director of the Institute for Politics, Democracy and the Internet at George Washington University.

Like the music obsessives who plunked down $500 for first-generation iPods, Web-based activists served as the party's early adopters in 2006, just as they provided much of the early money and vigor behind Howard Dean's 2004 presidential campaign. This year, they coalesced around dozens of House and Senate candidates in highly unfavorable states or Congressional districts, showering them with seed donations and praise while softening up G.O.P. incumbents with amateur opposition research, campaign stunts and homemade Web advertising.

Answerable to no one in particular, they could sometimes go off-key: During the Democratic primary, a blog supporting Mr. Lamont put up an altered photograph of Mr. Lieberman showing the senator in blackface, much to Mr. Lamont's embarrassment.

They were also sometimes poor judges of what will sell in the larger political marketplace; most of the 19 netroots-supported candidates listed on ActBlue, an online clearinghouse for donations to Democrats, lost on Tuesday. But the online activists also gave some once-underrated candidates — like the Senate candidates Jon Tester and Jim Webb, in Montana and Virginia, respectively, and the House candidates Paul Hodes in New Hampshire and Joe Sestak in Pennsylvania — a chance to be taken seriously. All ended up winning on Tuesday.

"It was the early support, the attention — the ability to create opportunities for candidates to break out with energy and passion," said Jonah Seiger, a Democratic Internet strategist.

Thanks in part to the netroots, said Mr. Seiger, the more promising candidates got a second or third look from the mainstream news media, major donors and party officials, especially as the political environment became increasingly unfavorable to Republicans.

Mr. Webb, for example, was essentially drafted last winter by a network of national and Virginia-based netroots activists, who later helped him gather 10,000 signatures in three weeks to get on the Democratic primary ballot.

"They're a group of people who put their money where their mouth is," said Jessica Vanden Berg, Mr. Webb's campaign manager. "They gave Jim — who didn't have a campaign staff in the beginning or a financial base — they gave him a political base to jump from."

DOJ_NMG_0093156

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee would go on to endorse Mr. Webb in the primary, and later poured nearly $7 million into his race against Republican George Allen, who conceded on Thursday, cementing the Democrats' new Senate majority.

In some cases, the party even got behind some netroots-favored candidates that it had previously ignored or discouraged. In California's 11th district, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee initially backed Steve Filson, a Navy veteran, over Gerald McNerney, the chief executive of a wind-turbine company who had the support of the Internet grass roots. But after Mr. McNerney won the primary, the committee spent half a million dollars on the general election. He won.

Of course, it's difficult to say what particular factor provided the edge in a close race. But last week, onetime antagonists seemed willing to share credit for the Democratic sweep. Shortly before 9 a.m. on Election Day, Harry Reid, the Senate minority leader — and soon to be majority leader — posted an entry on the popular liberal blog Daily Kos, titled "You got us here." Without the netroots, Mr. Reid wrote, "Democrats would not be in the position we are in today."

Markos Moulitsas Zúniga, the combative founder of Daily Kos, returned the favor. "I'm ready to get beyond the 'who gets credit' conversation, because we all do," Mr. Moulitsas wrote last week.

All told, the Democratic netroots and the party's traditional establishment managed to form an uneasy — and in many cases unintended — collaboration. What happens next is less clear, especially as the Democratic leadership moves from campaigning to governing.

"It's in part the job of the netroots to challenge the establishment," said Simon Rosenberg, the president of New Democrat Network, who has served as a bridge between party officials and leading netroots organizers. "It's their job to not be satisfied. That's why this is a complicated relationship. But through this healthy tension — this dialogue and debate — I think we'll end up with a stronger party."

Core Values Still Valid, GOP Says (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, November 12, 2006

Voters did not reject core Republican principles of lower taxes, smaller government and family values when they put the Democrats in charge of Congress, Republican officials across the country said last week in their post-mortems on the midterm elections.

If anything, these officials told The Washington Times, Republicans blundered by abandoning or de-emphasizing signature issues that had fueled the party's meteoric rise since the 1990s. The party must champion these issues again if it hopes to win back the voters' trust in the 2008 presidential election, the officials said.

"In the tight races where we had candidates who articulated the core issues like low taxes, less government and strong family values, those are the candidates that prevailed in our competitive races," Minnesota Republican Chairman Ron Carey said. "They did better than candidates that didn't stand firm on those conservative Republican issues."

As an example, Mr. Carey cited Republican Michele Bachmann, who ran as a staunch conservative with strong evangelical support in Minnesota's open 6th District race, easily defeating Patty Wetterling, a liberal Democrat, 50 percent to 42 percent.

"The candidates who tried to finesse the GOP's positions fared poorly," Mr. Carey said. "Those who ran on core Republican issues were able to better withstand the Democratic onslaught."

An example, some Republican strategists said, was Rep. Gil Gutknecht of Minnesota, who lost his 1st District seat to Democrat Tim Walz, a teacher and National Guard veteran, 53 percent to 47 percent.

But Republican critics strongly rejected the premise of these Republican post-mortems, saying taxes were virtually nonexistent as an election issue, as was limited government.

"The fact of the matter is that these were non-issues," said pollster and demographic analyst David Bositis of the National Center for Political and Economic Studies.

"And how could Republicans run on smaller government? They've been in charge for the last five years, and government spending has exploded. They can't claim the Democrats are responsible for that," he said.

Mr. Carey argued that voters remain just as conservative as they were in earlier elections when Republicans won increasing majorities in Congress. But Republicans failed to sharpen the differences between themselves and Democrats, many of whom portrayed themselves as centrists despite their liberal views and voting records, other Republicans said in a survey of state party leaders by The Times.

"I think people still agree with Republicans on lowering taxes, on fiscal policy and trying to keep the government in check. I don't buy the argument that everybody has become a liberal," Kansas Republican Chairman Tim Shallenburger said.

DOJ_NMG_0093157

He and other state party officials said they had no doubt the Iraq war and congressional scandals were the overriding issues that produced a wave of Democratic victories in more than 30 Republican congressional districts and a half-dozen Senate races.

Exit surveys of 13,208 voters by the Associated Press and the major television news networks found that more than half of the voters surveyed, 55 percent, opposed the war in Iraq and said that opposition would make them more likely to vote for Democratic House candidates.

The exit polls also showed that six in 10 rejected President Bush's chief justification for the war: to make America more secure at home. Notably, seven out of 10 independents -- a pivotal voting bloc that led to Republican losses -- felt that way.

Some party chairmen said that without the Iraq war, a number of Republicans would have won.

"It would have been a completely different outcome," Michigan Republican Chairman Saul Anuzis said. "The Iraq war was clearly one of the major reasons for Bush's unpopularity," which Democrats turned into a referendum on his presidency.

There was also a belief among many party officials that the war -- when combined with a number of other issues, such as excessive spending and the lobbying and congressional-page scandals -- produced a "critical mass" that angered and frustrated Republicans and hurt turnout among party members. Exit polls showed that nearly 30 percent of voters were "angry" with Mr. Bush.

But it was the Republican Party's abandonment of its core principles on spending and limited government that these and other Republicans outside the Beltway said was the biggest complaint among the party's grass roots. They blamed Republican leaders and members of Congress who, as one party chairman said, "forgot why we sent them there."

"I heard a lot of Republicans say, 'We gave you a chance, and you spent more money than before. Why should we send you back to Washington?' " Mr. Carey said.

"Some said we became the people we ran against in 1994. Whether it is true or not, that was the perception in our party. It was in the minds of many voters Tuesday," he said. "We need to get back to our basic core principles and talk about the issues that draw a sharp distinction between Republicans and Democrats."

These complaints after the election were picked up by some Republican presidential hopefuls, including Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who saw them as an opportunity to make the party strong again.

"Americans have not become less conservative, but they believe some Republicans have. As a party, we need to remember who we are and the principles that have always led our party and our country to success," Mr. Romney said last week.

"We must return to the common-sense Reagan Republican ideals of fighting for hard-working Americans, lowering taxes, shrinking government, curbing out-of-control spending," he said.

Mr. McCain called for a return to the conservative principles he said make up the foundations of the Republican Party.

"We came to Washington to change government, and government changed us," he said. "We departed rather tragically from our conservative principles."

Though Democratic leaders repeatedly denounced Mr. Bush's across-the-board tax cuts as "tax cuts for the wealthy," polls showed that most Americans sided with Mr. Bush and the Republicans on this core issue. A Gallup poll late last month showed that 74 percent were against Democratic proposals to raise federal income taxes.

Though Mr. Bush and Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, who is in line to become the next House speaker, have buried the hatchet for now, some Republicans question whether party members can or even should compromise with Democrats on taxes and spending.

"I think there is going to be a split in Republican circles between the faction that says let's compromise and try to get along and another faction that says we need to get back to our core principles and beliefs," Mr. Carey said.

Republicans are not the only ones who are divided over postelection strategies. The elections also have reopened old ideological divisions between the Democratic Party's liberal and centrist wings. Centrists fear the middle-of-the-road voters who returned them to power will be turned off if the party's left wing designs the legislative agenda for next year.

"This is a victory for the vital center of American politics over the extremes," said Al From, the founder of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council (DLC), "and, while Democrats benefited from an energized party base, the key to the victory was in the contested center of the electorate, among moderates."

Mr. From said his point "was underscored by [Sen.] Joe Lieberman's re-election victory in Connecticut."

Mr. Lieberman, a hero among DLC members, was defeated in the primary by the party's liberal, anti-war activists because of his support for the Iraq war. He won re-election Tuesday as an independent, largely with Republican votes.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, a potential presidential candidate and a DLC leader, similarly warned his party last week in an interview with USA Today that "if we serve up a highly partisan, ideologically extreme, Democratic version of what they just voted against, we're not going to do very well."

DOJ_NMG_0093158

But that view was flatly rejected by party liberals who oppose the DLC's centrist approach on domestic and national-security policy issues.

"If Democrats had campaigned like Lieberman on the war, they might have won in Connecticut, but they would have lost in most places," said Roger Hickey, co-director of the liberal Campaign for America's Future. "This election was a referendum on the war, and the Democrats were smart to reject the DLC position on the war."

Reactionary Moderates (NYT)

By Ramesh Ponnuru

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SOCIAL conservatives had a bad election night on Tuesday. A slew of pro-life senators and House members lost their races. Missouri voted to amend its Constitution to protect a right to clone human embryos for research. Every pro-life initiative on a state ballot failed.

But before we declare this election proof that social conservatism is doomed, consider that Republicans as a whole had a worse night. Pro-lifers lost four seats in the Senate and, depending on some unresolved races, appear to have lost 20 in the House. But the Republican Party lost six in the Senate and 29 in the House. The discrepancy stems from the fact that some pro-choice Democrats are replacing pro-choice Republicans, and even a few pro-life Democrats are replacing pro-life Republicans.

Meanwhile, ballot initiatives as a whole went better for the social right than for other conservative factions. Almost all of the initiatives against same-sex marriage won. Even most Western states, where the Republicans' social conservatism is said to be dooming the party, voted for those initiatives — which typically ran well ahead of local party candidates. Colorado and Nevada rejected legal marijuana. Economic conservatives, on the other hand, lost every fight over the minimum wage.

That's something to remember the next time you hear that after their defeat, the Republicans need to "move to the center." Maybe they should: but which center? When editorialists talk about the "sensible center," they usually have in mind free-trading, budget-balancing social liberals. It is a political profile often found in the business world, and on the coasts. But there is another center — one that's liberal on economic measures but conservative on social mores.

In several high-profile races, the winning candidates played to this "center." For example, Senator-elect Claire McCaskill pounded the Republican incumbent, Jim Talent, in Missouri on economic issues like veterans' benefits, but she came out against partial-birth abortion weeks before the election. Representative Harold Ford, a Democrat who nearly pulled off an upset in the Tennessee Senate race, went so far as to endorse a constitutional amendment on marriage and to call himself pro-life.

Senator-elect Robert Casey Jr. of Pennsylvania, a Democrat, vowed to fight free trade, but also to oppose abortion. If we take Mr. Casey at his word about his intentions in the Senate, then his defeat of Rick Santorum is simply a move to a less abrasive style of social conservatism, not a repudiation of it.

Something similar happened in the last presidential campaign. President Bush was on the defensive when he talked about outsourcing jobs and the cost of health care, while John Kerry was on the defensive on most of the social issues — and Mr. Kerry eventually said his position on marriage was basically the same as the president's.

The real message of the last few elections is that, for the most part, social issues help the Republicans and economic ones the Democrats. Did talking about energy policy, and keeping quiet about gay marriage, help Senator George Allen of Virginia survive Jim Webb's challenge?

The lesson for the Democrats, meanwhile, is not that they all need to move right on social issues. It is that they can be a lasting majority if they are an economically liberal party with socially conservative and socially liberal wings. Because if they choose to be a socially liberal party with economically liberal and economically conservative wings, they will soon find themselves back in minority status.

The Republicans, meanwhile, can prosper if they can find ways to address the economic concerns of working-class cultural conservatives — many of them unmoved by free-market bromides — without doing violence to their own limited-government principles.

I agree with the economic conservatives on most issues, and disagree with the social conservatives on some, so I'm not entirely happy about the electoral reality I'm describing. (I wish Colorado and Nevada had voted the other way on marijuana, for instance.) But there it is nonetheless. While both social conservatives and Republicans need to make some changes, a divorce isn't on the table, and there's no political reason one should be.

2006: The Year Of The "Macaca" (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093159

OF course, the "thumpin' " was all about Iraq. But let us not forget Katrina. It was the collision of the twin White House calamities in August 2005 that foretold the collapse of the presidency of George W. Bush.

Back then, the full measure of the man finally snapped into focus for most Americans, sending his poll numbers into the 30s for the first time. The country saw that the president who had spurned a grieving wartime mother camping out in the sweltering heat of Crawford was the same guy who had been unable to recognize the depth of the suffering in New Orleans's fetid Superdome. This brand of leadership was not the "compassionate conservatism" that had been sold in all those photo ops with African-American schoolchildren. This was callous conservatism, if not just plain mean.

It's the kind of conservatism that remains silent when Rush Limbaugh does a mocking impersonation of Michael J. Fox's Parkinson's symptoms to score partisan points. It's the kind of conservatism that talks of humane immigration reform but looks the other way when candidates demonize foreigners as predatory animals. It's the kind of conservatism that pays lip service to "tolerance" but stalls for days before taking down a campaign ad caricaturing an African-American candidate as a sexual magnet for white women.

This kind of politics is now officially out of fashion. Harold Ford did lose his race in Tennessee, but by less than three points in a region that has not sent a black man to the Senate since Reconstruction. Only 36 years old and hugely talented, he will rise again even as the last vestiges of Jim Crow tactics continue to fade and Willie Horton ads countenanced by a national political party join the Bush dynasty in history's dustbin.

Elsewhere, the 2006 returns more often than not confirmed that Americans, Republicans and Democrats alike, are far better people than this cynical White House takes them for. This election was not a rebuke merely of the reckless fiasco in Iraq but also of the divisive ideology that had come to define the Bush-Rove-DeLay era. This was the year that Americans said a decisive no to the politics of "macaca" just as firmly as they did to pre-emptive war and Congressional corruption.

For all of Mr. Limbaugh's supposed clout, his nasty efforts did not defeat the ballot measure supporting stem-cell research in his native state, Missouri. The measure squeaked through, helping the Democratic senatorial candidate knock out the Republican incumbent. (The other stem-cell advocates endorsed by Mr. Fox in campaign ads, in Maryland and Wisconsin, also won.) Arizona voters, despite their proximity to the Mexican border, defeated two of the crudest immigrant-bashing demagogues running for Congress, including one who ran an ad depicting immigrants menacing a JonBenet Ramsey look-alike. (Reasserting its Goldwater conservative roots, Arizona also appears to be the first state to reject an amendment banning same-sex marriage.) Nationwide, the Republican share of the Hispanic vote fell from 44 percent in 2004 to 29 percent this year. Hispanics aren't buying Mr. Bush's broken-Spanish shtick anymore; they saw that the president, despite his nuanced take on immigration, never stood up forcefully to the nativists in his own camp when it counted most, in an election year.

But for those who've been sickened by the Bush-Rove brand of politics, surely the happiest result of 2006 was saved for last: Jim Webb's ousting of Senator George Allen in Virginia. It is all too fitting that this race would be the one that put the Democrats over the top in the Senate. Mr. Allen was the slickest form of Bush-Rove conservative, complete with a strategist who'd helped orchestrate the Swift Boating of John Kerry. Mr. Allen was on a fast track to carry that banner into the White House once Mr. Bush was gone. His demise was so sudden and so unlikely that it seems like a fairy tale come true.

As recently as April 2005, hard as it is to believe now, Mr. Allen was chosen in a National Journal survey of Beltway insiders as the most likely Republican presidential nominee in 2008. Political pros saw him as a cross between Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush whose "affable" conservatism and (contrived) good-old-boy persona were catnip to voters. His Senate campaign this year was a mere formality; he began with a double-digit lead.

That all ended famously on Aug. 11, when Mr. Allen, appearing before a crowd of white supporters in rural Virginia, insulted a 20-year-old Webb campaign worker of Indian descent who was tracking him with a video camera. After belittling the dark-skinned man as "macaca, or whatever his name is," Mr. Allen added, "Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia."

The moment became a signature cultural event of the political year because the Webb campaign posted the video clip on YouTube.com, the wildly popular site that most politicians, to their peril, had not yet heard about from their children. Unlike unedited bloggorhea, which can take longer to slog through than Old Media print, YouTube is all video snippets all the time; the one-minute macaca clip spread through the national body politic like a rabid virus. Nonetheless it took more than a week for Mr. Allen to recognize the magnitude of the problem and apologize to the object of his ridicule. Then he compounded the damage by making a fool of himself on camera once more, this time angrily denying what proved to be accurate speculation that his mother was a closeted Jew. It was a Mel Gibson meltdown that couldn't be blamed on the bottle.

Mr. Allen has a history of racial insensitivity. He used to display a Confederate flag in his living room and, bizarrely enough, a noose in his office for sentimental reasons that he could never satisfactorily explain. His defense in the macaca incident was that he had no idea that the word, the term for a genus of monkey, had any racial connotation. But even if he were telling the truth — even if Mr. Allen were not a racist — his non-macaca words were just as damning. "Welcome to America and the real world of Virginia" was unmistakably meant to demean the young man as an unwashed immigrant, whatever his race. It was a typical example of the us-versus-them stridency that has defined the truculent Bush-Rove fearmongering: you're either with us or you're a traitor, possibly with the terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0093160

As it happened, the "macaca" who provoked the senator's self-destruction, S. R. Sidarth, was not an immigrant but the son of immigrants. He was born in Washington's Virginia suburbs to well-off parents (his father is a mortgage broker) and is the high-achieving graduate of a magnet high school, a tournament chess player, a former intern for Joe Lieberman, a devoted member of his faith (Hindu) and, currently, a senior at the University of Virginia. He is even a football jock like Mr. Allen. In other words, he is an exemplary young American who didn't need to be "welcomed" to his native country by anyone. The Sidarths are typical of the families who have abetted the rapid growth of northern Virginia in recent years, much as immigrants have always built and renewed our nation. They, not Mr. Allen with his nostalgia for the Confederate "heritage," are America's future. It is indeed just such northern Virginians who have been tinting the once reliably red commonwealth purple.

Though the senator's behavior was toxic, the Bush-Rove establishment rewarded it. Its auxiliaries from talk radio, the blogosphere and the Wall Street Journal opinion page echoed the Allen campaign's complaint that the incident was inflated by the news media, especially The Washington Post. Once it became clear that Mr. Allen was in serious trouble, conservative pundits mainly faulted him for running an "awful campaign," not for being an awful person.

The macaca incident had resonance beyond Virginia not just because it was a hit on YouTube. It came to stand for 2006 as a whole because it was synergistic with a national Republican campaign that made a fetish of warning that a Congress run by Democrats would have committee chairmen who are black (Charles Rangel) or gay (Barney Frank), and a middle-aged woman not in the Stepford mold of Laura Bush as speaker. In this context, Mr. Allen's defeat was poetic justice: the perfect epitaph for an era in which Mr. Rove systematically exploited the narrowest prejudices of the Republican base, pitting Americans of differing identities in cockfights for power and profit, all in the name of "faith."

Perhaps the most interesting finding in the exit polls Tuesday was that the base did turn out for Mr. Rove: white evangelicals voted in roughly the same numbers as in 2004, and 71 percent of them voted Republican, hardly a mass desertion from the 78 percent of last time. But his party was routed anyway. It was the end of the road for the boy genius and his can't-miss strategy that Washington sycophants predicted could lead to a permanent Republican majority.

What a week this was! Here's to the voters of both parties who drove a stake into the heart of our political darkness. If you'll forgive me for paraphrasing George Allen: Welcome back, everyone, to the world of real America.

A True Blue Libertarian (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

BOZEMAN, Mont. -- Stan Jones, a Montana libertarian widely known for his peculiar blue skin, can arguably be said to have recast the political complexion of the U.S. Senate, turning it from Republican red to the same color as his face.

That face, it should be noted, is not the dark blue of TV graphics that show where the Democratic Party increasingly holds sway. Nor is it the pale blue of the big Montana sky as autumn turns to winter. It is an ashen blue-gray, a flesh tone more suited to the undertaker's slab than the politician's stump.

In any case, this is what the 67-year-old candidate accomplished last Tuesday: He won 10,324 votes in the make-or-break Senate race in Montana, a contest that Democrat Jon Tester won by just 2,565 votes over three-term Republican incumbent Conrad Burns.

Jones is a quirkily conservative kind of libertarian -- opposed to abortion and same-sex marriage. So it can be argued that he took the bulk of his votes from the conservative Burns, which tipped the election to Tester, which tipped the Senate to the Democrats, which tipped the scales of U.S. political history.

"I'm tickled about that," said Jones. After some reflection, he added, "There is excitement for you to be talking to the guy who changed the country."

In the past, elections have given Jones little to be tickled about.

He is a perennial loser in Montana politics, a kind of Harold Stassen of the interior West, a fringe candidate who sometimes has to sue to get invited to television debates. He is also a man who accidentally turned his skin blue by drinking a homemade antibiotic laced with silver.

He first took the medicine in 1999, he said, fearing that the year 2000 would wreck computers, spread terrorism and disease, and make prescribed antibiotics unavailable. He concedes now that he miscalculated.

Jones granted an interview at the Leaf & Bean coffeehouse on Main Street in Bozeman and later at the nearby Academy of Cosmetology, where he sometimes gets cheap haircuts and where the fluorescent lighting brings out the blue in his face.

DOJ_NMG_0093161

One of the students at the academy, Jessica Wagner, recalled that the first time she approached Jones to cut his hair, she caught a glimpse of him in a barber's chair and thought: "Oh, my God, he's dead." Over time, she said, she grew accustomed to his face and found him to be "really a neat guy."

Jones's excitement over the outcome of this election is substantially constrained by his contempt for Democrats and Republicans, for Tester and for Burns, and for the American political system, which he says has been ruined by big money.

Jones, it is safe to say, has not been ruined by big money.

He said he spent $1,652 on his campaign (the filing fee as Senate candidate), plus a few hundred dollars to buy gas to drive to the few campaign events that would allow him to speak.

"Republicans spend and borrow, Democrats tax and spend," said Jones, who said he quit being a Republican during the 1970s. "Whoever is in there -- the government grows and grows."

The one ray of light that Jones sees in the Democratic Party's takeover of the Senate and the House is a chance for increased scrutiny of President Bush, whom he fears. "This president is closer to a dictator than any we have had in history," said Jones, adding that the only president who could compare was Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Jones is pleased that Tester, the president of the Montana Senate and an organic farmer, beat Burns, but not because he likes anything about Tester. "I believes Burns is a pawn of Bush," Jones said.

There are Stan Jones skeptics in Montana who say that the eccentric libertarian may not have swung the election for the Democrats. Craig Wilson, a polling expert at Montana State University in Billings, said Jones was "really invisible" in the campaign and probably hurt Burns no more than Tester.

But another longtime expert on Montana elections, Jerry W. Calvert, a professor of political science at Montana State University in Bozeman, said there is "no question" that Jones took votes from the incumbent. "The rule of thumb in Montana is that libertarians take votes disproportionately from Republicans," Calvert said.

Jones was born near Bozeman, the son of a poor dirt farmer, and graduated with a degree in general science from Montana State. He spent 28 years in the Air Force and Air Force Reserve, retiring as a lieutenant colonel.

During many of those years, he said, he was an administrative contracting officer, based in Seattle and buying aircraft and other hardware for the Air Force. He said he purchased several 747s from Boeing, three of which ended up in the Air Force One fleet.

Jones was married for 18 years to a Seattle woman. They had no children.

"When I retired and told my wife I wanted to go back to Bozeman and fight political corruption and get involved in politics, she decided to stay in Seattle," he said. "We split the sheets. It was an easy divorce. I gave her the house and the time-share in Hawaii."

It was the move back to Bozeman, Jones said, that caused his skin to turn blue. Using tap water in Seattle, he said, he had been making a "colloidal silver" antibiotic by charging two silver wires in a glass of water with an electric current.

But using the same technique in Bozeman, where the mineral content of tap water is much higher, the silver bonded with other elements in the water, and the resulting mixture gave Jones argyria. It is an extremely rare but relatively harmless condition that can permanently stain skin a bluish gray.

Jones said he was not aware that he had argyria until he participated in a televised debate as part of his failed 2002 campaign against Montana Sen. Max Baucus, a Democrat.

"After the debate," Jones recalled, "a reporter came up and asked me: 'Are you okay? Your face is really blue.' "

He sought medical advice, learned that his condition was not life-threatening and resumed his hopeless biennial campaigns against Montana big shots. Since 2000, he has run twice for governor and twice for the Senate.

Until the next Senate race rolls around in 2008, Jones said, he and some libertarian buddies are planning to place a series of initiatives on the state ballot to enforce the literal meaning of the U.S. Constitution.

"We plan to organize the constitution police," Jones said, breaking into a broad, bluish smile. "We are going to drive the secretary of state crazy."

Revolving Doors Spin Once Again (NYT)

By Aron Pilhofer

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

So it's the day after the election, and you've lost your seat in Congress.

What to do?

You might consider becoming a lobbyist. It is a well-traveled career path.

DOJ_NMG_0093162

Last year, a study by the advocacy group Public Citizen found that 43 percent of the members of Congress who left office between 1998 and 2004 became lobbyists. That included half of the departing senators and 42 percent of the departing House members.

In a possible worrisome sign for Republicans who lost on Tuesday, the study found that the ex-lawmakers most likely to end up as lobbyists were those whose party held power.

Almost 52 percent of the Republicans who left Congress since 1998 registered to lobby, compared with 33 percent of the departing Democrats.

"This could reflect the fact that after George W. Bush became president, Washington became a hostile place for lobbyists whose contacts were Democratic," Public Citizen said.

Of course, Mr. Bush is still president, but control of Congress has now shifted to the Democrats for the first time since 1994.

Ex-lawmakers are prohibited from personally lobbying their former colleagues in the year after they have left office, the time span known as the "cooling off period."

But the Public Citizen study found that many were able to sidestep the restriction by supervising other lobbyists.

In all, more than 280 former members of Congress registered as lobbyists at some point between 1998 and 2006, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, which monitors money, politics and influence in Washington.

And over all, about 12,000 registered lobbyists ply their trade there.

"The beltway here, it's like a magnetic field," said James A. Thurber, a professor of government at American University in Washington.

"After spending time in Washington," he said, former members of Congress "find it's hard to peddle their wares in Topeka, Kan."

The lobbying and trade associations that line K Street and its environs are girding for an avalanche of résumés. Some firms are already recruiting.

"We'll be looking for the best and the brightest," said Jennifer Dunn, a former Republican member of Congress from Washington State.

She retired in 2005, after 12 years in Congress, and joined DLA Piper, one of Washington's biggest lobbying firms.

Spitzer Buries His Cares For Weekend On The Sand (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SAN JUAN, P.R., Nov. 11 — Famous for his intensity, even his ferocity, Eliot Spitzer, the attorney general-turned-governor-elect of New York, is trying out a new persona: beach bum.

At a press briefing Saturday morning, Mr. Spitzer confessed to having taken a two-hour nap on the beach at a resort here on Friday and stated his intention of returning to the ocean in the afternoon.

As for the "enormous pile of memos on the budget" that he said he had brought with him, Mr. Spitzer said he planned "to bury them in the sand and read a B-level novel."

But no one would mistake Mr. Spitzer, a Democrat who won Tuesday's election by a landslide, for Jimmy Buffett.

As is his wont, Mr. Spitzer arrived at 9 a.m. on the dot for a breakfast meeting with Aníbal Acevedo Vilá, the governor of Puerto Rico, at La Fortaleza, the governor's residence. And though he did not wear a tie, his shirt was a decidedly nontropical blue check, under a navy blazer.

While the two men chatted about their days at law school and the spectacular views from the governor's windows, Mr. Spitzer said, they also discussed economic development and the implications of last week's Democratic sweep in Washington.

Mr. Spitzer's wife, Silda Wall Spitzer, and Luisa Gándara, the first lady of Puerto Rico, also attended.

Mr. Spitzer tackled some major issues at a brief news conference afterward. He referred to the war in Iraq as "an unfortunate quagmire," but said he had supported eliminating Saddam Hussein's threat to the international community.

He pledged to appoint Latinos to important posts in his administration but sidestepped a question about Puerto Rico's status. There is a longstanding debate in Puerto Rico, now a commonwealth, about seeking independence or statehood.

Asked about his inauguration, Mr. Spitzer he said he was not sure if he would seek private donations to pay for a celebration, as Gov. George E. Pataki did for his first swearing-in, in 1995. That practice has raised ethical questions in the past, Mr. Spitzer said, "and we're going to handle it in a very, very different way."

After the press conference, Mr. Spitzer acknowledged that his campaign for governor had not been as emotionally draining as it might have been. Polls had him far in the lead from the beginning, and he won by a 40-point margin on Tuesday.

Still, candidates can never really relax, he added, because problems can crop up unexpectedly.

DOJ_NMG_0093163

“Look at Alan,” he said, referring to Alan G. Hevesi, the state comptroller, who is under criminal investigation for his use of a government employee to chauffeur his wife. Mr. Hevesi was re-elected, but Mr. Spitzer may have to decide whether to try to remove him from office if the issue is not resolved by Jan. 1.

Before returning to New York, Mr. Spitzer appeared Saturday evening at a conference of the New York State Assembly Puerto Rican/Hispanic Task Force. In brief remarks that were mostly an opportunity for cheering and photographs, he thanked many people, saying, “The work is ahead of us.”

Ehrlich Run Again "Unlikely" (AP)

By Brian Witte

AP, November 11, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. said yesterday he does not plan to run for office again, after losing the gubernatorial election to Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley.

Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, said on WBAL's "Stateline with the Governor" radio show that the results of the election Tuesday indicated Maryland has moved "pretty hard left."

"Who's to say what's going to happen tomorrow or next week -- in four years -- but at this point, I have to say that a return to public life would be unlikely," he said.

Mr. O'Malley, a Democrat, defeated Mr. Ehrlich on Tuesday, winning about 53 percent of the vote to 46 percent for the incumbent.

Asked if he thought the loss of support for Republicans nationally hurt him, Mr. Ehrlich, 48, said when an incumbent is on the ballot "it's generally a referendum on the incumbent."

"For me, it was either rehire me or fire me, and we got fired," the governor said. "The bottom line here is that I think that the majority of folks in Maryland want Martin O'Malley as governor rather than Bob Ehrlich."

Mr. Ehrlich pointed to Democratic victories in other key offices in Maryland. Democrats held on to the U.S. Senate seat that's being vacated by retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin defeated Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele 55 percent to 44 percent.

Democrats also won the attorney general's race, with Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler defeating Frederick County State's Attorney Scott L. Rolle.

"If you look at the statewide elected officials today -- the folks coming into office -- you're compelled to the conclusion that the state is moving pretty hard left," Mr. Ehrlich said.

Mr. Ehrlich, who was the first Republican governor to be elected in Maryland since 1966, said his party still has significant support in Western and Southern Maryland, "but clearly, statewide, the direction in this state is pretty hard left, and it's going to be a very, very difficult thing for a right-of-center Republican Party to overcome."

Mr. Ehrlich said he was proud of his political c areer in Maryland, which spans about 20 years.

Feingold Rules Out 2008 Run For President (MJS)

By Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 12, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Russ Feingold will not seek his party's presidential nomination in 2008, the Wisconsin Democrat told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel on Saturday.

"I never got to that point where I'd rather be running around the country, running for president, than being a senator from Wisconsin," Feingold said in a phone interview from Madison.

Feingold, 53, conceded that he faced long odds of winning the nomination.

"It would have required the craziest combination of things in the history of American politics to make it work," he said.

But Feingold said waging an underdog campaign appealed to him. What didn't appeal to him, he said, was "the way in which this effort would dismantle both my professional life (in the Senate) and my personal life. I'm very happy right now."

Feingold had been publicly weighing a presidential bid since early 2005, forming a political action committee, traveling to key states such as New Hampshire and Iowa, and cultivating a more national constituency as an early and outspoken opponent of the Iraq war, the Patriot Act and other Bush administration policies.

The senator said Saturday that he went into that process with more of a predisposition against running than the other way around. Although Feingold's political activity pointed in many ways toward a run, he was not traveling, fund raising or organizing with quite the same intensity as some potential candidates.

"I began with the feeling I didn't really want to do this but was open to the possibility that getting around the country would make me want to do it. That never happened," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0093164

"People have always portrayed me as ambitious. I'm not ashamed of that.

"But I have never had a craving to be president of the United States. I used to say it when I was 5 or 7 years old. But I haven't really been saying it as an adult," said Feingold, who said he didn't rule out running in the future.

Feingold's thinking about the race crystallized in the last few weeks, he said. The Democratic takeover of Congress on Tuesday was a final factor because it added to the appeal of focusing entirely on his position in the Senate, he said.

Feingold is the second Democrat to seriously explore a campaign before opting out. Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced last month that he would not run.

Both went into the process as dark horses but showed signs of stirring interest among Democratic activists: Warner because of his centrist politics and success in a "red" state; Feingold because of his distinctive opposition in the Senate to a whole series of Bush policies highly unpopular with grass-roots Democrats, from the war to trade to wiretapping.

But Feingold confronted obvious obstacles. The potential field includes New York Sen. Hillary Clinton_the financial and political colossus in the party_former vice presidential candidate John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who has rapidly emerged as the Democrats' most celebrated political "fresh face."

At least four other Senate Democrats are considering a run. Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack declared last week.

Feingold said winning the party nomination would have been "very difficult," but he viewed himself as someone who could win a general election and his decision wasn't based on who else might run.

"This may sound immodest, but I thought, `I can do this. I can be the candidate, that rational, effective, presentable candidate for Democrats that would not be threatening, yet very progressive,' " Feingold said.

Feingold said he was not concerned about the personal scrutiny that comes with a presidential candidacy.

"I've been through three U.S. Senate campaigns. The people I've run against have not been pansies," said Feingold, referring to the aggressiveness of his opponents. "I feel like my life is an open book."

Feingold is single and twice divorced. He has two grown daughters. He said his family and friends were "mixed" in their reaction about his possible candidacy.

The third-term senator, whose best-known legislative accomplishment is the campaign reform law he wrote with Senate Republican John McCain of Arizona, said he wasn't bothered by the idea of being outspent.

"I know how to win those races_your weakness is your strength," he said. "I like to turn that around. `I'm the guy with no money.' . . . I'm not saying I think I would have been likely to win. But I saw a way to make this happen."

Asked about the Democratic field, Feingold made it clear he preferred a nominee who shared his views on the war.

"The first choice would be somebody who voted against this unfortunate Iraq war. That may not be available," said Feingold, who was the only Senate Democrat considering a run who voted against authorizing the use of force in Iraq.

"Second choice is somebody who at least said it was a bad idea. . . . I would be happy if Obama or (Al) Gore ran," said Feingold, who said he was not offering an endorsement.

Clinton, the presumed party front-runner, voted in 2002 to authorize force in Iraq. "Those who were there and came to the judgment the Iraq war was a good idea have to answer for some concerns I have about their judgment. That was a really bad judgment. I'm prepared to support a Democrat who voted for that war, but I think the American people would prefer a president who had the judgment to see it was not a good idea," he said.

Feingold sent an e-mail to supporters Saturday night announcing his decision.

In it, he said, "I'm sure a campaign for president would have been a great adventure and helpful in advancing a progressive agenda. . . .

"However, to put my family and all of my friends and supporters through such a process without having a very strong desire to run, seems inappropriate to me."

"I began with the feeling I didn't really want to do this but was open to the possibility that getting around the country would make me want to do it. That never happened."

Sen. Feingold Rules Out Run For President In 2008 (AP)

AP, November 12, 2006

MILWAUKEE, Wisconsin (AP) -- Sen. Russ Feingold has decided against seeking the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, saying he wants to focus on his work in the Senate.

In a letter posted on his political action committee's Web site, Feingold said he was excited that Tuesday's elections gave Democrats control of both chambers of Congress, giving them the chance to "undo much of the damage that one-party rule has done to America."

"We can actually advance progressive solutions to such major issues as guaranteed health care, dependence on oil and our unbalanced trade policies," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0093165

Feingold, 53, told the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel he realized he would be a long-shot candidate in a bid for the presidency.

He said running as an underdog appealed to him, but not the way it would "dismantle" his work in the Senate and his personal life.

An outspoken opponent of the Iraq war, the Patriot Act and other Bush administration policies, Feingold had formed his PAC, the Progressive Patriots Fund, and visited key presidential primary states such as Iowa and New Hampshire.

Still, he said he started the process more predisposed against a run than for it.

"I began with the feeling I didn't really want to do this but was open to the possibility that getting around the country would make me want to do it. That never happened," he told the newspaper in a story posted on its Web site late Saturday.

Feingold leaves a crowded field of possible Democratic candidates, including Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who announced his candidacy last week.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is widely considered the front-runner for the nomination.

Others considering or positioning themselves for a run include Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic nominee; former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the vice presidential nominee two years ago; Sens. Evan Bayh of Indiana, Joe Biden of Delaware and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced last month that he was bowing out of the race.

Feingold said he had come closer to making his decision in the past few weeks, and the final factor came when Democrats won both chambers of Congress because it provided added appeal to focus on work in the Senate.

Feingold spokesman Zach Lowe did not immediately return a telephone message from The Associated Press early Sunday seeking comment.

Now, The Tape Measure For Those Other Drapes (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

SENATOR GEORGE ALLEN of Virginia had yet to hand back the Senate to the Democrats when Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa announced bright and early Thursday morning that he was running for president. Back in Washington, Senator John McCain of Arizona moved to set up his own presidential exploratory committee and prepared what aides promised would be two major speeches this Thursday about 2008, based on last Tuesday's vote. And Hillary Rodham Clinton scored the election-week cover of New York magazine; the subject was not her easy return to the Senate.

In some ways, the midterm election of 2006 was the first big event of the 2008 race — much like an early debate or an Iowa straw poll. It helped shake out and shake up the field. Some lessons were instantly apparent: you probably won't hear more talk of Republican candidates wrestling for the mantle of President Bush, and Democrats are looking hungrily at Ohio and Colorado, states that went Republican in 2004 and 2000. Here are some of the less obvious consequences for 2008, courtesy of 2006.

The Swing-Vote Math The White House won in 2002 and 2004 with a simple strategy pressed by Karl Rove: use hot-button issues and sophisticated organizational tools to turn out voters from the Republican base, calculating that there are enough of them to win. Well, maybe not. Swing independent voters — 26 percent of the electorate this year — voted 2-to-1 for Democrats last Tuesday, a big reason the Democrats will control the House next year.

Steve Schmidt, a Republican strategist who used to work for Mr. Rove and managed the re-election campaign of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, said Mr. Schwarzenegger's victory demonstrated the limits of a pump-up-the-base strategy.

"People should look at what Schwarzenegger did," Mr. Schmidt said. "Candidates that have the ability to reach out and not be dividers are the ones who are going to be successful."

If true, this could complicate the early maneuverings of Mr. McCain and another Republican contender, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, both of whom have aggressively courted the party's conservative base as they follow a variation of Mr. Rove's politics.

Mr. Romney, eager to shed the baggage of being governor of one of the more liberal states in the nation, said he would press ahead in trumpeting his support for tax cuts and opposition to gay marriage.

"There will be people who will try to cast a thumping as supporting their agenda," Mr. Romney said in an interview. "I don't give that a lot of credence."

But Mr. McCain has embarked on a more complicated task, trying to appeal to conservative voters wary of his credentials while not scaring off independent voters who have been part of his own base.

"We have always felt you can appeal to your base and appeal to the broad center of the country at the same time," said John Weaver, a senior political adviser to Mr. McCain. In truth, Mr. McCain's efforts at appeasing both sides have not always been successful, so his speeches to conservatives about the lessons of 2008 should be interesting. He has faced the difficult challenge of trying to appeal at once to conservative voters who are powerful in Republican primary races without alienating independent voters who come into play in the general election.

DOJ_NMG_0093166

A Redoubled Senate Curse Trying to run for the White House from the Senate has never been easy, because voting records are big fat targets for the opposition to research and exploit. Here's a new problem: the 51-49 split. Senators who are running for president are going to find themselves chained to their desks whenever a close vote comes up, ceding the advantage to the class of non-senators, like Mr. Romney, Mr. Vilsack and John Edwards, the Democratic former senator from North Carolina, not to mention leaving the door open to a surprise outsider.

"If you are a Democrat, are you going to explain to organized labor that the minimum wage lost by a single vote in the Senate because you were at the Polk County Fish Fry?" said Ron Klain, who worked as a senior adviser to Vice President Al Gore when he ran for president. "And if you are a Republican," Mr. Klain continued, "are you going to explain to the pro-life groups that federal funding for Medicaid abortions passed by a single vote because you were busy at the Greenville Chamber of Commerce? When I worked for Gore, we had a number of times we had to pull him off the campaign trail because of the risk of a tie vote on a key issue."

There are a lot of senators likely to run for president: Mrs. Clinton, Mr. McCain and Mr. Kerry, along with Evan Bayh of Indiana, Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware. Democrats at least have the advantage, albeit a small one, of heading committees or being able to pass legislation they can run on. Then again, the advantage vanishes if the new Congress, like the current one, is viewed as a failed one.

The War Albatross

If the war bedeviled the Democrats in 2004, it will be a problem for both sides this time — assuming, of course, that James Baker hasn't found a way to end it by the time the race is fully engaged. Mrs. Clinton has become more critical of the conflict than she was at its start, but Democratic primary voters have their litmus tests, and this is one of them. That is encouraging for Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, whose aides are now preparing a campaign plan should he run, given his antiwar credentials. It also presents an opening for Mr. Gore, who has been at the leading edge in opposing the war.

On the Republican side, Mr. McCain is in a unique position. He supports increasing troop strength in Iraq, a position shared by a scant 16 percent of the electorate, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll. The world might well be a very different place two years from now, but if the general election were being held today, Mr. McCain would certainly have a lot of straight talking to do, as he might put it.

A Flight From Washington Americans don't like Washington.

O.K., we knew that. But the intensity of that feeling is going to influence contributors and campaign workers as they try to figure out who the strongest candidates are. And it is influencing emerging candidates as they develop their image. "There's a growing sense that Washington can't get anything done," said Mark Warner, a Democrat and former Virginia governor who had considered running for president in 2008. "I think people's patience with elected officials is very thin at this point."

This could provide an opening for outsiders like Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York. More intriguing, this anti-Washington, anti-partisan wave could provide the perfect environment for a renegade third-party candidate — say, Michael R. Bloomberg, Mr. Giuliani's successor in City Hall. Bloomberg associates have been pressing him to do precisely that.

It certainly does complicate things for anyone from Washington who is trying to run for president.

"They voted against Washington on Tuesday night," said Mr. Bayh, the Indiana senator. That explains why Mr. Bayh on the campaign trail is as likely to emphasize his years as governor as his years in the Senate, and why Mr. Edwards's decision to move out of Georgetown and back to North Carolina seems particularly well-advised this weekend.

Voted Most Likely Not to Succeed This is the most open presidential contest in at least 50 years, and as a result it has already drawn a rather large cast of aspirants. But the campaign of 2006 has, to put it mildly, clearly diminished the prospects of three once-big-name prospective candidates.

Mr. Allen leads the list. He ran a campaign that was marked by missteps, and he may well be remembered as the man who cost Republicans control of the Senate this year. That is not going to endear him to Republican activists or contributors.

Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, his party's contender in 2004, underlined doubts about his political skills when he told what he described as a botched joke, which President Bush pounced on and tried to portray as an insult to American troops. Mr. Kerry's associates said they were resigned to the fact that he would have headed the Democrats' blame list had they lost this time; at least he avoided that designation.

Finally, there's Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader who is retiring but who just last spring won a Republican straw poll in Memphis that he portrayed as a sign of his strength as a presidential contender. No more. A contentious Senate session that failed to produce much major legislation — followed by this loss — has led many Republicans to cross Mr. Frist off their 2008 list.

DOJ_NMG_0093167

The Democrats: Is Winning Winning? (WP)

By Joe Trippi

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Wham! The 2006 midterm elections are over, and the modern conservative era has come to an end.

For the Democrats, a party so long on the outs, it feels good to be back in power. But we can't just revel in yesterday. Democrats have to start looking now to maximize our mandate for the 2008 presidential election.

Because what the voters have done is to kick open the door to a new era in American politics, and their hunger for a new direction didn't end last Tuesday. That's the problem for Arizona Sen. John McCain and what's left of the field vying for the GOP nomination. The Republican nominee will have a hard time trying to chart a new course for the nation while defending an unpopular lame-duck president and trying to breathe life into a conservative ideology that has run out of gas.

No, the real opportunity belongs to Democrats. The voters want change, and they will make it happen. I'm going to make one bold prediction about 2008: Thanks to changes in communications and technology, one of the candidates on my list will raise $500 million, almost all of it from ordinary citizens contributing less than $100 each. Don't believe it? Wait and see. It'll happen, and we'll witness the birth of a new progressive era that could last a generation or more.

So the party's presidential hopefuls won't be fighting just for the nomination, but for the historic chance to help launch that era. As they stand on the threshold of the presidential cycle, here's my assessment of the individual prospects of the many would-be presidents from a resurgent Democratic Party.

Front-runner: Hillary Rodham Clinton

She has it all -- the ability to raise the money; a political team that's among the best, if not the best, in the party; a strong base of support; and an uncanny ability to avoid political mistakes. And I don't care what anyone says -- her husband is one of two rock stars in the Democratic Party and a huge asset.

Ironically, the problem with Clinton's candidacy arises from her strength. Front-runners have something to lose, so they almost always run cautious, safe campaigns. This almost cost John Kerry the nomination in 2004, and could cost the senator from New York the nomination in 2008. Her strength also creates the certainty that a campaign of bold new ideas will emerge to oppose her. She is so strong within the party that, with so many contemplating a run against her, the only viable option for a serious challenger is to put forth innovative ideas in hopes of breaking out of the pack. And there are plenty in the Democratic Party who are capable of doing that.

The "Other" Rock Star: Barack Obama

He's the one candidate who can wrestle Bill Clinton for support in the black community and win. All the others are both thrilled about and terrified of this guy. They're thrilled that he might take black votes from Hillary. They're terrified because he might take a lot more votes from them and become a co-front-runner the day he enters the race, if he does. Obama's obvious downside is inexperience. Three years ago, he was an Illinois state senator; in 2008, he will not have completed his first U.S. Senate term. So he had better have some ideas -- or wait till next time.

The Oxygen Taker: Al Gore

Talk about setting a progressive agenda with bold new ideas. The man is doing it and he doesn't even have a job. In a party that tends to treat its past nominees like lepers, Gore has done an amazing job of reemerging as an important thought leader on issues such as the Iraq war and global warming. If he throws his hat into the ring, he will immediately suck all the oxygen out of the room for most of the other candidates. The media won't be able to stop doing the Hillary vs. Al 800-pound-gorillas-go-at-it stories. Everyone but Obama will be reduced to begging for attention. But entering the race means he suddenly would have something to lose. Could candidate Gore stop himself from playing it safe?

The Champion of 2006: John Edwards

Hands down the guy who improved his position the most this year. Edwards leads the field in early polls in Iowa, which is more important than ever, because the 2008 nominating process is more front-loaded than in prior years. The former North Carolina senator has a bevy of ideas, and is the only Southerner, important to a party that has elected only two presidents in the past 30 years -- both from the South. All of which earns him a down arrow -- because once you take the lead in Iowa, the entire field tries to destroy you. Good luck.

Down but Not Out: John Kerry

The former presidential nominee was doing quite well until the "botched joke." Democratic losses in the House or Senate would have made a comeback impossible, so no one was happier than Kerry last Tuesday. The senator from Massachusetts is going to need to present some bold ideas to regain relevance in this field; I'd start with Iraq. And for those who want to count this guy out: He has come back from the dead before. Trust me, I speak from experience. Handicaps? It's all up from here or he's out.

DOJ_NMG_0093168

Chairman of Foreign Relations: Joe Biden

The senator from Delaware is doing what Kerry should do: taking the lead on the Iraq war and staking out ideas for bringing our troops home safely. But the down arrow stays until someone gets this guy to shut up and listen.

Running to the Right: Evan Bayh

A senator who has actually run a government, the former governor of Indiana also hails from the region that may be most critical to a Democratic electoral victory -- the Midwest. In 2004, Democrats lost Missouri and Ohio, electoral votes that would have put Kerry over the top. Bayh could be the best bet for picking up three or four Midwestern states. He seems to be running to Clinton's right, which will prove to be either pure genius (he has a lane all to himself) or a disaster -- ask President Joe Lieberman.

The One to Watch: Russ Feingold

Perhaps the most authentic candidate, the senator from Wisconsin has a deep connection to the grass roots and is a favorite of the party's progressive wing. If President Bush stays stubborn on Iraq and the rest of the field plays it safe, Feingold could get very hot.

A R?sum? to Die For: Bill Richardson

He'd be the first Hispanic to make a presidential run, and his r?sum? covers nearly every issue, foreign or domestic. Need bold ideas on immigration? New Mexico Gov. Richardson has grappled with that. Ideas on energy? Ask former energy secretary Richardson. How to deal with a nuclear North Korea? Former U.N. ambassador Richardson knows the turf. But can he raise the money, and earn enough early support to get his ideas into the mix?

The General: Wesley Clark

He still has a strong following among progressives and the netroots and could get traction if there's no consensus on a new Iraq strategy soon.

More Than a Cameo: Tom Vilsack

I thought the Iowa governor's candidacy was a cameo until I saw him speak at Renaissance Weekend last year. He clearly gets that this will be an election about ideas. Vilsack will have a tough fight -- but I'm the last guy to bet against a governor from a small rural state.

So there they are, the leading contenders (and there'll surely be more). To get the chance to lead the nation in meeting the challenges of the next decade -- globalization, energy, health care, terrorism -- the winner will need to break out of the ideological box and stop defending the ideas of the past. Gore or Bayh could run a campaign like that and possibly pass a cautious Clinton to win. But if Clinton or Obama runs such a campaign, the 2008 election could be even more historic than the wave of change we witnessed last Tuesday.

Is America Too Racist For Barack? Too Sexist For Hillary? (WP)

By Benjamin Wallace-Wells

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

The 2006 elections were for the technocrats and the operatives, pitting the Democratic tacticians against the Karl Rove machine. But the next election is already beginning to look quite different: 2008 may be one for the novelists.

Viewers of the election returns late on Tuesday, after all, got an early start on the iconography of the next presidential race. The cable networks' cameras cut between Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, thanking her supporters for an overwhelming victory in the New York Senate race, her husband standing pointedly behind, and a smiling Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, giving cautious, professorial analysis to the television viewers. Nobody noted the significance, but it stared us all in the face: The two presumed leading contenders for the Democratic presidential nomination are a woman and an African American.

Their candidacies -- coming after elections resulting in the presumed first female speaker of the House and the second black governor since Reconstruction -- suggest that the next elections may play in ways that are more cultural and symbolic than tactical and political. Are Americans ready to put a black man or a woman in charge of the country? And does the hefty symbolism that Obama and Clinton would bring help one of them more than the other -- in other words, is the country more racist or more sexist?

Democracies are awkward like this. Despite incessant polling, we really get only one moment every two years, at best, to measure how Americans feel about things, and these elections must stand as imperfect proxies for a mess of subjects: what we think about religion, whether we like being included in the international conversation, whether Northeast bluebloods would tolerate a Texan as their leader.

But when it comes to race and sex, this seems a slightly more legitimate game: The question that remains for black Americans and women isn't whether prejudice has diffused to the point that they can participate in the United States, it's whether they can legitimately hope to lead it.

DOJ_NMG_0093169

Today, they may have reasons to be optimistic. Poll numbers for Clinton and Obama are among the strongest of any presidential hopefuls. It now seems nearly as common for political leaders in television shows and movies to be women or racial minorities as white men. Recent polls have found that the percentages of Americans who say they would not vote for a hypothetical black or female presidential candidate, long formidable, have dwindled into the single digits. And last Tuesday's elections put House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on the brink of becoming speaker and Democrat Deval Patrick, who is black, in the Massachusetts governorship.

But as the two would-be presidential candidates grapple with how to manage the legacies of their own identities, Obama seems engaged with a more problematic political feeling. Even if race is more socially crippling than gender -- even if it was less likely that Obama would make it to Harvard Law than that Clinton would make it to Yale Law -- the symbolism of race can also be awfully empowering to individual politicians who learn to harness it. Most Americans want to believe that the culture has moved past its racial problems, and that the symbol of that progress would be widely cheered. Compared with Clinton, says George Lakoff, a linguistics professor and Democratic message guru, "Obama clearly has it better."

Whatever racism remains in this country, it coexists with a galloping desire to put that old race stuff behind us, to have a national Goodbye to All That moment. The most recent such occasion was Obama's much-publicized tour to promote his book of policy prescriptions, "The Audacity of Hope." The Denver Post called him a "rock star," the Seattle Times found him "electrifying," and even the Deseret News in Salt Lake City described the "raucous greeting" he received in Utah. This rapture wasn't only because of what Obama has said; most of his audiences had not heard much from him or read much of his book. It was because he symbolizes the possibility of a more modern America.

Clinton had a best-selling autobiography and a media-heavy book tour, too, but the coverage had less to do with the symbolism she carried as a woman than with her history as Bill Clinton's wife, and with the way she was positioning herself for the future. There are many reasons for this difference, but one critical one has to do with the legacies of oppression that each inherits. While many Americans have a sincere sense of sentimentality and nostalgia for what Clinton may consider outdated gender roles, a much smaller number have that kind of feeling for racial segregation. There is the sense that, by electing a female president, the nation would be meeting a standard set by other liberal democracies; the election of a black man, by contrast, would be a particularly American achievement, an affirmation of American ideals and a celebration of American circumstances.

Obama's mixed-race heritage is rarely far from his political conversation. He writes of having a Kansan mother "as white as milk," and a Kenyan father "as black as pitch." He has used his race explicitly while speaking in Africa and urging politicians there to move beyond tribalism, and implicitly while speaking in southern Illinois to punctuate an address about the challenges of globalization. In his speeches, Obama uses his simple presence as an establishment national political figure who is black to serve as a metaphorical exclamation point -- a visual assurance that the country can work for everyone.

This is how he used it in his most famous speech, at the 2004 Democratic National Convention: "I stand here today, grateful for the diversity of my heritage, aware that my parents' dreams live on in my two precious daughters. I stand here knowing that my story is part of the larger American story, that I owe a debt to all of those who came before me, and that, in no other country on Earth, is my story even possible."

When Clinton gives a speech, her gender is just as evident, but she doesn't give it nearly the same kind of rhetorical prominence. She is as likely to talk about handing out buttons for Republican Barry Goldwater as a child as about what her presence as a political woman means for the country. Her most famous speech during the current political cycle dealt with a topic close to her own identity: In January 2005, she gave a widely praised talk to a group of New York state family-planning providers, telling them that the pro-choice movement had failed to acknowledge the great emotional cost involved in having an abortion. For Clinton, a hero to many women who support abortion rights, this was regarded as a particularly brave stance.

But in a speech about such a personal topic, what is most noteworthy is its impersonality. Clinton didn't mention her own experiences as a wife or a mother, but seized upon a trip she took to Romania as first lady, where she learned about the policies of the dictatorship of Nicolae Ceausescu, who tried to force every woman to have five children for the glory of the state, subjecting them to monthly roundups and reproductive exams attended by the secret police. It's a striking story, but what's even more striking is the way Clinton introduced it: "My own views of family planning and reproductive rights are heavily influenced by my travels as first lady," she said. This is not only the kind of thing that Sen. Joe Biden might say, but it also sounds suspicious: Were Clinton's views on these issues not fully formed before she began traveling as first lady?

The contrast is vivid in the two senators' autobiographies. Obama's, "Dreams From My Father," is an attempt to explain his evolving political awareness as a direct articulation of his roots. Here is the way Clinton begins her life story, "Living History": "I wasn't born a first lady or a senator. I wasn't born a Democrat. I wasn't born a lawyer or an advocate for women's rights and human rights. I wasn't born a wife or a mother."

DOJ_NMG_0093170

Part of this difference is simple personal style. And there's also the matter of learned political behavior: Clinton has spent a decade and a half being beaten up, often personally and viciously, for the intersection of her gender and her politics, and it would make sense if she were trying to disconnect the two. But there is something else here.

The political progress of women and African Americans has long been intertwined; the suffragette movement gained huge momentum from the complaint that black men had received the right to vote before women of any race. But when it comes to modern political leadership, women have become more present. In January, the Senate will have 16 women and one African American, while eight women and one African American will be governors. Geraldine Ferraro was a vice presidential running mate more than 20 years ago, and still no black politician has reached that plateau.

Gender, meanwhile, may have become part of the political wallpaper. When Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. and Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele ran for Senate this fall, their race was mentioned in virtually every story; when Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Claire McCaskill ran, their gender was barely noted. The ferocity of national feelings about race can still be threatening; this election cycle saw the widely condemned race-baiting ads run against Ford in Tennessee. But if the nation feels its racial sins more clearly, it also has a more urgent desire to get past them. "I think gender has become more normal in leadership," said Marie Wilson, president of the White House Project, a New York nonprofit that works to develop female leaders with the goal of having a woman in the White House. "Race is a much more troubling, sadder, unresolved part of our history than the issue of gender, so it certainly looms larger."

Of course, the civil rights and women's rights movements of the 1960s have left vastly different legacies. No political figure would dare deny the saintliness of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.; Betty Friedan's name is a political dirty word. Repression of blacks was the stuff of massive state-leveraged cruelty -- the police dogs and fire hoses -- while repression of women in this country was made of quieter stuff: bras, aprons and constitutional amendments.

Obama is frequently called post-racial, the suggestion being that because he has an exotic background, Americans are looking at a newer model of a human. The metaphor works for Obama politically, because it contains the idea that his youth lets him create a more modern and inclusive brand of politics than the rhetoric of civil rights-era politicians such as Jesse Jackson. Clinton's Jesse Jacksons are Ferraro, who bombed, and Pelosi, who is still hanging around.

This is the ultimate imbalance between the would-be presidential contenders, and it's both rough on Clinton and helps explain why Obama's public presentation is so much more closely linked to his identity: There's a model for being post-racial, but there's no easy way to be post-gender.

Fredrick Harris, a political scientist at the University of Rochester, sees a post-gender future out there, and its name is Condoleezza Rice. The secretary of state, he notes, "is unmarried, has no children, is completely dedicated to her job, for pleasure she plays the piano and works and that's about it."

Clinton has made different choices, but they have their limits. Politically, she has done everything that Obama has done: She has become a serious policy professional, moved toward the center and renounced the excesses of 1960s-style identity politics. And yet these moves are received as the tacks of a smart politician. For Obama, they are received as the arrival of his race.

Benjamin Wallace-Wells writes on national affairs for Rolling Stone.

Life Expectancy Increases For H.I.V. Patients (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

ATLANTA, Nov. 11 (AP) — An American found to have the virus that causes AIDS can expect to live for about 24 years on average, and the cost of health care over that time is more than $600,000, new research indicates.

Both life expectancy and the cost of care have risen from earlier estimates, mainly because of expensive and effective drug therapies, said Dr. Bruce Schackman, an assistant professor of public health at the Weill Medical College of Cornell University in New York and the study's lead author.

The research found the average annual cost of care was $25,200, about 40 percent higher than a commonly cited estimate from the late 1990s. A 1993 estimate of life expectancy for a symptomless person infected with H.I.V. was less than seven years.

The new study appears in the November edition of the peer-reviewed journal Medical Care.

Since the mid-1990s, about two dozen H.I.V.-fighting antiretroviral drugs have come onto the market that have essentially turned the virus from a death sentence into a chronic disease.

Physicians now understand life expectancy after H.I.V. diagnosis to be two decades or more, and the new study supports that belief.

The researchers drew most of their data from 18 medical practices across the United States that provide care for 14,000 patients. The researchers looked at the records of about 7,000 of those patients.

DOJ_NMG_0093171

They used a computer simulation model to project H.I.V. medical care costs and concluded that the average lifetime cost of care was $618,000 per person. The researchers estimated the monthly cost of care at $2,100, with about two-thirds of that spent on medications. That equates to $25,200 a year.

A typical regimen for an H.I.V. patient beginning treatment includes the drug efavirenz, which blocks a certain protein that H.I.V. needs to make copies of itself. It also includes tenofovir and emtricitabine or some similar drug that helps keep the virus from reproducing.

The monthly cost just for that regimen was about $1,140 in 2004, Dr. Schackman and the other researchers said. If that treatment does not work or stops working, the patient is switched to more expensive arrays of drugs.

In their cost estimates, the researchers aimed high, basing their numbers on the best available drugs and the best standards of care. But that is not always what is provided, some H.I.V. policy experts noted.

For example, a 2003 federal study concluded that only 55 percent of H.I.V. patients who should have been on virus-fighting medications were actually getting them.

“This is really an optimistic scenario” in the study, and the true cost is probably lower, said Jennifer Kates, director of H.I.V. policy for the Kaiser Family Foundation.

However, Ms. Kates added that since people living with H.I.V. should be getting optimal care from doctors experienced in treating the virus, the study’s expectations were reasonable.

Memorial Planners Have A Dream, Too (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

Ground will be broken in many ways tomorrow morning with a ceremony heralding construction of the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial on the Mall.

The memorial, scheduled to be completed in 2008, will mark a change in the very character of some of America's most hallowed real estate.

The Mall is lined with memorials to wars and the soldiers who died in them and marble monuments to great presidents. But this addition to Washington's monumental core will be a unique paean to the man and the ideal that it honors -- a civilian and an African American who embodied the American tradition of peaceful protest and activism.

"I think, like many kids, I came to D.C. years ago and saw all the monuments," said Harry E. Johnson Sr., president of the Washington, D.C. Martin Luther King, Jr. National Memorial Project Foundation Inc. "But there never was a memorial to a man of color, a man of peace.

"And even today, there is nothing to place King in the proper historical context. He is among the giants of our country, though he was not a war hero nor a president," Johnson added.

Tomorrow's groundbreaking ceremony is expected to draw 5,000 people. It will feature former president Bill Clinton, who signed the 1996 bill authorizing the memorial. Talk show host Oprah Winfrey and poet Maya Angelou also will speak.

They will gather at the sweeping four-acre site along the Tidal Basin that sits halfway between monuments to Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, and Lincoln, liberator of slaves. The crescent-shaped memorial park will be near the steps leading to the Lincoln Memorial, where King gave his electrifying "I Have a Dream" speech in 1963.

Cranes and backhoes won't move in immediately, however. This groundbreaking is ceremonial, and the construction permits from either the secretary of the Interior or the General Services Administration will be issued once fundraising is complete. In the case of the World War II Memorial, permits were issued two months after the groundbreaking ceremony attended by about 10,000 people on Veterans Day 2000.

The design of the memorial park is the physical articulation of one of the most famous and powerful passages in King's 1963 Washington speech.

After outlining the dream of his children growing up to live in a nation where people are judged by the content of their character, where even in the racist South black and white children would join hands as sisters and brothers, he added:

"This hope is our hope. This is the faith that I go back to the South with. And with this faith, we will be able to hew out of the mountain of despair a stone of hope. With this faith we will be able to work together, to pray together, to struggle together, to go to jail together, to stand up for freedom together, knowing that we will be free one day."

At the memorial to King's vision, visitors will enter through a 12-foot-wide cut in the wall, walking through a tall, dark passage symbolizing the Mountain of Despair.

Once visitors pass through the portal, the view of the Tidal Basin's waters and ring of trees will unfold. The giant stone piece removed from the wall to create the opening will be in the middle of the plaza. King's image will be sculpted from it, emerging from the rough-hewn Stone of Hope.

DOJ_NMG_0093172

The design team is working on plans to create waterfalls that will flow in a syncopated rhythm reflecting King's oratory style, cascading over a wall engraved with his words.

The design, created by the ROMA Design Group of San Francisco, has had an unusually warm reception since it was unveiled in 2000, compared with the harsh criticism that stalled other contemporary memorials.

Many considered the Vietnam Veterans Memorial too modern and abstract when it was introduced in 1981. The World War II Memorial was called too large and complicated for such a prominent spot on the Mall when construction began in 2001.

The King Memorial's design has received resounding kudos.

"It's very elegant and simple and moving," Thomas Luebke, secretary of the U.S. Commission of Fine Arts, said. "It's interesting that on part of the Mall, there is a theme developing. It is less about war and more about ideas and aspirations."

The prominent site was authorized by Congress in 1998. Its place was secured even after Congress passed the Reserve Act of 2003 forbidding further construction in the core of the Mall. The King Memorial is likely to be one of the last giant monuments to furnish the nation's front yard.

The biggest obstacle the memorial has faced is money. And that's part of the message its backers will send during tomorrow's ceremonial groundbreaking.

They have raised almost two-thirds of the $100 million needed to build. Efforts have been beset by delays.

"The fundraising is difficult, period," Johnson said. "There is always something else looking for attention of the donors. There was 9/11, then the tsunami, then Hurricane Katrina."

In 2001, the foundation struggled with King's family, which wanted a fee for the use of the slain civil right's leaders name. An agreement was eventually reached and no fee paid.

But the delay pushed the foundation up against the December 2003 deadline imposed by Congress to complete the monument, and it had to apply for an extension.

Supporters of the memorial would like to finish fundraising before the eventual construction of the National Museum of African American Culture and History, slated for Constitution Avenue and 14th Street NW on the Mall. It will be tapping much of the same donor base that the King memorial is targeting.

"We want to be out of the way before the museum starts up, so there's no competition for donations," Johnson said. "We're accepting donations, from $1 on up. If only everyone in America gave us $1."

The System Worked (WP)

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

AN ESTIMATED 83 million Americans voted in last week's elections. Some people encountered difficulties, but not of the scale or scope that had been predicted by Election Day doomsayers. Overall the voting system worked.

Because the vote of every person is so important, problems are not to be minimized. It is unconscionable that some Prince George's County voters had to wait in line for four hours to vote. It is disturbing that Virginia election officials received reports of people being given incorrect information in an apparent effort to intimidate them not to vote. Balky voting machines, faulty software and disputes over whether voters were properly registered cropped up across the country.

Local and national election officials must focus on these problems as they assess their election night performance so that further improvements can be made. By the same token, the politicians and critics of electronic voting who tried to undermine public confidence should be mindful that the chaos they predicted did not occur. They should be responsible in their future suggestions for change.

No one denies there are shortcomings. The generational decline in voter turnout is more reason than ever to figure out better ways to encourage voting. Is early voting a good idea? Should Election Day be a national holiday? How about adopting Oregon's system of voting by mail? All are ideas worthy of consideration, but let's not fool with parts of the process that aren't broken.

A key here is the public's belief that the votes they cast will be counted. That confidence was reflected in national exit polls showing that 88 percent of Americans trust the system. More telling, though, was the way the nation accepted without question the outcome of two razor-thin contests that decided which party was going to control the U.S. Senate.

Let Naturalized Americans Run For President (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 12, 2006

ON TUESDAY, CITIZENS in an electoral-vote-rich state reelected a governor who had once seemed in danger of defeat. That sort of political resurrection ordinarily would be good for a mention or two in the endless speculation about 2008 presidential candidates. Unfortunately, this reelected governor can forget about aspiring to the highest office in the land.

DOJ_NMG_0093173

Why? Because the governor, though eligible to administer a major state of the union, is barred from the White House by Article II, Section 1 of the U.S. Constitution, which says: "No person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President."

A reflection of the framers' worries about meddling in the new nation's affairs by European monarchies, this restriction makes no sense in the 21st century, when even opponents of legalizing undocumented aliens acknowledge that this is a nation of immigrants. It's insulting that a legal immigrant to the U.S. who has twice won election as governor cannot aspire to the presidency.

The Constitution shouldn't be amended lightly. But this is a matter of principle: a core principle about the equality of opportunity in our society to strive for the highest office. Congress and state legislatures should adopt a 28th Amendment to the Constitution that would put all citizens 35 and older on equal footing when it comes to the highest office in the land. Americans should be free to decide whether they want to be led by President Jennifer Granholm.

Gotcha! Who'd you think we were talking about? Jennifer Granholm, a naturalized American who was born in Canada, was reelected governor of Michigan on Tuesday. Were you perhaps thinking of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger?

In this nation of immigrants, there will always be individuals affected by this arcane discrimination, and the urgency to address the matter should not be dampened by partisan concerns that it may help one candidate or another. Indeed, it would be nice to see California Democrats spearhead the movement, even if it could theoretically benefit our Austrian-born governor.

If Americans wanted Schwarzenegger in the White House, the fact that he is a naturalized citizen (who no doubt appreciates his earned U.S. citizenship a lot more than many people born here) is no reason to deprive them of that choice.

The requirement that the president be a "natural born" citizen excludes not only immigrants who came here as adults or teenagers but also every infant adopted from abroad who will remember no other homeland but the United States. And it sends them a message that, regardless of anything else they feel or do in their lifetime, they can't really be full, trustworthy Americans.

Congress has taken some of the sting out of the "natural born" requirement, enacting legislation that makes it clear that some children born of Americans living abroad are more "natural" than others. But to excise the "natural born" requirement entirely will require a constitutional amendment, and that means approval by two-thirds of the House and Senate and three-fourths of the states. Congress should at least hold hearings on this proposal.

It's admittedly an uphill battle. Polls show little support for such an amendment. But a campaign on its behalf (featuring such notable foreign-born Americans as Michael J. Fox, former Intel Chief Executive Andy Grove, Henry Kissinger and Madeleine Albright) would strive to correct a historical wrong and would serve as the perfect antidote to the acrimonious debate surrounding illegal immigration.

The Corporate End Run (NYT)

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

Corporate profits are at record levels. The Dow, too, has climbed past its high-water mark from the dot-com era. Executives reap bigger and bigger paydays, even as wages have stagnated. Meanwhile, the widening investigation into stock-option backdating reminds us that the corporate malfeasance era was much more than just a couple of bad apples like Enron and WorldCom.

It seems almost unbelievable, then, that corporate America would pick this moment to beg for relaxed regulation and enforcement, as well as more protection from investors' lawsuits. But as Stephen Labaton reported recently in The Times, industry groups are seeking broad new protections for corporations and accounting firms, not through legislation but from the Bush administration through agency rule changes.

The rationale is that the high cost of complying with the corporate governance law, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, along with runaway lawsuits have scared foreign companies away from American stock exchanges. The timing is particularly odd given that the compliance costs associated with the much-reviled Section 404 of Sarbanes-Oxley — which requires audits of companies' internal financial controls — fell last year, as did the number of investor lawsuits, for the second year in a row.

What has actually happened is that opponents of regulation believe that the coast is clear. The law's namesakes, Paul Sarbanes and Michael Oxley, are retiring. Kenneth Lay of Enron is dead. The time appears ripe for rollbacks.

Advocates of big business like to point to a sharp decline in the United States' share of global initial stock offerings between 2000 and 2005, hoping that everyone will infer that the cause was the passage of Sarbanes-Oxley in 2002. In fact, that share had been declining since 1996, even before the Asian financial crisis. It hit bottom in 2001 and has risen since.

United States markets lost their dominance of initial stock offerings for numerous reasons that had little to do with regulation. Some of last year's biggest deals were Chinese and French privatizations. Markets elsewhere are bigger and more liquid than they once were. There are also intangibles, such as America's recent unpopularity, increased barriers for visa seekers and extraordinary budget and trade deficits, which might make an issuer think twice about a dollar-denominated stock.

DOJ_NMG_0093174

The London Stock Exchange, one of the leading beneficiaries of the American decline, commissioned a study showing that underwriting fees in London are just 3 percent to 4 percent of a transaction, compared with an average of 6.5 percent to 7 percent in the United States.

When workers confront globalization, they are told to adapt, take their pink slips and go to night school. It is the harsh downside of an integrated world economy that has on balance significantly enriched the country. When financiers feel the pinch from competition in Hong Kong and London, they run to the Bush administration for rule changes.

America's investor protections and corporate regulations have made it a nation of share owners, with almost 57 million American households owning stocks either directly or through mutual funds. The Securities and Exchange Commission has already signaled that it will smooth the implementation of Sarbanes-Oxley, especially for smaller companies. And abuses of the private litigation system like pay-to-play should be stopped. There is room for reform. But over all, the system is working. It may need tweaks, but it does not need a revamping.

U.S. Vetoes Security Council Resolution Assailing Israel For Attacks (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 11 — The United States vetoed a Security Council resolution on Saturday that condemned Israel for its military actions in Gaza and called for an immediate withdrawal of Israeli forces from the area.

The United States ambassador, John R. Bolton, told the Council that the resolution "does not display an even-handed characterization of the recent events in Gaza, nor does it advance the cause of Israeli-Palestinian peace."

The resolution, introduced by Qatar, the Arab representative on the Council, had been amended during two days of negotiations to meet objections that it was not balanced. But Mr. Bolton said it remained "in many places biased against Israel and politically motivated."

In the vote, 4 countries abstained — Britain, Denmark, Japan and Slovakia — and 10 were in favor — Argentina, China, Congo, France, Ghana, Greece, Peru, Russia, Qatar and Tanzania.

The original draft had made no mention of Palestinian rocket strikes into Israel and accused Israel of conducting a "massacre" of civilians in its attack at Beit Hanun on Wednesday that killed 18 civilians.

New language was inserted condemning the firing of rockets from Gaza into Israel and calling upon the Palestinian Authority to take "immediate and sustained action" to end the rocket fire. But while the resolution named Israel as liable for the attacks on Gaza, it was silent on who or what group was responsible for the attacks on Israel.

In other changes, a reference to "indiscriminate" Israeli violence became "disproportionate" violence, and the words "military assault," "aggression" and "massacre" were dropped in favor of the general phrase "military operations."

Another provision had proposed that a new United Nations observer force be sent into the area to monitor a cease-fire, but it was substituted with language suggested by France that called for the creation of "an international mechanism for the protection of civilians."

Mr. Bolton said the United States considered this "a promise which is unwise and unnecessary and which, at any rate, raises false hopes."

The resolution that was voted on requested that Secretary General Kofi Annan establish a fact-finding mission to investigate Wednesday's attack and report back within 30 days and called for the resumption of international efforts to achieve peace by the so-called quartet — the United Nations, the European Union, Russia and the United States.

Israel has apologized for the deaths at Beit Hanun, blaming a "technical error," and has announced its own investigation of the episode. But it has said it will continue to try to stop militants from launching rockets into Israel from Gaza.

The United States traditionally opposes what it considers one-sided Security Council resolutions on Israel, and Saturday's vote was the fourth time in three years that Washington had taken such action.

In July the United States vetoed another resolution on Gaza; in March 2004 it vetoed a resolution condemning Israel for killing the Hamas leader, Sheik Ahmed Yassin; and in December 2003 it blocked a measure protesting the construction of the Israeli separation barrier in the West Bank.

Almost all of the 45 nations that spoke during a daylong debate on the Middle East on Thursday condemned Israel. Arab nations are now expected to move for a vote in the 192-member General Assembly, a path they have followed in the past when such measures have failed to pass the Security Council.

Unlike Security Council resolutions, those passed in the General Assembly are nonbinding and largely symbolic. But they generally attract widespread support when Israel, and, by extension, the United States, are the targets.

DOJ_NMG_0093175

Jean-Marc de la Sablière, the French ambassador, said he felt the final negotiated text was “a balanced one” and would have sent the right message to both Israel and the Palestinians. He added, “I hope that the fact this text has not been adopted will not renew tensions on the ground.”

U.S. Vetoes Condemnation Of Gaza Strikes (AP)

By Justin Bergman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 12, 2006

The United States vetoed a U.N. Security Council draft resolution Saturday that sought to condemn an Israeli military offensive in the Gaza Strip and demand Israeli troops pull out of the territory.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said the Arab-backed draft resolution was "biased against Israel and politically motivated."

"This resolution does not display an evenhanded characterization of the recent events in Gaza, nor does it advance the cause of Israeli-Palestinian peace to which we aspire and for which we are working assiduously," he told the Security Council.

The veto unleashed a flurry of criticism in the Middle East.

"This decision by the U.S. government gives unlimited cover to commit more massacres of innocent Palestinians," said Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government. "This is a shame on the American administration, which says it is trying to promote human rights and democracy in the Middle East."

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, however, the draft resolution would have aggravated the situation in Gaza because it contained "inflammatory and unnecessary language."

"We do not believe the resolution was designed to contribute to the cause of peace," she said in a statement.

In Jerusalem, Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev agreed the draft was one-sided. "It's good that it wasn't accepted by the Security Council," he said.

The draft received 10 votes in favor and four abstentions, along with the U.S. vote against. Britain, Denmark, Japan and Slovakia all abstained. The U.S. is one of five permanent members of the council that have the power to veto resolutions.

It was the second U.S. veto this year of a Security Council draft resolution concerning Israeli military operations in Gaza. The U.S. blocked action on a document this summer after Israel launched its offensive in response to the capture of an Israeli soldier by Hamas-linked Palestinian militants.

Palestinians strengthened calls for Security Council action after an early morning Israeli artillery barrage in the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun killed 19 people Wednesday.

In an open session of the General Assembly on Thursday, Palestinian U.N. observer Riyad Mansour called the attack "state terrorism" and said the perpetrators should be held accountable under international law for war crimes.

Israel has expressed regret for the loss of life in Beit Hanoun but said it will continue operations to stop militants from launching rockets into Israel. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is scheduled to visit Washington on Sunday to meet with President Bush.

Qatar's U.N. Ambassador Nassir Al-Nasser warned in the Security Council meeting that the failure of the body to act on the draft would lead to more Israeli violence against Palestinians.

"Any lukewarm reaction or response on our part gives the impression we are shirking from our humanitarian responsibilities," said Al-Nasser, who sponsored the resolution on behalf of the Palestinians. Qatar is the only Arab nation on the council.

Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa said the veto "will only increase the anger" toward Israel, and Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit accused the Security Council of "turning a blind eye to Israeli acts in Gaza."

The Arab League was planning to hold an emergency meeting of foreign ministers in Cairo, Egypt, on Sunday to decide how to respond the latest Israeli offensive.

The draft resolution had been weakened slightly in recent days to help improve its chances of passage. A section was added demanding the Palestinian Authority take immediate action to bring an end to violence, including the firing of rockets into Israel.

It also called for the U.N. secretary-general to establish a "fact-finding mission" to probe Wednesday's attack in Beit Hanoun, a step below ordering a full investigation.

In addition, it backed off calls for U.N. observers to be placed on the Gaza-Israel border, asking instead for the "possible establishment of an international mechanism for protection of the civilian populations."

In his remarks to the Security Council, Bolton said the draft was still too one-sided. He said it compared legal Israeli military operations with the firing of rockets into Israel — an act of terrorism. He called the fact-finding mission unnecessary and said the text failed to condemn the ruling Hamas party's refusal to renounce terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0093176

Both Bolton and Deputy British Ambassador Karen Pierce voiced support for returning to the internationally backed "road map" peace plan, which has been stalled for years.

But Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at The Brookings Institution, said the fact that the council allowed the draft to go to a vote showed the world's frustration with the U.S. not involving other members of the so-called Quartet of Mideast mediators in recent decisions on Israel. The other members are the U.N., the European Union and Russia.

"They don't have a stake in the talks and they are more willing now to force our hand," he said. "A lot of times the world has felt (the U.S.) has been too pro-Israel, but in this case, people are just fed up."

Associated Press Writer Omar Sinan contributed to this report from Cairo, Egypt.

Hamas Official: Unity Gov't Deal Near (AP)

By Albert Aji, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 12, 2006

A senior Hamas official said that a deal on forming a Palestinian national unity government was near, adding that an agreement on a new prime minister has been reached.

"There is some progress on this issue and in the next days, God willing, the remaining outstanding issues will be resolved," Moussa Abu Marzouk, deputy leader of Hamas' political bureau in Syria, said in a telephone interview late Friday with The Associated Press.

He spoke following talks in Damascus with Farouk Kaddoumi, the head of the Palestine Liberation Organization's political wing.

Abu Marzouk said Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas officials have agreed on a candidate for the Palestinian prime minister, but declined to disclose the candidate's name, saying: "It will be disclosed at the suitable time."

Abbas said Saturday from the West Bank that he hoped to form a coalition government with the Islamic Hamas party by the end of the month.

"I tell my people that we have achieved great progress on the way to forming a national unity government that can end the siege and open the horizons for political solutions that will end the occupation forever," Abbas said at a ceremony marking two years since the death of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Tens of thousands of Palestinians converged on Arafat's gravesite in a rally that also appeared aimed at reinvigorating his faltering Fatah Party.

Fatah bused in Palestinians from across the West Bank for the event, dropping many of them in the center of Ramallah — the Palestinians' de facto capital. Carrying Fatah banners and pictures of Arafat, they marched through the city to the compound that served as the late leader's headquarters.

Top Palestinian officials laid wreaths at the glass shrine atop Arafat's grave inside the compound and read verses from the Quran, the Muslim holy book, while crowds filled the nearby courtyard. A massive picture of Arafat stood nearby.

Meanwhile, thousands of Palestinian students in the West Bank and Gaza Strip returned to school Saturday after a two-month teachers strike.

Clamoring into school buildings that stood empty during the strike, small children and teenagers greeted their classmates with excitement.

Some 40,000 teachers launched the strike at the start of the school year in September, protesting the Hamas-led government's failure to pay their salaries since it came to power in March. International sanctions have made it largely impossible for the Hamas government to pay its 165,000 civil servants, causing widespread hardship in the West Bank and Gaza.

The Hamas-run Education Ministry vowed earlier in the week to begin paying teachers, and scraped together enough cash to pay them a partial salary.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Friday he would be willing to sacrifice his job if the international community would lift economic sanctions that have crippled his Hamas-led government.

His statement was the latest indication that the Hamas was nearing a deal to form a national unity government with Abbas' moderate Fatah Party that would be made up of independent experts.

"All the measures undertaken by Hamas aim at breaking the siege on the Palestinian people, otherwise there would be no need for (government) change," Abu Marzouk said.

Kaddoumi, who had held talks in Damascus with Khaled Mashaal, head of Hamas' political bureau, said before leaving Damascus late Friday for Iran that talks over the formation of the government have achieved progress.

"But there are still some details that need to be worked out," he told reporters in Damascus.

Talks Collapse In Lebanon As Shiites Vacate The Cabinet (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0093177

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 11 — Lebanon was thrown into a political crisis Saturday when talks broke down over giving the militant faction Hezbollah and its political allies greater control of the government. Almost immediately, cabinet ministers from the group and the other main Shiite party resigned.

Lebanon's political leaders have held talks for four days, trying to defuse tensions among the various government factions after Hezbollah demanded a greater role in the cabinet and called for its alliance to have veto power over all government decisions. Hezbollah was politically emboldened after its 34-day war with Israel this summer, and it quickly pressed for more power.

Though for days it appeared the talks were headed toward a compromise, the negotiations collapsed when Hezbollah refused to relinquish its demand for a veto, people in the talks said. When the governing coalition refused, the talks collapsed, and within three hours the political brinksmanship began with all of the Shiite ministers resigning.

Under the accord that ended the civil war, called the Taif Agreement and signed in 1989, the government must include members from all the country's main sects. With the departure of the Shiites, it now becomes an interim government with the authority only to handle day-to-day management of the country.

"It is an escalation," said Hilal Khashan, a professor of political science at American University of Beirut. "They are telling them they are willing to stage confrontations."

Lebanon's political stability, and the success or failure of the sitting government, is not just consequential for this country of four million. It is part of a broader contest between the United States, which backs the government coalition, and Iran and Syria, which support Hezbollah.

One of the crucial decisions coming up, and one that cannot be addressed by an interim government, is whether to approve a law to participate in an international tribunal on the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister. The investigation into the killing has implicated Syrian officials. And on Friday, the United Nations Security Council presented Lebanon with a draft proposal for a framework of a tribunal to pursue the case.

"The reason behind the resignation is the international tribunal," said Akram Chehayeb, a member of Parliament who belongs to the governing coalition, adding that the pro-Syrian parties had hoped Russia would have altered the proposal to their liking.

In a joint statement, the two main Shiite parties, Amal and Hezbollah, said their ministers had resigned because the government had entered the talks with conditions.

"We will not go along with anything that we are not convinced with and would damage the higher national interest," the statement said.

Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, had threatened to stage street demonstrations aimed at bringing down the American-backed government if his alliance's demands for greater power were not met by Monday. After the talks collapsed, Sheik Nasrallah's deputy, Sheik Naim Qassem, said at a news conference that his group would study what happened and might decide to demonstrate.

"What we are going to do is study very carefully what happened today, and we will take the appropriate decision," Mr. Qassem said. "Either we will wait with little patience, to give a chance for the talks to come up with a result if such a chance is available, or we will discuss with our allies the program of our protests, which will be wide, God willing."

Not longer after, the ministers resigned, and officials from the governing coalition were saying that if Hezbollah took to the streets, its supporters might as well.

Shortly after talks began, it appeared that the sides would be able to find a compromise. One proposal was to bring Hezbollah's main ally, the Free Patriotic Movement, into the government without granting veto power. One particular fear among members of the governing coalition was that with veto power, Hezbollah could paralyze the government and block the adoption of the international tribunal.

Former President Amine Gemayel, leader of the small Christian Phalange party, said Saturday that the mood in the room during the negotiations was "cold, very cold." He said that the governing coalition was adamant about not giving Hezbollah the one-third plus one seats it would need for veto power. "They are still insisting on having the third of the government," Mr. Gemayel said Saturday after leaving the negotiations. "It is a way in fact to control completely the government and the very existence of the government."

Hezbollah Quits Lebanese Cabinet (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0093178

BEIRUT, Nov. 11 -- Cabinet ministers from Hezbollah and an allied party resigned Saturday, a decision that could cost the Western-backed government crucial support from Lebanon's Shiite Muslims.

Prime Minister Fouad Siniora said he would not accept the resignations. He has the authority to order the five cabinet ministers to stay on, but it was unclear if his weak government could enforce the demand.

The resignations are not enough to bring down Siniora's government -- eight cabinet ministers must resign for the government to collapse -- but they could cost him support among Shiites, the majority sect in Lebanon, and make it difficult for him to govern.

The ministers of Hezbollah and the allied Amal party resigned because talks on forming a national unity government collapsed hours earlier, Hezbollah said in a statement broadcast by its al-Manar television station. Hezbollah accused the government of insisting on "imposing terms and premature results for negotiations," the TV station said.

Hezbollah, a Shiite militia that is by far the strongest political and military force in Lebanon, has been demanding at least one-third of the seats in the 24-member cabinet for itself and its allies. That would give them veto power over key decisions and the power to bring down the government if they disagreed with a decision.

The governing majority, which succeeded in forcing Syria to withdraw its army from Lebanon last year, is not willing to relinquish full control.

Syria ended its 29-year military presence in Lebanon after international pressure and mass protests that followed the 2005 assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in Beirut. A U.N. investigation implicated top Syrian officials in the killing, but Syria has denied any role.

Russian Foreign Minister Hopeful About Nuclear Talks With Iran (AP)

AP, November 12, 2006

MOSCOW — Russia's foreign minister said Saturday that he believed international talks with Iran over its atomic program were still possible, maintaining that Russia could help bridge differences with other negotiating partners, including the United States.

President Vladimir V. Putin met Saturday with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, ending two days of talks that signaled a renewed push by Moscow to persuade Tehran to freeze its uranium enrichment effort. Iran, however, has so far snubbed Moscow's proposal to host its enrichment program.

Larijani remained defiant after the first round of meetings Friday, saying Tehran would push ahead with its nuclear program, and suggesting it could break off ties with the U.N. nuclear watchdog if the world inflicted punishments proposed by European nations.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov said his country would continue efforts to bring Iran back to negotiations with Germany and the five permanent members of the Security Council — the U.S., Britain, China, France and Russia.

"We will push for our common goal — the resumption of talks with six nations," Lavrov said in a statement after Putin's meeting with Larijani. "We think it's possible, if there is goodwill, to find a mutually acceptable basis for the resumption of talks on the basis of the proposals of the six and Iran's response to them."

U.S., Pyongyang Officials May Meet Soon, Report Says (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

TOKYO (AP) -- The United States and North Korea may hold talks in New York as early as this week aimed at working toward the resumption of six-nation discussions on Pyongyang's nuclear program, a newspaper reported yesterday.

Citing unidentified sources familiar with U.S.-North Korea affairs, Japan's Mainichi newspaper reported that officials from the two countries will discuss, among other issues, financial sanctions imposed on North Korea.

Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, said he was not aware of any plans for a meeting. A State Department spokesman, Kurtis Cooper, said he could not comment on the report.

Last year, Washington claimed that Banco Delta Asia SARL -- a bank in the Chinese territory of Macao -- was being used by North Korea for money-laundering activities. The Bush administration banned transactions between the bank and American financial institutions.

Earlier this month, the State Department said North Korea would get a chance to seek access to its frozen overseas bank accounts when the six-nation negotiations resume.

North Korea agreed to return to the talks -- involving the two Koreas, the United States, China, Japan and Russia -- following its test of a nuclear weapon on Oct. 9, a move that triggered international outrage and economic sanctions. No date has yet been set for their resumption.

DOJ_NMG_0093179

North Korea, which claims its nuclear ambitions are aimed at deterring U.S. attacks, has boycotted the nuclear talks since November 2005 when the U.S. Treasury Department imposed economic sanctions on the country.

U.S. and North Korean officials had a direct meeting in Beijing on Oct. 31, which the North said at the time led to their decision to return to the six-nation talks.

Meanwhile, top South Korean officials yesterday decided against fully participating in a U.S.-led program to stop and search ships in international waters to prevent the movement of weapons of mass destruction, a press report stated.

Washington has said it wants South Korea to expand its participation in the Proliferation Security Initiative following the North's nuclear test and a U.N. Security Council resolution banning weapons trade with the North.

South Korea has only been an observer to the program out of concern its direct participation in stopping and searching North Korean ships could lead to armed clashes with its volatile neighbor.

The decision yesterday will become official after a formal government review process and a report to President Roh Moo-hyun, Yonhap news agency reported, citing unidentified participants in the session involving Prime Minister Han Myung-sook, key security officials and ruling party leaders.

Nicaragua's Ortega Vows Close U.S. Ties (AP)

By Traci Carl, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 12, 2006

Daniel Ortega returns to Nicaragua's presidency a shadow of the fiery revolutionary who in Cold War times vowed an endless fight against a U.S. government determined to overthrow him.

Balding, weakened by heart trouble and often appearing almost docile, he now preaches reconciliation and stability, and promises to maintain close ties with the U.S. and the veterans of the Contra army it trained and armed against him.

He has traded his wartime military fatigues for a white shirt and jeans. His guide, he says, is God, not Karl Marx.

The United States and his rivals worry the Sandinista revolutionary in him will resurface, as Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and Cuban leader Fidel Castro welcome him into a club of leftist leaders fighting American dominance in the region.

But Ortega, who was president in 1985-90, the height of the Contra insurgency, says he has traded war for peace, love and consensus.

His victory speech late Wednesday was tinged with some of his old fire. Raising his arms in victory, he led thousands in a rendition of an old revolutionary song: "The people united will never be divided."

He promoted socialist ideals such as free education and medical care, lambasted U.S. Republicans for the war in Iraq and thanked other leftist Latin American leaders for their support. But most of his speech was dedicated to praising democracy and reaching out to opponents.

"Don't let one criticism slip from your lips against those who didn't vote for us," he warned his supporters. "We have to be humble."

Ortega, who turned 61 Saturday and takes office Jan. 10, has been careful not to sound triumphalist. Even though his strong lead over Harvard-educated banker Eduardo Montealegre was clear soon after Sunday's election, he waited two full days for Montealegre to concede defeat before declaring victory.

His speeches have focused on reassuring skeptics that he plans no radical changes and will embrace free trade, job creation and close U.S. ties.

On Saturday, Ortega said his Cabinet ministers will be named by the people — not himself — and he had asked local representatives to send him proposals for candidates. He vowed that half of his top officials would be women and he would include people who didn't vote for him.

He also promised more than 1,000 Sandinista peasant leaders that the government would buy land for people who need it, which they could pay for "little by little even if it is with a sack of corn."

Perhaps the biggest sign that Ortega has changed is his vice president, Jaime Morales.

Shortly after the Sandinistas ousted dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979, Morales' wife came home to find Ortega's wife, Rosario Murillo, occupying her house and wearing the family's clothes and jewelry. Morales spent years fighting for restitution.

Recently, he got it: Ortega returned works of art, a desk that was a family heirloom, and other things.

Shortly after, Morales agreed to run as his vice president, saying he preferred "the strange to the unknown."

"We agreed on peace 18 years ago, and it's time to heal that wound," Morales told The Associated Press. "Maybe together we can get people to forgive and forget and move on."

He said the next five years will be nothing like Ortega's first regime, when state economic control was so heavy that people lined up for rationed food and hungry farmers could be jailed for butchering their own cows without permission.

"Daniel Ortega knows he made a lot of mistakes," Morales said. "He's honestly regretful."

DOJ_NMG_0093180

Ortega's mistakes will haunt his new administration.

Leaders of the country's Miskito Indians have accused him of genocide for forcing thousands to relocate during the U.S.-backed Contra civil war. He has apologized for moving them, but denies genocide.

On Thursday, the Permanent Commission on Human Rights, an independent Nicaraguan body, said it would push the genocide case against Ortega throughout his administration.

Ortega's stepdaughter, Zoilamerica Narvaez, says he molested her for years, starting when she was 13, and often speaks against him publicly. Ortega and his wife both deny it, alleging Narvaez is mentally unstable.

Remembering the Sandinista closure of opposition media, some worry Ortega will not keep his promise to respect media rights. During his campaign, he rarely spoke to news media he believed tied to the United States, and refused to take part in a campaign debate sponsored by U.S.-based CNN en Espanol.

In his third failed run for president, in 2001, when reconciliation was the watchword, he actually waved a U.S. flag on stage. Yet celebrating May Day 2005 in Cuba, he referred to Americans in a speech as "the enemies of humanity."

Maricela Ortega, a 43-year-old store saleswoman, says she believes the president-elect is a different man.

The previous Ortega "was a dictator," she said. "But from what I've seen so far, he's no longer a rebel."

His wife Murillo, who is also his campaign manager, decides whom he talks to and is always at his side. Cartoons show her manipulating Ortega like a puppet.

Dissident Sandinistas say he has become too conservative, as well as opportunistic in his alliances — for instance by joining forces with his opponents to push legislation through Congress that effectively weakened the then president, Enrique Bolanos.

Now he will replace outgoing Bolanos in that diminished presidential role, and must work with an opposition-dominated Congress.

More than ever, Ortega will need the support of his former enemies, and they have pledged to keep him in check.

U.S. State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos says cooperation with Ortega and his government will be "based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future."

"We want to have a close, respectful relationship with the United States," Vice-President Morales said. "That doesn't mean we will always agree with the U.S. But it also doesn't mean we are an enemy."

Associated Press Writer Filadelfo Aleman contributed to this report.

Former Contras Bemoan Ortega's Return To Power In Nicaragua (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, November 12, 2006

SAN BENITO, Nicaragua -- As a young insurgent fighting to overturn Nicaragua's Marxist-led Sandinista revolution during the 1980s, Mart?n Laguna chose the alias "Comandante Amargura," Spanish for "Commander Bitterness," to protest his suffering at the hands of a government that had gunned down his father and confiscated his family's cattle ranch.

But 16 years after the Sandinistas' fall ushered in a new era of democracy in Nicaragua, Laguna's old code name seems just as apt.

Official promises to compensate him for the expropriated property never came through, so he has joined about 100 other former fighters squatting in flimsy shacks on this desolate plain outside the capital, Managua.

Jobs are scarce, so he feeds his four children by scavenging for firewood to sell by the highway.

And as if those humiliations weren't enough, last week Daniel Ortega, the Sandinista leader whom Laguna risked his life to overthrow, won back the presidency through a democratic election.

"I can't believe it," Laguna, a stocky man of 52, said disgustedly in a recent interview inside his home of sticks and plastic tarp. "After all these years, our enemy is going to have power over us once more. I never, never imagined this would happen."

A week after divisions among his opponents enabled Ortega, 61, to eke out a victory with less than 40 percent of the vote, Nicaraguans of all political stripes are still reeling. But perhaps none feel more personally affronted than the surviving foot soldiers of the U.S.-funded anti-Sandinista force, known as contras. Through a controversial, decade-long campaign of ambushes and sabotage, the contras, estimated to number as high as 12,000 at their peak, helped pressure Ortega into holding elections in 1990 in which voters swept him from office.

Now some former contras view Ortega's return in almost apocalyptic terms. Although Ortega cast himself as the candidate of "reconciliation," Laguna's neighbor, Leiva Ram?rez, a petite woman with dark, intense eyes, predicted that it is only a matter of time before he reinstates unpopular policies of his previous 11-year rule, such as expropriating property, rationing food and jailing dissenters.

DOJ_NMG_0093181

"But we won't surrender to him!" shouted Ram?rez, 39, as her voice began to shake with emotion. "If we have to, we'll go back to the mountains where we are strong and fight again. Better to die in battle than to stay here and be killed off one by one."

Other former contra fighters interviewed were more sanguine, arguing that Ortega has probably mellowed over the years. Their concern was that his victory would embolden his more radical supporters to harass former contra fighters in the many urban neighborhoods and rural villages across Nicaragua where old foes now live side by side.

Eighty miles north of the San Benito encampment, in the remote mountain village of La Lima, Efra?m Subalbarro, 42, said that Sandinista activists had already twice stopped by his house in the middle of the night.

"They pulled up in a truck and stood outside shouting obscenities and threats for about half an hour. It was very tense," said Subalbarro, a short, muscular man who commanded 45 fighters during the contra war.

But perhaps most upsetting to the former contra fighters is the notion that Ortega's victory could represent the final step in the contras' long descent into political irrelevance.

"We were the ones who gave Nicaraguans their democracy, and now we've been totally abandoned," said Subalbarro, who said he watched two younger brothers die in battle. "It's like we don't matter anymore."

The contras' loss of clout is at least partly due to their lack of coherence to begin with. Armed, trained and largely run by the CIA, the insurgency was dominated at its top tier by former members of the notoriously brutal National Guard that propped up dictator Anastasio Somoza until the Sandinistas deposed him in their 1979 revolution. A diverse group of civilian leaders, among them prominent business figures and former Sandinistas disenchanted with Ortega's rule, offered the contras a more palatable public face but exercised little power behind the scenes.

The rank and file, meanwhile, was filled mainly by peasants from the north and Miskito Indians from the Atlantic coast, many of them women and teenagers. They chafed under Sandinista rules that favored agricultural cooperatives, and resented the presence of Cuban doctors and teachers promoting an atheistic worldview.

After Ortega's loss in 1990, most of the contra civilian leadership joined anti-Ortega factions that have coalesced and divided and coalesced again in a dizzying series of alliances. Among the more surprising twists in this contretemps was the decision this year by Jaime Morales -- a former banker and contra negotiator whose home Ortega occupied after the 1979 revolution -- to run for vice president on Ortega's ticket.

A small cadre of contra fighters did establish a party, known as the Nicaraguan Resistance Party, dedicated to representing former contra combatants. But it has been beset by frequent internal squabbles, the most recent of which erupted in September when the party's president, Salvador Talavera, infuriated many members by signing a public "peace agreement" with Ortega.

Such moves at the top have only compounded the disillusionment felt by many lower-ranking former contras over the level of assistance they have received from democratic administrations that succeeded Ortega.

After years of fighting, many had lost their lands to the Sandinistas. Others like Subalbarro, whose family was able to keep its cattle ranch in the northern state of Jinotega, felt it was unsafe to return. "Everybody there knows what operations you were responsible for, and there may be those who want to take their revenge," he said.

Violeta Chamorro, who defeated Ortega in the 1990 presidential election, originally promised to grant each demobilized contra either 50 manzanas of land, about 86 acres, on which to raise cattle or 15 manzanas, about 26 acres, for crops. But that commitment was based on estimates that put the contra force at 5,000, noted Alfonso Sandino, a former contra spokesman who heads the government agency in charge of compensating demobilized combatants. When 22,000 came forward claiming to be former contras, "it was clear that the original commitment was totally unrealistic. Nicaragua just doesn't have sufficient land to fulfill it," Sandino said.

Furious, small groups of contras rearmed and staged violent protests several times during the early 1990s, at one point occupying the Colombian Embassy in Managua. Each time, the crisis was soothed with more government promises.

Today, Sandino said, about 90 percent of former contra fighters have received some land -- albeit in smaller parcels than originally envisioned. The distribution, however, was haphazard, and contras' families often did not receive title to the new land, just vague permission to relocate there.

That has caused serious difficulties for Claudia Pe?a, 35, who moved onto a government-granted patch in the northern department of Matagalpa seven years ago.

Soon afterward, local Indians made a competing claim against the property and began grazing cattle there. Without a title, Pe?a and her husband have been unable to defend their claim to the land.

"We're supposed to have eight manzanas of land," she said. "But the truth is, we're only able to raise crops on about one."

One of her young sons sat on the ground nearby, watching her with a pinched expression. He's hungry, she explained, but there wasn't going to be enough for dinner that night. Instead, she said, "I'll give the children water to take away their appetite."

When she was asked whether this was the future she imagined back when she was fighting in Nicaragua's northern jungles, Pe?a's eyes filled with tears.

DOJ_NMG_0093182

"No. We wanted peace so we could have a chance at a decent living," she answered. "This is not what I was fighting for."

Two U.N. Peacekeepers Killed In Haiti (AP)

AP, November 11, 2006

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) -- Two U.N. peacekeepers from Jordan were shot to death in Haiti's capital after coming under attack by gunmen, U.N. officials said Saturday.

Jordan's official Petra news agency reported the two soldiers were attacked Saturday morning while on patrol in Port-au-Prince, the capital. But a United Nations police spokesman in Haiti, Fred Blaze, said preliminary reports indicate they were killed Friday night.

Blaze said the soldiers came under attack in the Sonapi section of the capital near Cite Soleil, a slum where well-armed street gangs blamed for kidnappings are based. The deputy U.N. mission chief in Haiti, David Wimhurst, confirmed the deaths but declined to give details.

Jordanian government spokesman Nasser Judeh identified the soldiers as 1st Lt. Ahmad Mohammed Hassan Ba'irat and Cpl. Rami Wasif Taha Al Mohammed.

The U.N. peacekeeping force has been stepping up patrols to quell violence in the Caribbean nation's dense slums. But there is growing opposition among poor slum dwellers to the Brazil-led U.N. force, sent to restore order after a bloody February 2004 revolt ousted then President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. They have accused U.N. troops of firing indiscriminately during gunbattles with gangsters, killing and wounding civilians.

The U.N. denies peacekeepers open fire indiscriminately and says they only shoot when attacked. No overall civilian casualty figures were available.

In recent days, students and slum dwellers have staged street protests calling for the U.N. force's withdrawal.

Jordan has about 1,500 troops in the force of some 8,800 peacekeepers. Nine peacekeepers have been killed since the force arrived in June 2004.

The latest attack marked the bloodiest day for the blue-helmeted force in nearly a year. In December, a Jordanian soldier was shot to death while patrolling Cite Soleil.

Facing Reality On Europe's Immigrants (NYT)

By David C. Unger

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

"Write an article!" came the shout as I left a room full of German women preparing the food for their weekly breakfast discussion meeting in the Rollberg housing project in the Neukölln section of Berlin.

They were Germans now, but most had been born elsewhere, generally in Muslim countries. One wore a head scarf, the others did not. The youngest looked about 19. The oldest might have been a grandmother.

These women illustrated a reality finally accepted by some of Germany's most conservative politicians — there is no reason someone cannot be German and Muslim at the same time. In America, that idea would be unremarkable. In Germany, with its tragic history of exclusive nationalism and race-based citizenship, it is an intellectual revolution.

The moving spirit behind these meetings was Ayten Köse, an infectiously enthusiastic woman of Turkish descent, who relished telling a visitor what it had taken to make this project a reality.

The weekly breakfasts were among the activities of an outreach program sponsored by the local government and the European Union. One goal is to help the project's residents connect with one another and with local public services. That, in turn, is meant to reduce the sense of isolation many immigrants feel from the larger society they live in and from its political institutions.

Through this program, residents had gotten help in ridding public rooms in the housing project of the intimidating young toughs who hung out there, discouraging women from leaving their apartments. That reclaimed space became home to the Friday breakfast gatherings, where the women compared notes on problems from domestic violence to developments in Afghanistan, Gaza and Iraq.

It took a long time for Germany's leaders to wake up to the fact that millions of foreign-born or foreign-descended residents — people who originally arrived as guest workers or asylum seekers, along with their German-born children and grandchildren — intend to live their lives in Germany with no plans of returning to their ancestral homelands.

More than three million of these new Germans are Muslims — nearly two million from Turkey, with most of the rest from Bosnia, Albania, the Arab world, Pakistan and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0093183

It is in Germany's interest to help these newcomers succeed and prosper, by helping them improve their German language skills, preparing them for better jobs and smoothing their path to German citizenship. That lessens the risk of their slipping into an underground world of isolation, joblessness and despair, where they might fall prey to terrorist recruiters.

The new realism of its politicians is welcome, but Germany has a long way to go. Immigrants still face violent attacks from xenophobic neighbors and the discriminatory attitudes and practices of some local governments. Despite recent reforms, it remains too difficult for many long-time residents to become citizens.

Yet, despite its shortcomings, Germany's new approach contrasts favorably with that of neighboring France — the home of Western Europe's largest and perhaps least integrated Muslim population.

French policies have been confounded, paradoxically, by the country's militantly integrationist official ideology. The well-meaning insistence that all French citizens are simply French has led to decades of willfully ignoring the particular needs and diverse cultures of distinctive segments of the French population.

The poor and unemployed young men who burned cars in suburban neighborhoods last fall weren't protesting the noble French ideal of égalité. They were protesting the daily humiliation of coping with police officers, politicians and employers who have no real idea of what their lives are like and no desire to find out. It is that kind of estrangement that German programs like the one in Neukölln are trying to avoid.

Voters Were Not The Only People To Notice Scandals (NYT)

By Mark A. Stein

The New York Times, November 12, 2006

Fed up with corruption? No wonder. It is getting worse.

Transparency International, a private antibribery group in Berlin, released its annual corruption perceptions index, which gauges how people view the honesty of public officials in 163 countries.

Perhaps unsurprisingly, Iraq's reputation suffered this year. So did those of Brazil, Cuba, Israel, Jordan, Laos, Algeria and — er — the United States. America fell three spots, to tie for 20th with Chile and Belgium.

The pecuniary relationships that Jack Abramoff and other lobbyists had with certain members of Congress apparently took a toll on the country's reputation.

And a substantial number of voters cited corruption as a factor in their decision in the midterm election last week.

But there is another side to the problem: the countries that pay graft to foreigners.

Transparency International uses this "supply side" of corruption to rank countries on a "bribe-payers index." Here, the United States does better. It tied — again, with Belgium — in ninth place.

DOJ_NMG_0093184

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, November 13, 2006 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Sunday, November 12, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061112.pdf; agnb061112.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
New Federal Probes Target Posada 2
CIA Says Detainee Treatment Is National Security Issue 3

Homeland Response:
More Air Travelers' Bags Missing In Wake Of Liquid Ban 3

War News:
Iraq Study Group May Have Few Good Options 3
Baghdad Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 33 5
Gates Selection Could Help Close Pentagon-State Rift 5
"No Tears" For Rumsfeld At Camp Victory 6
Casey Says US Has Resolve To Carry Out Iraq Mission 7
US Offers Reward For Information On Missing Soldier 7
Officer Who Refused Deployment Faces Court-Martial 7
Democrats Move To Save Iraq Reconstruction IG 7
Iraqi Corruption Fighter Is Accused Of Fraud 8
Iraq Seen As Longing For New "Strongman." 8
Romania To Stay In Iraq 8
Karzai Struggles To Steer Afghanistan 8

Corporate Scandals:
Former Tyco Head Is Selling Assets 8

Criminal Law:
More Subpoenas Issued In Menendez Probe 9
FBI Likely To Continue Congressional Corruption Probes 9
US To Seek Death Penalty In Hawaii Case 9

Civil Rights:
Osceola County, FL, Could Settle Discrimination Suit On Monday 10
Massachusetts Poll Workers Meet Goal 10
New Jersey Settles Suit Over Boy's Death For $7.5 Million 10

Antitrust:
Gannett Could Bid On Tribune Properties 11
Class-Action Suit Against Microsoft To Open Monday In Iowa 11
Sports Artist Sued Over Use Of Alabama's School Colors 11
Actor Sues Wisconsin Man Over Use Of Name 11

Environment:
Corpus Christi Left With Cleanup Bill In Asarco Mess 12

Immigration:
Weiner Seeks Deportation Of Former Nazi Guard 12
State Immigrant Protection Rules Prove To Be Unpopular 12

Congress-Administration:
As Bush Honors Soldiers, War Woes Continue To Drag On Him 12
Democratic Freshmen Hope To Bring Pragmatism To Capitol Hill 14
Democrats Already Strategizing To Hold New Majorities 15
Rove Remains Upbeat Despite GOP Setbacks 16
Chafee Says White House Partisanship Did In Centrist Republicans 16
Webb Says He May Be A Maverick In Senate 16
Shays Will Be Only New England GOP Representative In Next Congress 17
Four Bush Appeals Court Nominees Seen As "Doomed." 17
Detroit Automakers To Seek Bush's Attention On Issues 17
Democrats Could Seek To Add Bargaining Ability To Medicare 17
White House Scrutinizes Nevada Land Sale Profits 17

Other News:
Liberals, Activists Expect "Their Due" From Democrats 18
Some In GOP Urge Return To Party's Core Principles 18
Libertarian May Have Tipped Montana, And Senate, To Democrats 19
Defeated Representatives May Turn To Lobbying 19
Spitzer Hits Puerto Rico For Post-Election Break 19
Ehrlich Does Not Plan To Seek Office Again 19
Feingold Will Not Run For President In 2008 19
With Midterms Over, Presidential Race Shifts Into High Gear 19

HIV Patients' Life Expectancy Increases 20
Ground To Be Broken For King Memorial On National Mall . 20
WPost Says US Voting System Worked Well Overall 20
LATimes Says Naturalized Citizens Should Be Permitted To Seek Presidency 20
NYTimes Incredulous About Corporate Calls For More Lax Regulation 20
US Vetoes UN Security Council Gaza Resolution 21
Shiite Cabinet Resignations Could Cripple Beirut 21
Russia Eyes Mediating Role In Iran Nuclear Dispute 21
North Korea Talks Could Resume 22
In Return To Power, Ortega Said To Emphasize "Reconciliation And Stability." 22
Two UN Peacekeepers Killed In Haitian Capital 22
German Immigrant Integration Efforts Contrasted With French "Estrangement." 22
Public's View Of Official Corruption Worsening 23

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 23

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 23

TERRORISM NEWS:

New Federal Probes Target Posada. The Miami Herald (11/12, Chardy, Weaver) reports, "One of the first things the businessman noticed about Luis Posada Carriles was that he spoke funny. Posada, who mumbled because of an old bullet wound in his jaw, frequently visited the businessman's Guatemala utility company in 1997 to meet with two co-workers." The Herald continues, "The businessman grew suspicious after one of the workers told him about Cuban exile plans to assassinate Fidel Castro and after a Venezuelan politician confided that Posada, a CIA-trained explosives expert, was a 'very dangerous individual.' … Concerned that Posada was using his utility business to plot illicit activities, the businessman hid a transmitter in an office and overheard the two co-workers talk with Posada about placing a 'putty-like explosive' in the shoes of Central Americans paid to pose as tourists on trips to Cuba. … Soon afterward, the businessman became a 'confidential source' for the FBI's investigation into bombs that exploded at Cuban tourist sites in 1997, killing an Italian and wounding seven others." The Herald notes, "The businessman, a Cuban-American engineer who set up the utility company in Guatemala City in 1996, could turn out to be the central figure in the Justice Department's rekindled criminal investigation of Posada. The probe is back on track -- despite the fact that the FBI field office in Miami destroyed evidence in 2003 about the initial Cuba bombing case. … Federal grand juries in New Jersey and Texas are investigating the secret activities of Posada, 78, who is detained at an immigration facility in El Paso, Texas. The Texas probe focuses on whether he lied about how he sneaked into the country. The New Jersey investigation, aided by the FBI in Miami, is zeroing in on his role as the alleged mastermind of the dozen tourist-site bombings in Cuba that investigators think were financed by Cuban exiles in Union City, N.J. … Either of the probes could lead to the first indictment of Posada in the United States."

Under the headline "FBI Destroyed Evidence As 'Routine' Matter," the Miami Herald (11/12, Weaver, Chardy) reported that the FBI's destruction of the Cuba bomb plot evidence "posed a serious challenge" to the renewed investigation, however, "officials portrayed the destruction as a routine administrative procedure after the U.S. attorney's office closed the case in August 2003 because of lack of progress in the investigation. 'We routinely destroy evidence in cases that have been closed,' said FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela, noting the agency needed to make room for other records in its evidence room at the time. She added that the FBI has been able to rebuild the body of evidence in the Cuba bombing probe, which targets Posada." Meanwhile, former FBI Miami SAC Hector Pesquera "said that any suggestion he sought to protect Posada from prosecution was 'preposterous.'"

Author Criticizes DOJ Investigations As Lackluster. In a Washington Post (11/12) op-ed titled "Why the FBI Is Coming After Me," author Ann Louise Bardach criticizes the US for what she sees as an unenthusiastic investigation of Posada Carriles and for the DOJ subpoena of her records from her interviews with him. Bardach adds, "Before the government starts tampering with the Constitution's protections of the press, it needs to do some housecleaning. A good start would be a special prosecutor to look into who ordered the removal of the Posada evidence, and why. If it then decides that it wants to go further, it might peruse the 45 years' worth of CIA and FBI files on Posada that detail his paramilitary career. And there are a dozen or so comrades of Posada's in Miami and New Jersey who know a great deal more than I do. But that's assuming that the government wants to prosecute Posada. It has declined to do so for decades. And nothing so far suggests that it is inclined to start now."

DOJ_NMG_0093187

CIA Says Detainee Treatment Is National Security Issue. The Detroit Free Press/McClatchy Newspapers (11/12, Rosenberg) reports, "The CIA is still trying to impose secrecy around 14 top Al Qaeda suspects now held at the Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, detention center, including an alleged 9/11 mastermind, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed." McClatchy continues, "The arena for the effort is the U.S. District Court of Judge Reggie Walton in Washington, D.C., where the government is seeking a still-undefined restriction on the attorney-client relationship in the case of Majid Khan, one of the 14. … The CIA argues that details of the man's three years of detention and interrogation at so-called black sites -- out of reach of the International Red Cross -- are national security secrets." McClatchy adds, "Khan's attorney, Gita Gutierrez, argues that the Bush administration's intent is not to safeguard national security but to cover up three years of extrajudicial detention of her client -- to 'conceal illegal or embarrassing executive conduct.' … Khan, 26, was captured in his native Pakistan in 2003. The White House says he's linked to unsuccessful plots to blow up gas stations in the United States, poison U.S. water supplies and assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. … It's not known where he was held or how he was interrogated to establish these links. He hasn't been charged with a crime." McClatchy notes, "At least some of the 14 men whom President George W. Bush ordered handed over to the military this summer were reportedly submitted to harsh, classified interrogation techniques, including simulated drownings -- known as water-boarding -- to break their will. .. .Court documents filed by the government suggest that the 14 newest arrivals at Guantanamo, among them alleged Osama bin Laden deputies, would never be integrated into the general population of more than 430 captives, for fear they would talk about their secret confinement to other captives, who could, in turn, pass on the details to their lawyers. … In seeking to redefine attorney-client contacts, Justice Department lawyers offered a seven-page affidavit from CIA officer Marilyn Dorn, who describes herself as 'the information review officer for the National Clandestine Service.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

More Air Travelers' Bags Missing In Wake Of Liquid Ban. The New York Times (11/12, Bailey, 1.16M) reports on its front page that since August 10, "when a ban on most carry-on liquids sent the amount of checked luggage soaring, airlines have been misplacing many more bags, and the fumbling could well escalate during the busy holiday travel season." The Transportation Department also reported that "more fliers had their bags go missing in August than they did a year earlier" and "it got worse in September." The Times notes that currently "efforts are under way to fix two of the worst baggage operations" in the US, although "financial problems have slowed industry investment in technology that could improve bag handling."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Study Group May Have Few Good Options. The Washington Post (11/12, A1, Abramowitz, Ricks, 690K) reports in a front page article, "Those familiar with the panel's work predict that the ultimate recommendations will not appear novel and that there are few, if any, good options left facing the country. Many of the ideas reportedly being considered -- more aggressive regional diplomacy with Syria and Iran, greater emphasis on training Iraqi troops, or focusing on a new political deal between warring Shiites and Sunni -- have either been tried or have limited chances of success, in the view of many experts on Iraq. [James] Baker is also exploring whether a broader U.S. initiative in tackling the Arab-Israeli conflict is needed to help stabilize the region." The Post states that the panel might have to contend with political pressures: "While Baker has been testing the waters for some time to determine how much change in Iraq policy will be tolerated by the White House, [Lee] Hamilton perhaps faces the now even-more-difficult challenge of cajoling Democrats such as former Clinton administration chief of staff Leon E. Panetta and power broker Vernon E. Jordan Jr. to sign on to a plan that falls short of a phased troop withdrawal, the position of many congressional Democrats. ... Within the panel, staffers and expert consultants have waged warfare by memo as idealists argue with pragmatists over particulars."

DOJ_NMG_0093188

Baker, Gates Bring "Bush 41" Mindset To Administration. NBC Nightly News (11/11, story 3, 2:16, Mitchell, 9.87M) examined the changing of the guard in the Bush Administration's inner circle and how, "after six years of rejecting advice from members of his father's advisory team, the President is calling them off the bench, James Baker to craft an exit strategy in Iraq. His father's CIA Director Bob Gates to replace Donald Rumsfeld at the Pentagon. … The President bristled when Brian Williams asked if he was seeking his father's advice." Bush: "He understands I have often times have information he doesn't have." Mitchell: "There have been tensions. Gates, who had dinner with the President's father in Texas last night, has been sharply critical of the way the Pentagon has run the war." Former Rumsfeld adviser Kenneth Adelman: "I think it is the end of the kind of missionary spirit of George W. Bush and the resurgence of the calm stability arguments of George Herbert Walker Bush."

Blair Will Address Iraq Study Group. The Washington Post (11/12, A17, Sullivan, 690K) reports British PM Tony Blair "will speak via video link with officials from the Iraq Study Group on Tuesday to discuss 'U.K. ideas on Iraq and the Middle East,' a Blair spokeswoman said Saturday. ... The Guardian newspaper on Saturday reported that Blair would urge the panel to push the Bush administration to begin talks with Syria and Iran to persuade those two countries to become more involved in finding a solution to the situation in Iraq. The newspaper also reported that Blair would press Baker and Hamilton to recommend that any solution in Iraq depends on the United States making a 'reenergized push for peace in the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.'" The report was called "speculation" by the Blair spokeswoman.

WPost Says Baker-Hamilton Could Find Common Ground. The Washington Post (11/12, 690K) editorializes, "A close look at what the White House and Democrats have been saying, along with what is emerging from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, offers grounds for some optimism. There is, in fact, a center to the war debate that offers the outlines of a way forward." The group will "almost certainly endorse an idea long favored by Mr. Biden and many other Democrats: an attempt by the United States to find common ground on Iraq with its neighbors -- including Syria and Iran. ... Both the Bush administration and Democrats must face the possibility that no amount of U.S. pushing will produce political results or diminish the violence in Baghdad, at least in the short term. For some time, Mr. Maliki and other Iraqis have been warning any American who will listen that the dynamics driving the war won't necessarily respond to timetables drawn up in Washington. ... The United States needs a strategy for defending its own vital interests in that case. As it happens, Mr. Maliki has one to offer: In the last couple of weeks he has made clear that his government's priority is to gain full command over the Iraqi army the United States has been building and take the lead in fighting the Sunni-al-Qaeda insurgency. That means that U.S. troops could begin moving to a supporting role, backing up the Iraqi units with air power and rapid reaction forces."

Brooks Says Baker-Hamilton May "Produce More Peace" At Home Than In Iraq. In his New York Times (11/12, WK12, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "Both parties are desperate to be substantially out of Iraq by 2008. Vietnam-haunted Democrats don't want to be saddled with the remains of the war if they retake the White House. Most Republicans don't want to wage another campaign under the Mesopotamian shadow. The president, however, is thinking about the decades-long struggle, not the next election, so the G.O.P. could be heading toward a blood feud between 'Let's end this' Republicans and 'Let's win this' Republicans, with the potential bitterness lasting for years." The Baker-Hamilton commission "may produce more peace in America than in Iraq," and "events in Iraq are moving more quickly than adjustments in Washington. ... Visitors to Baghdad have been surprised by the lack of urgency many Iraqi leaders seem to feel in the face of national disintegration."

Hoagland Says Bush Lost His Gamble But Middle East Still Needs To Change. In his column for the Washington Post (11/12, B7, 690K), Jim Hoagland writes, "President Bush lost more than a midterm election and a cantankerous defense secretary last week. He also abandoned any lingering chance of remaking U.S. foreign policy into a radical force for democratic change in the Middle East and elsewhere." However, Hoagland claims that now-ascendant "realism" itself had failures: "Only the incompetence and discord of the past three years could cause reasonable people to welcome back with applause policymakers who failed to anticipate and then opposed the breakup of the Soviet Union; who were not realistic enough to see, much less prevent, the Balkans from plunging into flames; and who 'coddled dictators from Beijing to Baghdad' ... So hold the champagne and cheers for the return of 'realism.'"

DOJ_NMG_0093189

Baghdad Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 33. The AP (11/12, al-Bashir) reports, "A suicide bomber blew himself up outside a police recruiting center in Baghdad early Sunday, killing at least 33 people and wounding 56, police said. Crowds of recruits were gathering outside the center in western Baghdad's Nissur Square when the bomber detonated explosives strapped to his body, police Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said. He said the death toll was expected to rise because many of the injuries were extremely serious." The attack "was one of several on Sunday in the capital, where sectarian violence kills scores each week."

Iraqi Gunmen Kill 10 Shiites, Abduct 50 Others. The AP (11/11) reports, "Sunni gunmen ambushed a convoy of minibuses Saturday night at a fake checkpoint on a highway south of Baghdad, killing 10 Shiite passengers and kidnapping about 50. ... Police said the mass kidnapping and killing was near Latifiyah, about 20 miles south of Baghdad in the so-called Triangle of Death."

Sectarian Rifts In Diyala Portend Problems After Iraqis Take Over. The New York Times (11/12, A1, Oppel, 1.16M) reports in a pessimistic front page article, "Diyala is now teeming with Shiite militiamen who have rushed in from Baghdad in recent months to protect the Shiite population from attacks. Once considered by American officials to be relatively pacified, it has become a cauldron of violence carried out by insurgents and militias, intensified by sectarian-influenced security forces. As pressures for a phased United States withdrawal build, the experiences of American commanders over the past year in Diyala provide a window on the possible consequences of ceding authority to the Iraqi Army."

Gates Selection Could Help Close Pentagon-State Rift. Under the headline, "In Gates Selection, White House Hopes To Close Rift Between State And Defense," a piece in the New York Times (11/12, Sanger, Shane, 1.16M) says President Bush "selected Robert M. Gates as his new defense secretary in part to close a long-running rift between the Defense Department and the State Department that has hobbled progress on Iraq, keeping the two agencies at odds on issues ranging from reconstruction to detaining terrorism suspects, according to White House officials and members of Mr. Gates' inner circle." Since September, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and National Security Adviser Steven Hadley "quietly steered the White House" toward replacing Donald Rumsfeld with Gates, "who had worked closely with Ms. Rice under the first President Bush." Rice and Rumsfeld "never managed to resolve their differences," and as NSA "during Mr. Bush's first term, Ms. Rice was unable to halt a war between the State Department and the Pentagon that put senior officials in the departments in a state of constant conflict."

Gates Could Signify Shift Toward "Realists." BBC.com (11/11, Beale) reports, "The departure of Donald Rumsfeld is seen as one indication that the White House has listened to its critics. ... The departure of Mr Rumsfeld and the arrival of Robert Gates at the Pentagon is being interpreted as the end of the road for the ideologues and the re-entry into orbit of the foreign-policy 'realists'. So-called 'realists' are supposed to have a more nuanced view of the world. They do not - like the so-called neo-conservatives - see everything in black and white terms. ... No doubt the new arrivals will bring a fresh perspective to the White House. But don't expect US forces to exit Iraq overnight or for Iran and Syria to be greeted with open arms." Furthermore, victorious Democrats "cannot afford to appear weak in the face of the threats that America faces if they are to have any chance of eventually taking the White House," and President Bush "has already made it clear that he is not going to abandon his goal of defeating terrorism in Iraq or ease the pressure on North Korea and Iran."

Gates's "Slogging Through" Iran-Contra Recalled. The AP (11/11, Yost) reports in a negative, historically oriented article, "Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada says he has questions about Gates' involvement in Iran-Contra. Republicans plan to push the nomination through before they lose control in January. Thomas Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a private group that has collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents on the scandal and published several books on it, calls Gates 'the ultimate hear-no-evil see-no-evil high official during Iran-Contra.' In a final report, Iran-Contra prosecutor Lawrence Walsh said that, 'like those of many other Iran-Contra figures, the statements of Gates often seemed scripted and less than candid.' The AP adds, "Questions about Gates focus not on what he did in Iran-Contra, but on what he knew."

Gates Speech Quoted As Clue To Thinking. The Outlook section of the Washington Post (11/12, B4, 690K) reprints a September 8 speech by Secretary-designate Gates at Texas A&M University (sardonically titling it "How Not To Run The Pentagon") in which he "cautioned against new leaders arbitrarily imposing their ambitious agendas, only to witness the reversal of their efforts immediately after they leave." Gates said, "Some leaders arrive with ambitious agendas and seek to impose them by fiat -- unilaterally and from above. They usually provoke either paralyzing opposition and internal warfare, or see the reversal of every action immediately after their departure. ... What, then, is the formula for successful leadership in public institutions, above all a great university? I believe it begins with a leader's recognition that his or her time in office is finite and that the institution and those who carry out its mission endure. They were there long before the leader arrived, and will be there long after he or she departs."

DOJ_NMG_0093190

"No Tears" For Rumsfeld At Camp Victory.

NBC Nightly News (11/11, story 2, 1:58, Askill, 9.87M) reported, "On this Veterans' Day American troops in Iraq mustered for a special ceremony. Seventy-five soldiers from 33 countries were sworn in as American citizens at Baghdad's Camp Victory. … There were no tears for Donald Rumsfeld's resignation as Secretary of Defense." Sgt. Miguel Bravo: "I am glad he is out of that position. Hopefully the new guy will do better things." Askill: "Military analysts say the 'new guy,' Robert Gates, faces an almost impossible situation."

Cafferty Criticizes Pentagon On Armor. On CNN's In The Money (11/11), anchor Jack Cafferty said, "How about a trade: one used defense secretary for enough armor to protect our soldiers, for starters."

Feith Defends Rumsfeld In WPost. In the Washington Post (11/12, 690K), former Under Secretary of Defense for Policy Douglas Feith writes, "Much of what you know about Donald Rumsfeld is wrong. ... I know that Don Rumsfeld is not an ideologue. ... Because of his complexity, Rumsfeld is often misread. His politics are deeply conservative, but he was radical in his drive to force change in every area he oversaw." Rumsfeld "has been attacked for insisting that troop levels for the Iraq operation be kept low, supposedly out of ideology and contrary to the advice of the military. What I saw, however, was that Rumsfeld questioned standard military recommendations for 'overwhelming force.' He asked if such force was necessary for the mission. And he asked what the consequences might be of having a large footprint in Iraq and playing into propaganda about the United States wanting to take over the country."

Rumsfeld's "Errors" Were Allegedly Shared By Generals. In a commentary for the Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K), AEI scholar Frederick Kagan writes, "The strategy that has led to disaster in Iraq belonged to the commanders at least as much as to Rumsfeld. Scapegoating him in isolation will prevent us from learning the essential lessons of our recent failures." Kagan argues, "Belief in the value of technology and the need for light, swift ground forces pervaded the senior military leadership in the 1990s," being held by Gens. Eric Shinseki, Tommy Franks, and John Abizaid. Rumsfeld's failing was not his "managerial style, but his flawed understanding of war": he became "captive" to the "transformation program" that would "rely on information technology to permit American forces to locate, identify, track and destroy any target on the face of the Earth from thousands of miles away. Ideally, ground forces would not be necessary in future wars."

Rumsfeld Seen As "Central Villain" Of Woodward's "State Of Denial." In the New York Times Book Review (11/12, 1.16M), reviewer and New Republic editor Franklin Foer writes, "Where Bush appeared resolute in the first two installments of Woodward's trilogy, he now comes across as a 'Saturday Night Live' version of himself. ... But the president is too passive a player to be Woodward's central villain. Besides, Donald Rumsfeld fills that role far too perfectly. He comes across as utterly contemptuous of other human beings. ... What's worse, he is an obsessive micromanager, but one who disavows projects once they look doomed. As soon as the hunt for weapons of mass destruction seemed fruitless, he handed over the mission to the C.I.A. Rumsfeld takes so much pummeling that he eventually becomes a strangely sympathetic character." Foer finds "maddening reports of administration ham-handedness and arrogance" in Iraq and adds approvingly that Woodward has been forced by criticism "to change his style. There's less of his signature omniscience here."

LATimes Publisher Recalls Playing Squash With Rumsfeld. In an op-ed piece for the Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K), Times publisher David Hiller writes, "There was a period in the late 1990s when Don Rumsfeld and I played squash almost every month in Chicago, and before I say anything else, I should acknowledge this: He beat me almost all the time ... I think what struck me most was that Don never gave up on a point. His view was that every shot could be made, every game could be won, and he never surrendered until the last volley was played out."

DOJ_NMG_0093191

Casey Says US Has Resolve To Carry Out Iraq Mission. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Daragahi, Zavis, 850K) reports Gen. George Casey Jr. "voiced confidence Saturday that the United States would not abandon its mission in this violence-racked country amid a postelection reevaluation of Iraq strategy." His remarks "were among his first public statements since the resignation last week" of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Political insiders "have speculated that both Casey and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who was also at the ceremony, could leave their posts because of the Republican Party's defeat at the polls Tuesday."

US Offers Reward For Information On Missing Soldier. CNN (11/11, Lin) reported, "A reward is being offered in the search for a US soldier abducted in Iraq. The Army Reserve specialist was kidnapped nearly three weeks ago in Baghdad while visiting his Iraqi wife and family. The US military is offering up to a $50,000 reward for information leading to his recovery."

The New York Times (11/12, A12, Luo, 1.16M) reports the case "took a turn late last week when Entifad Qanbar, an associate of Ahmad Chalabi, the influential Iraqi politician, identified himself as the soldier's uncle and said that the kidnappers had issued a $250,000 ransom demand. American officials had been meeting with an intermediary trusted by those who had captured his nephew, he said." Qanbar said he had "asked for proof from the captors that his nephew was still alive, setting a deadline of noon last Saturday. But he has not had any contact with the kidnappers or their representatives since then, Mr. Qanbar said Saturday."

Officer Who Refused Deployment Faces Court-Martial. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Watanabe, 850K) reports, "The nation's first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq said he was disappointed by the Army's decision last week to proceed with a court-martial against him but reiterated that he believed he did the right thing in opposing the war." Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada "said that recent events had reinforced his belief that many Americans, including a growing number inside the military, shared his sentiments against the Bush administration's conduct of the war." Those events "include the midterm election results giving Democrats control of Congress, the resignation" of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, and a "landmark editorial in four affiliated military-focused publications calling for the Pentagon chief's ouster."

Democrats Move To Save Iraq Reconstruction IG. The New York Times (11/12, Glanz, Johnston, Shanker, 1.16M) reports on its front page, "Congressional Democrats say they will press new legislation next week to restore the power of a federal agency in charge of ferreting out waste and corruption in Iraq and greatly increase its investigative reach. ... The move would nullify a Republican-backed provision, slipped into a huge military authorization bill, that set a termination date for the agency, the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. The agency's findings have consistently undermined Bush administration claims of widespread success in the reconstruction of Iraq." There is "unlikely to be much downside for the Democrats in going after waste and fraud in government contracting, particularly in the Iraq war, which is not only unpopular with the American public but also where corporate giants like Halliburton, Parsons and Bechtel have committed highly publicized missteps in the rebuilding program." In addition, "Outside the reconstruction program, some agencies are likely to be singled out for special scrutiny, not only the Pentagon, but also the Central Intelligence Agency and Federal Bureau of Investigation."

Iraq Reconstruction Said To Lag Despite US Funding. On its front page, the Washington Post (11/12, A1, Witte, 690K) headlines a piece on Iraqi reconstruction, "Despite Billions Spent, Rebuilding Incomplete." While an injection of $38 billion has produced many results, "as the U.S.-led, U.S.-funded portion of Iraq's reconstruction nears its end, American officials and contractors alike are grappling with a cold reality: Thousands of successes in Iraq may add up to a single failure." Many "inside the reconstruction effort say security concerns were hardly the only problem. Poor planning and coordination by U.S. officials meant that even successful individual projects failed to do the job; for example, health-care centers were built at great cost but had no water and sewer service. Poor work-site management by contractors meant that some projects went awry. And now that the United States is handing over reconstruction efforts to Iraq, many involved with the process worry that the Iraqis don't have the training or the money to keep U.S.-built facilities running." Noting that "this was not how the rebuilding of Iraq was supposed to go," the Post says many "Iraqis expressed frustration not just with the United States but with Iraqi leaders, too, for pocketing aid money that was supposed to be for everyone."

DOJ_NMG_0093192

NYTimes Says Democrats Must Investigate Iraq Planning. The New York Times (11/12, 1.16M) editorializes, "Criticizing President Bush's gross mismanagement of the war was a winning electoral strategy. But criticism will not extricate the United States from this mess, nor will it persuade voters that the Democrats are ready to take back the White House." The public "deserves a full accounting (backed by subpoenas, if necessary) of how prewar intelligence was cooked, why American troops were sent to war without adequate armor, and where billions of dollars in reconstruction aid disappeared to. ... The Democrats will also need to look forward -- and quickly. So far they have shared slogans, but no real policy." The Times warns that the Democratic call for "phased redeployment" might "only hasten Iraq's descent into civil war — while placing American soldiers who remain behind in even greater danger."

Iraqi Corruption Fighter Is Accused Of Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "Iraq's top anticorruption watchdog, a high-profile judge whose efforts have been hailed by Americans as one of the few bright spots in the country, is himself the target of a corruption probe, officials said Saturday. Judge Radhi Radhi, head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, is under investigation by court authorities, accused of turning his 1,700-employee agency into a personal fiefdom and padding his salary with an extra $50,000 a year." Radhi, who "has worked closely with Stuart W. Bowen Jr. of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction," contends that "the pressure on his office might be a reaction to his attempts to ferret out corruption in key Shiite-controlled ministries." He is himself "Shiite but secular."

Iraq Seen As Longing For New "Strongman." In the New York Times (11/12, WK1, 1.16M), correspondent John Burns writes, "Mr. Hussein's outbursts served to remind many Iraqis, even those who hated him most, of something they crave in the rudderless nightmare Iraq has become under his successors: a strong leader ... It is something ordinary Iraqis say with growing intensity, even as they agree on little else. Let there be a strongman, they say, not a relentless killer like Saddam Hussein but somebody who will take the hammer to the insurgents and the death squads and the kidnappers and the criminal gangs who have banished all pretense of civility from their lives." Burns adds, "Of the many hard lessons America may take from its enterprise here, the impracticality of grafting American political values onto a society as different as Iraq's, by measure of culture, religion and historical experience, will surely be one. History may judge that attempting it in the midst of a savage war was the greatest of follies." However, "even if President Bush were convinced that Mr. Maliki should go, it is far from clear that the Americans would have the means to get rid of him."

Romania To Stay In Iraq. From an interview of Romanian President Traian Basescu, the AP (11/12, Kole) reports Bucharest "has no intentions of withdrawing its troops from the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq," according to Basescu, who vowed "to stay 'because it's a dishonor to leave your allies.'" He "said he empathized with mounting calls to withdraw the country's 608 non-combat personnel in Iraq, including impassioned pleas from the families of those serving. But 'Romania's honor is greater than its feelings,' he said."

Karzai Struggles To Steer Afghanistan. In an article exceeding 3,300 words, the Los Angeles Times (11/12, Watson, 850K) reports, "Five years after the fall of Kabul, aides say [Hamid Karzai] is turning to tradition as he struggles to build a stable democracy on a foundation of war, corruption, foreign interference and religious extremism. Critics counter that he is retreating behind the walls of his 19th century palace and losing touch with a country sinking deeper into trouble. But Karzai's foreign backers have left him with little real power, and his weak, corruption-riddled government lacks direct control over billions of dollars in development aid, money meant to help Karzai win Afghan support for his administration." Despite "enormous progress," many Afghans "see the nation slipping back into the grip of violence, corruption and extremism from which the West promised to liberate them." Karzai loses credibility "each time foreign troops accidentally kill Afghan civilians"; in addition, "For those Afghans suspicious of U.S. intentions, Karzai's close ties to the U.S. military were an issue from the start."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Tyco Head Is Selling Assets. The New York Times (11/12, Olson) reports, "When the government presented L. Dennis Kozlowski, the former head of Tyco International, with a bill for $167 million in fines and restitution, it was likely that everything would have to go." The Times continues, "After his 2005 conviction for looting Tyco, Mr. Kozlowski sold some big-ticket belongings, including his 130-foot yacht Endeavor and Impressionist paintings, whittling his debt to $59 million. … Now he's parting with his 8,600-square-foot chalet in Beaver Creek, Colo., complete with eight bedrooms and nine and a half baths — including one decked out as an outhouse. The sale price was $10 million, reduced from $11.5 million." The Times adds, "Brokers declined to identify the new owner, an oil-and-gas man based in Dallas, but said he also paid $750,000 for Mr. Kozlowski's furnishings, which include a stuffed mountain lion to greet visitors but no shower curtain like the infamous $6,000 model in his Manhattan flat."

DOJ_NMG_0093193

CRIMINAL LAW:

More Subpoenas Issued In Menendez Probe. The Newark Star-Ledger (11/11, Martin, Whelan) reported federal investigators "have resumed their inquiry into a rental deal" between Sen. Robert Menendez and the nonprofit Community Action Corp., "issuing new subpoenas in the days after he was elected to a full six-year term, according to a government source. The subpoenas sought documents related to the more than $300,000 in rent Menendez collected from the North Hudson Community Action Corp. between 1994 and 2003, the source said. It was unclear what records were sought or who was subpoenaed." The source also said, "More are coming."

FBI Likely To Continue Congressional Corruption Probes. McClatchy Newspapers (11/12, Gordon) reports, "The new chief of the FBI's Criminal Division, which is swamped with public corruption cases, says the bureau is ramping up its ability to catch crooked politicians and might run an undercover sting on Congress." McClatchy continues, 'Assistant FBI Director James Burrus called the bureau's public corruption program 'a sleeping giant that we've awoken' and predicted the nation will see continued emphasis in that area 'for many, many, many years to come.'" McClatchy adds, "So much evidence of wrongdoing is surfacing in the nation's capital that Burrus recently committed to adding a fourth 15- to 20-member public corruption squad to the FBI's Washington field office. … In the past year, former Republican Reps. Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney have pleaded guilty to corruption charges. FBI agents are investigating about a dozen other members of Congress, including as many as three senators. The Justice Department also is expected to begin seeking indictments soon after a massive FBI investigation of the Alaska Legislature. … If conditions warrant, Burrus said, he wouldn't balk at urging an undercover sting like the famed Abscam operation in the late 1970s in which a U.S. senator and six House members agreed on camera to take bribes from FBI agents posing as Arab sheikhs. … 'We look for those opportunities a lot,' Burrus said, using words rarely heard at the bureau during the past quarter century. 'I would do it on Capitol Hill. I would do it in any state legislature. ... If we could do an undercover operation, and it would get me better evidence, I'd do it in a second.' … Philip Heymann, who oversaw the Abscam investigation as chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division during the Carter administration, expressed surprise to learn of the FBI's willingness to attempt another congressional sting after the outcry from Capitol Hill over Abscam. … 'It shows courage at the FBI,' said Heymann, now a criminal law professor at Harvard University. He said he concluded, after watching a recent public television documentary and listening to experts, that 'there is more corruption (on Capitol Hill) than I ever thought imaginable' and that a single FBI sting 'might result in very large numbers of prosecutions.' … But even without an undercover operation, Heymann and other observers say they have been pleased with the GOP-controlled Justice Department's willingness to pursue old-fashioned investigations, even if they hurt congressional Republicans."

US To Seek Death Penalty In Hawaii Case. The Honolulu Advertiser (11/12, Kobayashi) reports, "Justice Department officials have overruled federal prosecutors here and authorized seeking the death penalty for an Army soldier in a move critics say is part of a nationwide attempt by the Bush administration to spread capital punishment to non-death-penalty states." The Advertiser continues, "Naeem Williams, charged with murdering his 5-year-old daughter last year, is believed to be the first in the country to face the death penalty under a provision passed by Congress three years ago for first-degree murder cases involving 'a pattern or practice of assault or torture against a child or children.' … The U.S. Attorney's Office in Hawai'i recommended against seeking capital punishment for Williams and his wife, Delilah, who is also charged with the murder, according to sources familiar with the case who do not want to be identified because the recommendation is considered confidential. … The Justice Department went along with the recommendation for the 21-year-old wife, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who must approve federal death penalty prosecutions, authorized seeking capital punishment for the husband." The Advertiser notes, "That move is part of a trend under the Bush administration to seek the death penalty in Hawai'i and 11 other states that don't have capital punishment, some critics of the death penalty believe. … Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft authorized 180 death penalty prosecutions, including 51 cases in which the local U.S. attorney's office did not recommend capital punishment, according to the Federal Death Penalty Resource Counsel Project, a national information clearinghouse for court-appointed defense lawyers in federal death-penalty cases."

DOJ_NMG_0093194

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Osceola County, FL, Could Settle Discrimination Suit On Monday. The Orlando Sentinel (11/12, Pino) reports, "When Ana Erazo walked into the elections office on a summer day in 1990, her supporters followed and applauded after she filed the paperwork to run for County Commission. … 'It all started with me,' said Erazo, the first Hispanic to seek a commission seat. 'In those days, there was lot of prejudice against us.'" The Sentinel continues, "Erazo's tale is the first chapter in the struggle of Osceola's Hispanics for political power that came to a head last year when the U.S. Department of Justice sued the county, claiming countywide elections violate the Voting Rights Act by diluting Hispanics' political power. … The county spent nearly $2 million fighting, but now it looks as if Hispanic voters in Osceola may have a better chance to elect one of their own. .. Commissioners are expected to vote Monday night on a single-member district plan to settle the suit after a federal judge noted 'racial hostility' in Osceola and found that elections are 'racially polarized.' … 'There is also evidence of a history of discrimination against Hispanic voters and candidates,' U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell wrote in his ruling last month. 'It is clear from the record that voting in Osceola County tends to be racially polarized.'"

Massachusetts Poll Workers Meet Goal. The Springfield Republican (MA) (11/11, Arbulú) reports, "With more than 100 bilingual poll workers manning all but four voting precincts on Tuesday, the city has met a goal set in its voter reform agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice." The Republican continues, "The federal government had filed suit against the city for violating the rights of Spanish-speaking residents by failing to provide enough help at the polls. … The reform agreement, reached in August, called for the city to have at least 95 bilingual poll workers who speak Spanish and English working at Tuesday's election." The Republican adds, "Of the city's 410 poll workers, 127 are bilingual in Spanish and English and five speak Vietnamese, said Gladys Oyola, the city's Spanish Language Election Program coordinator. … The Justice Department required bilingual poll workers at all but four of the city's 64 precincts based on the number of voters with Spanish surnames in each precinct, said Election Commissioner Kathy Hoar Fleury."

New Jersey Settles Suit Over Boy's Death For $7.5 Million. The AP (11/12) reports, "New Jersey has spent $7.5 million to settle a lawsuit over a child welfare case in which a 7-year-old boy's mummified remains were found in a basement here." The AP continues, "The payout, arranged last year but only recently announced, is the second-largest made by the State Division of Youth and Family Services over child welfare mistakes, according to state officials." The AP adds, "The size of the settlement is surpassed only by the $12.5 million the state agreed to give to four brothers from Collingswood who were deprived of food and medical care by their adoptive parents. The state announced that settlement last year. … With the Newark case, the settlement money is going to the estate of Faheem Williams, along with two of his siblings who are in foster care. .. .The discovery in January 2003 of Faheem's body prompted an overhaul of the child welfare agency. The state had investigated abuse complaints involving Faheem, but had closed the file 11 months before his body was found in the basement of an apartment rented by his older cousin, Sherry L. Murphy. … The boy's brothers — Raheem Williams, now 11, and Tyrone Hill Jr., 8 — were found emaciated in a room adjacent to where the body was found."

DOJ_NMG_0093195

ANTITRUST:

Gannett Could Bid On Tribune Properties. The Chicago Tribune (11/12, Oneal, Rosenthal) reports, "Turning up the heat on the already simmering auction for the assets of Chicago-based Tribune Co., Gannett Co., the nation's largest newspaper publisher, has emerged as a possible bidder for Tribune's newspaper properties, the Chicago Tribune learned Saturday." The Tribune continues, "Executives from the McLean, Va.-based media giant, which publishes 90 U.S. newspapers, including top-read USA Today, were in Chicago last week to hear presentations on Tribune's financial condition, two sources close to the situation said. .. Tribune has been hosting a number of bidders as part of a process it put in place in September to enhance shareholder value by possibly selling all of the company's television and newspaper assets. .. .But the emergence of a potential buyer with the resources and clout of Gannett could significantly change the complexion of the bidding process." The Tribune adds, "The sources noted that the Tribune sell-off is still in its early stages and that Gannett has participated in newspaper auctions before without pulling the trigger. Most recently, Gannett expressed formal interest in Knight Ridder Inc. before eventually backing away. .. .But assuming it is serious, Gannett would be the first so-called 'strategic buyer'—Wall Street parlance for a suitor in the same industry—to jump into the fray. … Until now, bidding for Tribune assets had been thought to be limited to financial buyers: several large private equity firms and a handful of wealthy entrepreneurs. But, unhappy with bids that valued the whole company close to the current stock price of about $32 a share, Tribune began asking for bids on its parts—newspapers such as the Los Angeles Times and the Chicago Tribune and television stations such as WGN-Channel 9, among other properties."

Class-Action Suit Against Microsoft To Open Monday In Iowa. The Des Moines Register (11/12) reports, "About 450 registered voters, in two shifts, will converge on the Polk County (IA) Courthouse (Monday) to begin what could be the weeks-long process of picking a jury for a class-action, antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp. The trial is expected to last several months and could be worth up to $450 million for lawyers and four named plaintiffs, who contend that the giant computer software company used anti-competitive practices to drive up the cost of its Windows operating system, as well as its Microsoft Office, Word and Excel programs." The Register continues, "Potential members of the class include any person, business or other large organization that bought those programs between May 18, 2004, and June 30, 2006. … Microsoft has denied overcharging its customers and insists that consumers received fair and reasonable prices. .. . The trial is expected to be one of the longest in Iowa history."

Sports Artist Sued Over Use Of Alabama's School Colors. The New York Times (11/12, Liptak) reports, "In the solemn cathedral of college football devotion and instruction that is the Paul W. Bryant Museum here, a large painting dominates the main chamber. It is called 'The Sack,' and it shows an encounter between a Notre Dame quarterback and a human locomotive in crimson and white. … 'I've never been hit like that before,' the quarterback, Steve Beuerlein, said after his near-lethal sack by Cornelius Bennett in 1986, in the University of Alabama's first victory ever over his team." The Times continues, "Daniel A. Moore, who painted 'The Sack' and scores of other renditions of signal moments in Alabama football history, said he felt something similar last year, when his fax machine began to spit out a lawsuit from the university. … Mr. Moore's paintings, reproduced in prints and on merchandise, violated the university's trademark rights, the suit said. It asked a federal judge to forbid him to, among other things, use the university's 'famous crimson and white color scheme.'" The Times adds, "Athletes, sports leagues and universities around the nation have become increasingly aggressive in protecting what they say is their intellectual property, and their claims have met with a mixed response from judges and fans. But almost no one here thinks the suit against Mr. Moore is a good idea. … Mr. Moore has asked Judge R. David Proctor of the Federal District Court in Birmingham to dismiss the case on First Amendment grounds. His brief cited a decision of the federal appeals court in California ruling that a trademark owner 'does not have the right to control public discourse' if 'the public imbues his mark with a meaning.'"

Actor Sues Wisconsin Man Over Use Of Name. The AP (11/12, Press) reports from Milwaukee, WI, "Andy Griffith, the actor who portrayed the sheriff of the fictional town of Mayberry on television, has sued a Wisconsin man who unsuccessfully ran for sheriff of Grant County after legally changing his name to Andrew Jackson Griffith." The

DOJ_NMG_0093196

AP continues, "The lawsuit, filed Nov. 3 in Federal District Court in Madison, contends that the candidate, William H. Fenrick, 42, violated trademark and copyright laws, as well as the privacy of the actor when he used his new name to promote his candidacy for sheriff in southwestern Wisconsin. … Mr. Griffith, the actor, who is 80, starred in the 1960s program 'The Andy Griffith Show,' one of the most popular series in television history. He also played an unorthodox lawyer on 'Matlock' in the 1980s and 1990s." The AP notes, "The lawsuit says the former Mr. Fenrick changed his name for the 'sole purpose of taking advantage of Griffith's notoriety in an attempt to gain votes.' It asks the court to order him to go back to his original name. … The lawsuit also asks the new Mr. Griffith to publish disclaimers and an apology in Grant County newspapers that say he has no association with the actor. It seeks unspecified damages and court fees."

ENVIRONMENT:

Corpus Christi Left With Cleanup Bill In Asarco Mess. The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times (11/12, Kelley) reports, "Ruth Einkauf and her Dona Park neighbors were promised a 30-acre nature preserve behind her home in 1999 as part of an Environmental Protection Agency settlement with a nearby recycling plant." The Caller-Times continues, "Before the settlement, announced as part of an enforcement action by the state and federal governments, she and neighbors tended the area. Now, weeds and tall grass on the lot provide cover for varmints that invade Einkauf's home." The Caller-Times adds, "It is unclear if the project ever will be completed. Dona Park residents are neighbors to one of the largest bankruptcies in the country, a vast and tangled affair that encompasses century-old mining giant Asarco and its subsidiary Encycle Texas. … Tom Aldrich, vice president for environmental affairs at Asarco, said the company established a conservation trust at the 30-acre parcel and performed some environmental studies as a prelude to building the park. It has not built the walkways nor planted the promised vegetation that was required. With the company in bankruptcy, the future of that conservation trust is murky. … Neighbors of other Asarco plants across Texas have yet to see more than $1.75 million in supplemental environmental projects - plans approved by the government as part of settlement agreements."

IMMIGRATION:

Weiner Seeks Deportation Of Former Nazi Guard. The New York Daily News (11/12, Rose) reports, "A U.S. congressman rallied alongside hundreds of Jewish teenagers outside the home of a former Nazi camp guard - but some of the man's Jackson Heights neighbors say they should just leave the old man alone." The News continues, "Jakiw Palij, 84, was stripped of his U.S. citizenship three years ago by a judge who ruled that Palij lied when he applied for an immigrant visa in 1949. … But he has not been deported because the government can't find a country to accept him - which the activists said was unacceptable. … 'No one is going to hide in our midst,' declared U.S. Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-Queens). 'Thousands and thousands of people were murdered by this monster. He's not paying for his crimes by living here in a peaceful block in Jackson Heights.'" The News notes, "But several of Palij's neighbors, who describe him as quiet and frail, disagreed with the protesters. … 'It's wrong; why don't they just leave the people alone?' said Abraham Pabon, 48, a truck driver. 'Everybody has a life to live. It's like they say, God forgives. It's very, very wrong what they're doing here.' … Justice Department officials have acknowledged there's no evidence Palij engaged in atrocities - but say that the mere act of guarding prisoners sealed their fate. More than 6,000 Jews at Trawniki were shot to death on Nov. 3, 1943, in one of the single largest massacres of the Holocaust."

State Immigrant Protection Rules Prove To Be Unpopular. The New York Times (11/12, A22, McKinley, 1.16M) reports that state and local laws like San Francisco's "so-called sanctuary policy, which forbids police and city officials from asking people they encounter in the course of an investigation about their immigration status" have drawn criticism by some. Critics argue sanctuary policies "discourage the police from enforcing laws" and "conservative legal groups and politicians have begun to challenge such policies," while some states "have passed laws discouraging sanctuary policies."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

As Bush Honors Soldiers, War Woes Continue To Drag On Him. NBC Nightly News

DOJ_NMG_0093197

(11/11, lead story, 3:12, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) was the only network newscast Saturday night, and it began by segueing from President Bush's honoring of soldiers and veterans into an account of the President's difficulties at home. NBC opened by saying, "On this Veterans' Day, Americans led by President Bush paid tribute to the men and women of our armed forces, those who have served in the past and those serving now around the world. The day has special meaning during this time of war when more than 140,000 Americans remain on duty in Iraq alone. As the President considers the next step in the war in Iraq, a new poll shows his approval ratings have dropped to the lowest point so far in his Administration." NBC (Ohm): "On a day when the nation's attention is on the men and women in uniform, the White House is looking for a new direction in Iraq. At Arlington National Cemetery, President Bush paused to remember the country's fallen and those currently on the frontlines. … Unlike previous Veterans Day the President barely mentioned Iraq. Last year he gave a strong defense of the war. … Now the President must deal with a Democratic-controlled Congress. A new Newsweek poll shows his approval rating at 31%, an all-time low."

Newsweek (11/11, Mabry, 3.12M) says Bush's "response was swift and decisive -- if a little late. After voters gave Republicans 'a thumpin" at the polls," Bush "banished his contentious defense secretary; invited the presumptive leaders of the new House and Senate to lunch (would-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi had pasta; the president ate crow, a Bush aide joked); and suffered through two pained photo-ops with Pelosi and Harry Reid. … And what did the president get for listening to the voice of the American people? The worst approval rating of his presidency." Bush's 31% job approval is the same as that of Vice President Cheney. "Bill Clinton's lowest rating during his presidency was 36 percent; Bush's father's was 29 percent, and Ronald Reagan's was 35 percent. Jimmy Carter's and Richard Nixon's lows were 28 and 23 percent, respectively." And "worst of all, most Americans are writing off the rest of Bush's presidency; two-thirds (66 percent) believe he will be unable to get much done, up from 56 percent in a mid-October poll; only 32 percent believe he can be effective." The AP (11/11) says that for the "relentlessly optimistic" Bush, "this is a season of disappointment, surprise and setbacks. At home and around the world, things are not going his way. With Bush's legacy-building time running out, Americans sent a clear message in Tuesday's election that they were angry at him and wanted change. Though Bush's name was not on the ballot, voters took revenge on the Republican Congress and put the Democrats in charge" on Capitol Hill.

Bush Lays Wreath At Arlington. National coverage of Veterans Day commemorations focused on President Bush's visit to Arlington National Cemetery, where he laid a wreath on the Tomb of the Unknowns. Coverage is largely limited to wire services or brief reports. The AP (11/11) reports Bush "marked Veterans Day by praising U.S. troops for fighting tyranny and oppression, yet touched only briefly on the war in Iraq, where U.S. commanders are rethinking strategy. Three days after announcing the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Bush hailed members of the armed services, past and present, for their dedication and bravery"; however, his Arlington address "contrasted sharply with the strong rhetoric he used to defend the war on Veterans Day a year ago." The Washington Post (11/12, C1, Schwartzman, 690K) and the Washington Times (11/12, A1, Lively, 88K) primarily quote veterans in their reporting.

Bush Says Elections Do Not Signal Loss Of Resolve In Terror War. The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports President Bush said in his weekly radio address that GOP election losses "didn't signal a weakening of American resolve to win the war on terrorism." Bush said, "America faces brutal enemies who have attacked us before and want to attack us again. I have a message for these enemies: Do not confuse the workings of American democracy with a lack of American will. Our nation is committed to bringing you to justice, and we will prevail." DNC Chairman Howard Dean "said in a response to Bush that voters made it clear they wanted 'a new direction' in Iraq and his party intended to use its control of Congress to try to deliver that."

Chait Critical Of Bush's Linking Of Terror Issue And Election Results. In his Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes, "At his news conference after Tuesday's elections, President Bush struck a note of reassurance. 'I have a message for those on the front lines,' he said. 'To our enemies, do not be joyful. Do not confuse the workings of our democracy with a lack of will…. To our brave men and women in uniform: Don't be doubtful. America will always support you.' Why would terrorists or U.S. soldiers think electing Democrats would suggest a lack of will or support for the troops? Oh, right. Because Bush had been saying so. 'However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win, and America loses,' he told a GOP crowd in October. 'That's what's at stake in this election.' I guess if I were a terrorist, I would have been joyful to learn that the people who were going to help me win had prevailed in the elections."

DOJ_NMG_0093198

Democratic Freshmen Hope To Bring Pragmatism To Capitol Hill. The New York Times (11/12, Toner, Zernike, 1.16M) reports on its front page that while many members of the Democratic congressional class of 2006 "show little appetite" for a 1994-style "ideological crusade," in interviews "with nearly half of them this week, the freshmen -- 41 in the House and 9 in the Senate, including one independent -- conveyed a keen sense of their own moment in history, and a distinct world view: they say they were given a rare opportunity by voters, many of them independents and Republicans, who were tired of the partisanship and gridlock in Washington." They have "set themselves an extraordinary (political veterans might say impossible) task: to avoid the ideological wars that have so dominated Congress in recent years, to be pragmatists, and to change the tone in Washington after a sharply partisan campaign."

The Washington Post (11/12, Weisman, 690K) says on its front page that Democrats "are looking to the Republican takeover in 1995 as an object lesson of what to emulate and what to avoid. They hope to match the legislative energy of the Newt Gingrich era while avoiding at all costs the partisan pitfalls that eventually soured voters on the GOP. … Led by a feisty Nevada senator and the first woman in history to claim the House speaker's post, the long-banished Democrats hope to prove their bona fides as lawmakers and challenge a president from the other party to accept their agenda, a game plan taken straight from the Gingrich era's 'Contract With America.' They also intend to challenge President Bush to change course in Iraq and consider their demands for a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops. But Democrats say they will avoid the overreaching, arrogance and rancorous partisanship that left them virtually powerless on Capitol Hill and spawned an era of political corruption and influence-peddling."

"Two Pugnacious Democrats" Will Lead On Capitol Hill. In a piece about Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, Ronald Brownstein of the Los Angeles Times (11/12, 850K) writes that in Reid and House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, "Bush will face two pugnacious Democrats determined to challenge his agenda and to force him to react to their own goals. Bush could count on congressional Republicans to repeatedly schedule votes on his priorities, such as legislation to abolish the estate tax. Reid dismisses that idea with barely a shrug." Instead, Democrats "want to force the national debate onto a very different agenda. Reid says he expects the Senate 'pretty quickly' to pass legislation raising the minimum wage. He's also optimistic about quick action allowing Medicare to negotiate directly with drug companies for lower prescription prices -- an idea the White House and the pharmaceutical industry blocked in 2003 when Congress passed the drug benefit for seniors." He also "anticipates more aggressive congressional oversight, starting with Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (11/12, Fiore, Barabak, 850K) writes that on the day after the elections, Pelosi "awoke to a celebrity of a whole other order. Her near-certain ascension as the nation's first female speaker of the House had networks lining up for interviews and newspapers placing her picture on the front page. Blogs were abuzz. Overnight, a woman who was scarcely known to the nation moved into a world of constant public attention." The AP (11/11) says Pelosi "will be the first Californian" to become speaker, "and congressional watchdogs say they'll be observing her new spending clout with great interest." The AP adds that "aides to Mrs. Pelosi don't dispute that the state will benefit from a changing of the guard at the Capitol."

Bush Could Have Hard Time Reviving Texas-Style Bipartisanship. The Houston Chronicle (11/12, Mason, 530K) writes that the President's "rude awakening Wednesday morning to a newly elected Democratic-led Congress stirred up all kinds of nostalgia -- and questionable impressions -- about his days as Texas governor. Bush told reporters he could easily manage the challenge of working with a majority in the other party; that after all, he did it in the 1990s with the state's Legislature." But Bush "did not spend six years bashing Democratic state lawmakers as bad for the state before taking over as governor. When he became president and was complemented by a Republican-controlled Congress, he often was on the attack against the opposing party for the next six years."

Panetta Says Democrats Must Govern, Not Obstruct. In a New York Times (11/12, WK13, 1.16M) op-ed, Clinton White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta warns, "Last Tuesday, the American people sent a clear message that they are sick and tired of government by crisis. They elected Democrats to the House and Senate not to prolong gridlock, but to govern. There are those who believe that the best political strategy for 2008 is for the Democrats to continue to confront President Bush and seal his fate as a failed president. The danger, however, is that if the Democrats become nothing more than a party of obstruction, it will be only a matter of time before they too will lose the trust of the American people."

DOJ_NMG_0093199

Scholar Says Democrats Have Duty To Investigate Administration. In a New York Times (11/12, WK13, 1.16M) op-ed, Stanley Brand of the Penn State Dickinson School of Law writes, "The Democrats' victory has stoked the fire beneath an already brewing debate within the party regarding the need for investigations of the executive branch during the Bush administration's two remaining years. Some Democratic members of Congress are reluctant to pursue investigations into war profiteering, detainee interrogation or other controversial issues, fearing that such scrutiny of the administration will make Democrats appear petty and partisan and cost them electoral support in 2008. A vigorous examination of the administration's conduct, however, is not only the appropriate action as a matter of constitutional prerogative, it is the politically necessary response to voters' overwhelming rejection of the current Congress's failure to assert itself in this area."

Democrats Already Strategizing To Hold New Majorities. The AP (11/11, Kuhnhenn) says one question for Democrats is basic: "Are their new majorities in the House and Senate sustainable? What if the war in Iraq is over by 2008? Or what if it is still being waged despite Democratic pledges to change the course? What if voter antipathy toward President Bush is irrelevant in two years?" DSCC Chairman Sen. Charles Schumer "acknowledged that the Democrats' 51-49 majority in the Senate was the result of the narrowest of victories in six race. 'Had 10,000 votes flipped we would have four seats not six,' he said." But Democrats "do see opportunities ahead. In 2008, there are 21 Republican Senate seats up for election and only 12 Democratic seats. E ight of the Republicans in those seats won their last election with 55% or less of the vote."

On CNN's In The Money (11/11), anchor Jack Cafferty said, "I think the degree to which we saw [Democrats win] was absolutely surprising. There were no Democratic incumbents voted out anywhere in the country. They won all the seats that they needed to take the Senate, and even Vegas said that was a real long shot. The interesting thing to me was, if you look at Montana and Virginia, two of the firewall states for the Republicans, the total number of votes that tipped the balance of power in this country, fewer than 10,000."

"Brutally Effective Taskmaster" Emanuel Captained Democrats To Win. The Chicago Tribune (11/12, Bendavid, 617K) runs a 6,000-word profile of DCCC Chairman Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "a portrait in power of a brutally effective taskmaster." He guided his party to victory in large measure "by remaking the Democratic Party in his own image. Democrats had never raised enough money. Emanuel, a savvy fundraiser who shaped those skills under Richard M. Daley and Bill Clinton, yelled at colleagues and threatened his candidates into generating an unprecedented amount of campaign cash. Democrats had a history of appeasing party constituencies. Emanuel tore up the old litmus tests on abortion and other issues. With techniques that would make a Big Ten football coach blush, he recruited candidates who could mount tough challenges in some of the reddest patches of America. Democrats had blanched at hardball. Emanuel, jokingly called 'Rahmbo' even by his mother, muscled weaker Democrats out of races in favor of stronger ones, and ridiculed the chairman of his own party."

On CNN's In The Money (11/11), Time national political correspondent Karen Tumulty said, "One of the smartest things that the two generals in this campaign," Schumer and Emanuel, did, is they "went out and looked for candidates who looked like the districts in which they were running, who really represented the values of those districts much more so than they did the national Democratic profile. That's why you did have people like Heath Shuler in North Carolina, former Redskins quarterback running. Brad Ellsworth in Indiana, a county sheriff running. And these people were a lot more appealing back in the districts. But it could make their lives a little more difficult when they get to Washington because they are such an unusual fit with the national party."

